We know the Father, brothers, even we who are but little in Israel, for we love him. Do you not feel that you love God this morning? You might not dare to say so in public, and yet you would die for him. Sooner than renounce your God would you not give up all that you possess? It may be you will never be tried as the martyrs have been; but if you were, can you suppose it possible that you could part with your God? No, your inmost heart loves Him; you know it does; and loving Him, you are united to Him by bonds which cannot be severed. Moreover, we know the Father, for we trust Him. Is it not written, "They that know Thy name will put their trust in Thee"? Can you not trust God with everything? A child has no cares; his father cares for him. A child knows no anxiety; his father bears all the anxiety on his behalf. Is it not so with you? Though you are babes in grace, do you not trust? trust for time, trust for eternity, trust for your bodies, and trust for your souls? I am sure you do. If you are what you should be, you know the Father, for your faith rests upon Him.

This also is true, that you seek to imitate Him. It is wonderful how little children imitate their father, perhaps more than grown-up children do, though the influence of example is seen upon them also. The very little ones will try to do everything exactly like father. It must be right, it must be perfect, if father does it; they make us smile as we see in them ourselves in miniature. Is not this the very thing which you try to do?

III. Now we come to our third division. Will you kindly follow me with your Bibles, especially you that are "little children," while I commend to you which John has written for your guidance.

First, look at 1 John 2: "My little children, these things I write unto you, that ye sin not." That is the first precept, Little children, sin not. Children are very apt to get into the mire. Most mothers will tell you, I think, that if there is a pool of mud anywhere within a mile, her firstborn joy and comfort will find it out and get into it if he possibly can; and no matter how often a child is washed he seems always to need washing again; if there is a method by which he can foul his hands and his face, your pretty cherub is most ingenious to find it out. I am afraid this is too much the case with the children of God. There is so much of carnality about us, so much of the old Adam, that the question is not into which sin we fall, but into which sin we do not fall.

Alas! we are apt to be proud, though we have nothing to be proud of; we are prone to despond and doubt our Father, though He never gave us any cause to do so; we are inclined to be worldly, though there is nothing in the world worth loving; and we have a tendency to grow cold and chill toward God, though He is altogether lovely, and ought to win our warmest affection. We are apt to speak unadvisedly with our lips; we are apt to be full of foolish thoughts; we are apt to be self-willed. We find an angry temper rising against some brother of ours whom we ought to love; and we have not long got over that before we are half afraid to utter a word of rebuke lest we should incur the laughter of the ungodly. Thus do we glide from one sin to another, even as a waterfall descends from rock to rock.

"My little children, I write unto you, that ye sin not." Avoid every sin; forsake it altogether. Ask for the grace of God to sanctify you wholly, spirit, soul, and body. Though you are only newly born, yet, my little children, sin not. You will soon lose your comfort if you do. Little children, sin will hurt you, damage you, grieve you, and displease your heavenly Father; it will raise a cloud, behind which His presence will be hidden from you; it will stop your heavenly growth; it will prevent your usefulness. My little children, I earnestly entreat you that ye sin not. Burnt child, dread the fire! You have just been plucked out of it, do not go back to it. Do not play with sparks; keep clear of every kind of match that might create a flame. Seek after holiness with all your might. Though born but yesterday do not sin to-day. God help you to fulfil this holy precept.

Further on in this second chapter the apostle writes to them again, and tells them (verse 18) that it is the last time, and that there are many antichrists abroad. You will have to run your eye right down the chapter till you come to verse 24, for that is what He says to little children, because there are many antichrists in the world that would seduce them; "Let that therefore abide in you, which ye have heard from the beginning." Little children are very fickle. The toys which they cry for one day they break the next; young minds change with the wind. So, little children, there are many evil ones who will endeavor to seduce you from the truth of God, and as you have a natural instability of mind as yet, for you are only newly converted, it is well to be on your guard against those who would mislead you.

Till we are rooted and grounded in the truth, new things have great charms for us, especially if they have about them a great show of holiness and zeal for God. Listen, then, dear children but newly born into the Saviour's family: "Let that therefore abide in you, which ye have heard from the beginning." Alas, even those who are older in grace than you are have shown a sad readiness to be duped by plausible persons who have invented fresh notions and methods. I have lived long enough to have seen a considerable variety of follies and

MANIAS IN THE RELIGIOUS WORLD.

They have sprung up, grown great, declined, and vanished. One day it has been one thing, another another.

I have lived to see those things justly ridiculed which a few years before were cried up as the wonders of the age. I thank God I have not been moved by any of these periodical fits of frenzy, but have been content to keep to the one old truth which I have gathered from the Scriptures and made my own by experience, and by the teaching of the Holy Spirit. I have not had to tack about, for I have been enabled to steam ahead; and I hope I shall do so to the end. I have no respect for these upstart inventions; but I regard them as so many phases of human delusion. "Little children, let that therefore abide in you, which ye have heard from the beginning:" leave to others the soon-exhausted novelties and do you keep to the eternal unchangeable truth which is taught you in God's word and in your own soul's experience.

Little children, here is a third precept for you, and I want you to put it into your bosom, and carry it home (verse 28). "And now, little children, abide in Him." There is a Sabbath portion for you: "Abide in Him." Let the truth abide in you, and do you abide in Christ, who is the truth. Little children are very

APT TO STRAY:

I have known them tempted away from home, to play the truant; they have gone into the fields after pretty flowers, or down by the brook to fish for minnows, and then they have fallen into all sorts of trouble. The best place for a child is at home; and for a babe in grace the best shelter is the Saviour's bosom. "Little children, abide in Him." If you forget everything else, I say this morning, lay this up in your hearts, and let none tempt you away from simply trusting your Saviour, sweetly resting in His love, and humbly following on to know more and more of Him. "And now, little children, abide in Him."

What next? Read on to chapter 3, verse 7: "Little children, let no man deceive you." Children are very credulous; they will believe any idle tale if it be told them by a clever and attractive person. Little children, believe your Saviour, but be not ready to believe anybody else. Believe God's Word, and stand fast to that; but if sinners entice you, do not consent to them; and if antichrist would teach you false doctrine, close your ear to it. Be as the sheep of whom Jesus said, "A stranger will they not follow, for they know not the voice of strangers."

Further on (3:18) we read: "My little children, let us not love in word, neither in tongue; but in deed and in truth." Little children are apt to let their angry passions rise till they have to be told by Dr. Watts that their "Little hands were never made

To tear each other's eyes."

And truly we have some Christian children who have been all too quick about this tearing of each other's eyes. They have seen a truth, and some friend they meet with does not see it; therefore they have tried to knock his eyes out to make him see it. This is a faithful description of many Christian controversies. It is idle to attempt to compel another to think as I think by scolding him, and heaping wrath upon him. Let us never do that. Let us love.

The last precept to little children is at the end of the epistle. Carefully read the last verse—"Little children, keep yourselves from idols." Little children are naturally fond of toys and pretty pictures. Anything like pomp and show is sure to please children. How fond they are of soldiers, and banners, and processions, and bands of music, and all that is gay; these are their idols. That is the tendency of many grown-up children that I know of. They admire a fine religion, tasteful, striking, artistic. "Little children, keep yourselves from idols." I would like this text printed over the altars of our Ritualistic neighbors. I need scarcely mention others who have no taste or care for the beautiful, but their toys are all for noise-making, and glitter and flash, a sort of fifth of November all the days of the year. Do not become

Be not led away from the Church of God by armies or navies. Alas, the children must now have their play toys in the church, and their toys in the chapel, and some must have their toys in the streets, till one would think with their trumpets and drums that they had just come home from the fair. "Little children, keep yourselves from idols."

I do not think you are likely to fall in love with the idols of the heathen and bow down to them; but there are plenty of other gods which are the idols of one period and the derision of the next. Keep you to Christ. Ask not for pomp and show; ask not for noise and bluster; ask for nothing but that your sins may be forgiven you, that you may know the Father, and then that you may abide in Christ, and be full of love to all the family of God. Little children, may the Lord Jesus Christ be with you, and may you grow in grace till you come unto the fulness of the stature of men in Him. May His grace be upon all them that love Him, and wait for His appearing.

MARVELLOUS ESCAPE OF TWO AUSTRALIAN PREACHERS.

A PROVIDENTIAL escape from a terrible death was experienced by the Rev. Stephen Rabone and a friend, in Australia, some time ago. Mr. Rabone, who is a well-known minister in the Wesleyan denomination, relates the incident. It appears that having occasion to visit a northern circuit, he set out from Sydney in company with Mr. Bowden, of Bolwarra, a Christian friend who, as a lay preacher, had become familiar with the places they were about to visit.

The journey was made on horseback, and the two friends found no lack of topics on which to converse as they rode side by side through scenes of surpassing natural beauty. The greater part of their road lay apart from the cities, and much of it through localities not yet brought under cultivation. Rough paths had been cut by the settlers through the forests, just wide enough to admit of the passage of a wagon, but they frequently rode for many hours without seeing a human habitation or any evidences of man's presence, or caching a glimpse of a human face.

There was something very solemnizing in the solitude and the silence only broken by a bird's carol or the cry of some four-footed denizen of the forest. How long the gigantic trees which bordered the road had been growing there no man could say, but that they were in many cases of enormous age was evident, even to an unpractised eye. Woodcutters frequently related that in cutting down these hoary monsters, they had found marks which convinced them that the years during which their roots had spread and the branches had increased in size and number, were not to be reckoned, by decades, but by centuries. They told, too, of disappointments they had met with in their occupation that were not a little startling. In cutting down a tree, to all appearance healthy and solid, they had discovered when it was felled that it was hollow throughout almost its entire length from the root to its high branches. The ravages of the white ants and other enemies of the trees had destroyed its centre, leaving a mere husk standing, like hypocrites in the church, beautiful to the eye but within utter emptiness.

As the two friends rode through the forest, conversing on these and other peculiarities of the scene around them, now and then stopping to admire some strange growth, the shades of evening began to fall, and the wind passing through the trees had a mournful moaning sound—the sure precursor of a stormy night. Warned by this sign as well as by the setting sun, they quickened their pace that they might reach their destination before nightfall or the outbreak of the storm. The wind continued rising, and its roar stopped all further conversation. A discussion as to the relative merits of the horses they rode had occurred earlier in the day, and it was now suggested that as there was no time to be lost, they should put their contention to a practical test. It turned out on their doing so that Mr. Rabone was rather better mounted than his companion, and he outstripped him in the friendly competition. He was soon some forty or fifty yards ahead. He was reining in his horse to allow Mr. Bowden to overtake him, when a fierce gust of wind almost overturned man and beast, and was followed by a peculiar rushing sound, and then by a crash that seemed to shake the earth.

Recovering himself by an effort, he turned round to look for his companion, and there saw a sight that made him turn pale. Between the two horsemen lay a gigantic tree. The wind had struck the huge branches heavy with their weight of foliage, and had blown it down right across their path. It had fallen between the two men so exactly, that had the foremost been many steps to the rear or the hindermost but a few steps in advance of the position they respectively occupied, one of the two must have perished under that stupendous weight.

So narrow an escape is seldom seen. It seemed miraculous, so close had both been to the falling mass. As they looked at the prostrate giant, and realized that they were both safe and sound, save for the scratches and bruises of such branches as were too weak to seriously hurt them, they offered heartfelt thanks to God for their escape from a terrible death. It was evident that the Master had other work for them still to do for Him in the world, and it was with hearts solemnized and spirits bowed in renewed consecration that they went forward to their destination.

It is in this spirit that every Christian should live. Perils to life and limb are about us continually. In fires, in railroad catastrophes, in shipwreck or in the perils of the street, the Christian has no immunity above his fellows. As Mr. and Mrs. Bliss died in that terrible day of the Ashtabula disaster, so other Christians have died in other seasons of calamity. As our Saviour taught us (Luke 13 : 4) we do not, in becoming Christians, escape the perils of life. It is in what comes after life that the Christian differs from other men. His times are in God's hand, and he knows that however or whenever he may die, he goes to an inheritance prepared for him. But he should also feel that his opportunities for usefulness may be closed at any moment, and that, therefore, it is incumbent upon him that he "works while it is called to-day."

REMARKABLE FAITH CURES.

Among the most painful diseases and one of the most reluctant to yield to medical treatment, is that known to the profession as

NEURASTHENIA.

It is complete nervous prostration, and involves acute suffering. A correspondent over the signature M. H. T., who has been marvellously cured of this complaint, thus describes her cure in a communication to Miss Carrie F. Judd, who publishes the account for the encouragement of others, in her Triumphs of Faith.

"In June, 1882, while at a hygienic institute, a former patient returned there for a visit. She had been lately cured, most beautifully and suddenly, and her presence made a deep impression upon me, but I felt that I was too far off to 'touch the hem of His garment.' I had been an invalid for ten years, and my physicians told me that I must stay in the institute six months or a year longer, and that two or three years would be required for full restoration. In my intense longing for health I cried to the Lord to bring me very near to Him, that I might humbly ask Him for this great gift.

"The following day the Rev. S. R. Wells, formerly a missionary to India, related to the patients the account of his healing by faith. This seemed a way opened so directly by the loving Father's hand to help me, that I sent for him to come and see me. In telling him that my want of holiness was the obstacle that prevented my asking in faith, he said, 'Why! you must not wait to be any better, but come as a sinner to Jesus, who will restore both soul and body.'

"For years I had felt that if I could give up every fibre of my being to my Master, He would show me the way to health, but Satan seemed to bind me with chains so that I could not say 'I will follow whithersoever Thou leadest.' But this, too, I put into God's hands and He answered my prayer, for a spirit of consecration and love, just as much as my prayer for health!

"On the 7th of September, a letter from Miss Judd came, in answer to my request, saying that night, at 8 o'clock, they would pray for me, at their faith-meeting. I thought 'Can it be possible that I shall be well to-night? How can I believe it? How can I consecrate myself to Him forever?' After a solemnprayer that night, by a dear friend, who was with me, and one from my own lips, I said 'I am well now!' So the next day I went to work and the dear Lord poured of His own strength into me. How real the truth seemed, those first few days. "It is God that worketh in you, both to will and to do.'

"On the 15th, I left for Elmira, N. Y., to receive instruction and help in my new life, from a lady, who herself had been cured nine years before, and who has since had a most remarkable experience in the life of faith (Mrs. E. B. Blake). She taught me to believe that I was 'every whit whole!' So, after two days, I walked to a faith-meeting, over a mile distant, and when I came back I did not even feel like lying down!"

BURNING OF THE KELY MALAZA IDOL.

(See Illustration.)

In 1870 there was, by order of the Madagascar Government, a general burning of idols and charms throughout that country. A missionary at that time gave the following account: "In the midst of a beautiful grove, on the crest of a long oval mountain, about five or six miles east of Antananarivo, is a populous town, esteemed sacred by the idolaters, which has long been the home of the great national idol called 'Kely Malaza.' The idol itself was a small stick of wood, four inches long, fastened transversely to the middle of a strip of red silk three feet long and three inches wide, with a small silver chain sewed on each end. This paltry thing has been the time-honored trust of thousands of the Malagase; and, at one time, its keepers received half the revenues the country received from custom-dues.

"Recently its keepers visited the present queen in a body, to lay before her their cause. They assured her that the idols were the lords of the land, and were above all human power and influence. As their keepers, they demanded special favor from the government, and a restoration of the privileges which they had previously enjoyed. The Queen replied that they must remain in waiting a little while, and she would give them her final decision about the matter. In the meantime she hastily despatched a body of several hundred armed men, on horseback, to burn 'Kely Malaza,' with all his appurtenances. The keepers, who were in waiting for the Queen's answer, heard what was in contemplation, and made a hasty retreat to save their treasures. But the Queen's messengers were too quick for them; so that the whole were consigned to the flames, without the loss of a single life, no one daring to resist.

"This act was followed by a stringent order of the Government for a general burning of all idols and charms of every kind. Without some knowledge of the peculiar state of the country, this demand on the part of the Government may appear to be of questionable expediency. But when it is remembered that the people were being duped, that the idol-keepers were practising deceit and fraud and using the superstitious fears of the people to extort contributions of money under pretence that they could protect contributors and their families from disease, secure their houses from lightning, and their rice-fields from hail, the peremptory order of the Government is justifiable. Although this has been in no sense brought about through the direct instigation of the missionaries, it is unquestionably the indirect result of the influence of the little band of Christian men who have brought the Gospel to this country."

"Esther grasped the branches and cried for help."

A TEACHER RESCUED BY A CHILD.

"Help! Help!" The cries uttered in childish treble resounded across the fields on both sides the river. There was no answer, however, for the spot was remote from a village, and it was a locality not much frequented by pedestrians. "Help! Help!" again cried the voice, and the speaker, a child not more than twelve years of age, threw herself down on the grassy slope and reached as far forward as she could.

It was toward a dark object among the rushes that Esther Bowden was reaching—an object which the tide was drifting out from the rushes into the current of the stream. Only two minutes before, though to Esther it seemed hours, that object was by her side, and was her companion, her friend, her teacher. Now lost to consciousness, almost lifeless, Miss Bradshaw was slowly but surely drifting to her death. Little Esther had seen her slip, lose her footing, and finally with a splash and a cry fall into the river; then the child raised her agonized cry for help, and cast herself down and frantically struggled to save her drowning companion.

Miss Bradshaw had fainted; that was evident, for she was helpless as a log, and made no effort to save herself. No help came; Esther grew desperate. She must make another attempt to save the life in peril. Child as she was, she knew that every moment was precious in that crisis, and she looked eagerly around for some means of at least keeping the body of her companion from drifting out of the rushes, until some stronger arm could draw it from the water. It was only just beyond her reach; she could touch the floating dress with the tips of her fingers. If she could only add an inch or two to the length of her arm the child thought, she might yet save her friend. That she could not do, but she might by clinging to the branches of a tree that spread themselves out over the water clutch the floating drapery.

Grasping the branch firmly she bent down, but she had not calculated on its motion. It bent beneath her weight, and losing her balance, she fell into the water. She retained, however, sufficient presence of mind to retain her hold on the treacherous foliage with one hand, while with the other she seized Miss Bradshaw's arm and held her up with all the might of her childish frame. Her own fall had given a vibration to the water that lifted the drowning girl from the rushes, and would have sent her floating down the stream but for the firm grip Esther had upon her.

Again Esther raised her voice; "Help! Help!" she cried, and this time she fancied she heard a response. Oh, now if she could only bear the strain a little longer they might be saved. The arm that held the branch was getting numb, and the dead weight of her unconscious friend seemed as if it would pull the other arm from the shoulder, but still the brave child continued the struggle. She might easily have saved herself if she had released her burden, for she could have drawn herself to the bank by the tree. But she did not consider it for a moment. Holding on to the branch and supporting her friend she maintained her position, and there she prayed earnestly to God for strength to hold out until help came.

It was very near now. Esther could hear shouts of encouragement behind her and the rapid footfall of a man running at the top of his speed. Her feet and legs were bitterly cold, and at times the scene around her swam before her eyes and she feared she was about to faint, but her hands felt as though they were rivetted in their grasp. Again she closed her eyes and prayed: "Merciful God, give me strength a few minutes longer for Jesus' sake."

The words were scarcely uttered when she felt her arm grasped by a man who had waded into the water. She looked at him and recognized a man who worked on her father's farm. "Harry," she said, and fell fainting on the grass. When she recovered consciousness she had the gratification of seeing Miss Bradshaw sitting beside her, and for the moment she could not remember what had occurred. As she realized it, the rush across her memory of that terrible time in the water almost overcame her again, but she was clasped in the arms of the girl she had risked her life to save, and warm, grateful kisses were rained on her brow and lips.

In a little time the wagon Harry had hurried away to bring was at their side, and they were quickly lifted in, wrapped up warmly, and driven to their home. The excitement and distress Esther had endured, brought on an illness in which for several days her life was in danger. But the unremitting attention of Miss Bradshaw and the constant watchfulness of her mother were blessed by God to her recovery. It was on November 30th, 1880, that the incident occurred, and now among Esther's most treasured possessions is the silver medal presented to her in commemoration of her heroism.

The qualities Esther displayed in that crisis are the qualities every Christian ought to strive after. How many a soul, drifting away on the tide of sin toward endless misery, might be rescued did we but hold them back and cry mightily to God to put forth His hand and save them. Many would do this if a life were at stake, but in the far more serious spiritual issue men are careless, and see the souls around them going to perdition, yet put forth no effort to save them.

FETTERS OF FASHION.

By Miss M. A. Paull,

Rescue and Reward.

THE great object came nearer, and nearer, and nearer. It snorted, then roared with fierce delight, and the horrid sounds terrified Mrs. Sylvester. Screaming and crying piteously, she fell fainting upon the ground. Clarie was already rushing on, and at some distance when her mother fell. Too frightened to know perfectly what she was doing in thus abandoning her mother and sister to their fate, she rushed along in the moonlight toward the town. The first person she met was her uncle's new assistant Mr. Beverley.

"Help, help, Mr. Beverley!" she sobbed.

"What is the matter?" he asked, alarmed at her appearance.

"Mamma and Loo are being tossed and almost killed by a wild bull in the field behind this. Oh, for pity's sake, do something to save them! I dare not turn back. I know I am a miserable coward!"

"Louise!" he exclaimed, passionately; "Louise in danger? Tell every man you meet to come to me; I will pay him well. Be quick to summon help, or it may be too late to save any of us," and he rushed on.

The moonlight revealed an awful sight. Mrs. Sylvester lay on the ground. The fierce animal stood only a few paces off, snorting, and lowering its head preparatory to the fatal toss. Between her mother and the animal, prepared herself to receive the attack, and thus save a life dearer to her than her own, stood the heroic Louise, her face white and wan in the moonlight—almost as the face of the dead.

Should he dare risk a personal encounter with that angry bull? How else could he save her, even for a few moments, till help might come? He hesitated only for a moment, for he saw the great head bent low to catch the delicate form of Louise Sylvester upon those cruel horns. Shouting, and brandishing his stick with all his might, he rushed suddenly forward.

For a moment the beast was arrested in his purpose, and in that moment, Louise, obeying his directions, changed her position.

"Hasten away, darling!" said Mr. Beverley, wholly unable to restrain the loving word in this moment of supreme peril.

"I cannot leave you and my mother to perish," answered Louise; "we will at least all die together."

How he did it, Beverley Trevelyan never knew, but standing firmly there, with his upraised stick before it, he fastened his eyes on the wild eyes of the bull; and the animal seemed unable to move. In a short time the fascination relaxed. With an awful roar, that turned the blood of Louise Sylvester cold, the exasperated, and hitherto baffled creature, rushed at the young man and tossed him into the air as if he had been a feather. He fell heavily at the feet of the anguish-stricken girl, stunned and bleeding. Help had come now. A party of men, with ropes and cords, secured the animal, and led it away, tightly bound, to the farm from which it had escaped. Others brought a stretcher and a surgeon to convey Mr. Beverley to the house of Reginald Courtenay; while Mrs. Sylvester was recovered from her swoon, and assisted home.

Strange to say, Mr. Beverley's bones were not broken; but he was fearfully bruised, so that he could hardly bear to be touched; and there was an ugly wound in one shoulder where the horn of the bull had penetrated. Louise nursed him with perfect devotion. It was terrible to her to know how much suffering she had unintentionally caused him.

"I always feel I ought to have been tossed instead of you, Mr. Beverley," she said; "I owe my life to you." She spoke thus the first day he had felt sufficiently well to leave his bed for the sofa.

"Are you quite sure of that, Louise," he asked, taking her hand in his; "I think I shall remember that one day."

Louise colored deeply, but made no other answer.

"It would have been so much nicer if it had been a gentleman, and not a mere shopman, who rescued us," remarked Mrs. Sylvester a few days afterward, when Louise had looked in for awhile to see her mother and sisters. "I hope, my dear, you are very careful to maintain your true position, however kindly you may feel it right to act, in superintending his nursing."

"Mr. Beverley is a gentleman, mamma," replied Louise, "if courage and nobility of heart make up your idea of a gentleman; as they do of mine."

"Whatever else you do, Louise, as you love me, don't suffer yourself to fall in love with a shopman," said her mother. "I will frankly admit that we are amazingly indebted to him, and that he is the most gentlemanly man of his class I ever met with; but yet, he is in trade. Don't disgrace us all, dear. Remember your father's station. An officer must always rank before a tradesman."

"Why, mamma?" asked Loo, quietly.

"Because he is above him, my dear."

"Officer or no officer, there is not a braver man in the world than Mr. Beverley. Mamma, I think you ought to remember if he hadn't been brave, both you and I would have been dead now."

It was disagreeable to be told this; but as it was probably the truth, Mrs. Sylvester only said, "Well, dear, remember the hint I have given you."

Next day, that lady received a note requesting permission to call upon her. It was signed "Beverley," simply.

"What an extraordinarily impertinent man!" she exclaimed, as she showed her three daughters the note, and consulted them about it. "He is only a shopman, and he signs his precious epistle as if he were a duke or an earl. These lower orders have such queer notions, but we owe him some consideration; so I must allow him to call, I suppose, and receive our thanks—that is what he wants."

Mr. Beverley looked very handsome, though still rather pale and weak from his accident, as he entered Mrs. Sylvester's boudoir, to which he was graciously admitted. Breakfast-room was its more fitting appellation, but "boudoir" sounded more fashionable. Mr. Beverley was come to ask the permission of Louise Syvester's mother to the marriage of himself and her daughter.

"You will not refuse, madam, when you know we love each other," he said courteously. "The great peril of that terrible night revealed to each of us the state of our hearts."

"I cannot possibly consent to it," said Mrs. Sylvester, doggedly; "trade is beneath our family. If my daughters choose to ally themselves with it, they must not expect my sanction. I will not openly disown her, your prowess must be my excuse to my friends for not doing so; but the poor child has shown her gratitude in a singularly inappropriate fashion. Of course, her crotchetty uncle approves your design?"

Beverley Trevelyan bit his lip, as the hot blood rushed into his cheeks; but he controlled himself, and answered, "Yes, madam, in your language; in mine, he sanctions and approves our union." He paused, then added, "Will her sisters deign to come to our wedding?"

"Certainly not."

"Surely you will give them the choice of acceptance or refusal, madam," the young man's tone was as proud as her own, and Mrs. Sylvester yielded.

Clarie and Patty begged hard to be allowed to go; their mother would neither consent nor forbid, and the sisters, save Fanny, decided to be at the wedding. A month later, Mr. Hollins, the curate, officiated at the marriage, by special license, of Lord Beverley Trevelyan and Louise Sylvester. The secret had been so well kept, that the rank of the bridegroom did not become known until the wedding morning. Then, too late for her to make an excuse and take part in the festivities, Mrs. Sylvester had the mortification to discover that the fetters of fashion often bind us to our own hurt, and that a real lord may feel it his highest wisdom to serve behind a counter, and not damage, but repair his escutcheon, by so doing.

Many years have passed away since the marriage, over which the gossips had such a merry time of it in the pleasant Devonshire town. Chestnut Hall, the favorite seat of Lord and Lady Trevelyan, is full of childish mirth and the gay music of children's voices. There are splendid apartments in the old mansion—rooms fitted for high days and holidays, rooms gorgeously draped and richly furnished, suitable for honored guests; there are servants' halls, and lofty nurseries, and a dining-room where a hundred might sit down in comfort, and drawing-rooms where elegance and taste and refinement are breathed in the very atmosphere.

A whole suite of rooms, forming one wing of the house, has been generously devoted by its master to the use of the wholly undeserving but forgiven Mrs. Sylvester and her two daughters, Fanny and Clarie. Patty has had the good sense to volunteer to take the place of her youngest sister in her uncle's less pretentious, but comfortable home. But in all that spacious residence, Chestnut Hall, there is no room more hallowed by fond associations than a small, unpretending apartment—a little parlor, to which Louise has given the name of the "Home Room." Here no disturbing guest enters unexpectedly, no servant intrudes without being sent for; here the master and mistress take leave of empty ceremony, bid adieu to fashion, and welcome the sweetest and most simple joys of home.

Husband and wife are here so perfectly happy in each other's society, that they are reluctant often to remember the claims of their high position, here they delight to sit alone, as free from restraint and intrusion as if Beverley Trevelyan had indeed been merely the tradesman's assistant his mother-in-law had once imagined him, or the gentleman of almost ruined fortune which Louise believed when she first learned to love him.

Here, seated by the fire in his cosey arm-chair, with the sweet eyes of Louise fondly watching him and their children, Lord Trevelyan feels a joy which none of the costliest amusements for which he risked life and health ever afforded him. Here Louise knows a glad outpouring of happy wife and mother love in her heart as she regards with pride her greatest treasures; her husband and her little ones.

Reginald, their first-born son and heir, stands at his father's side; loving little Loo tries anxiously to put on papa's slippers; Alice with sisterly anxiety superintends the display of little Beverley's new picture book to papa's criticism, and little Beverley himself, the baby student, is intent upon his favorite picture in his treasured volume.

The daylight fades over the old Hall; the bare trees of the avenue stand solemn and still in the winter twilight; but in the Home Room the ruddy firelight gleams and glows, bathing all things in its red splendor, and Lord Trevelyan stretches his hands to its pleasant warmth.

"Now, dear," says Reginald to his little brother, speaking to him over his father's shoulder, "get on papa's knee, and we'll ask him to tell us again the story of that horrid old bull. It's the best story ever made, I think, and besides it's real; and oh! just think, girls," adds Reginald, with a horror-inspiring shudder, "if it hadn't been for papa, then, mamma wouldn't have been our mamma at all. I am so glad papa managed it so well; I'm glad my father is a brave man."

"That was only one kind of bravery," said Lord Trevelyan.

"Nay but, dearest," interrupted Louise, "our boy is right; you are a brave man; you have proved it in every way, for he who has courage to face an angry bull, and to break through fetters of fashion, and to conquer his own besetting sin, may surely be reckoned a brave man. But now we must leave the quiet comfort of our Home Room; for do you all forget that this is our little Beverley's birthday, and the school-children are to make merry in the hall; and what will they say if we do not soon show ourselves?"

She glanced at her watch, and then taking the little fellow by the hand, with a merry song upon her lips, she ran through the long passages and corridors forward to the great hall of the mansion, where the fire blazed upon the open hearth, and tables were spread, and lights gleamed, and dozens of the young invited guests awaited their coming anxiously, awed somewhat by the unwonted splendor around them.

Ancient suits of armor hung upon the wall, catching the firelight on their burnished steel, never to be worn henceforth, and, useless now, save as quaint ornaments for spacious rooms.

And soon, with the home-like clattering of cups and saucers, and the commonplace demolishing of cakes and fruit, the children's awe was exchanged for happy freedom and hearty enjoyment.

Mrs. Sylvester and her daughters, all in their element as the fashionable dignitaries and patronesses of this assembly of little ones, graciously moved here and there, the fetters of fashion still binding and limiting the freedom of their lives; and deigned complacently to notice a pretty child with approval.

But the Lord and Lady of the mansion, and the feast, and the children they loved to train in the exercise of charity of heart rather than of purse merely, mingled unrestrainedly among them all, and paused longest by the plainest and most poorly clad children on purpose to comfort them.

And the after glow of peace in their own hearts was sweeter than all earthly approval, for it was the reflex of that love which said, "Whosoever shall receive one of such children in my name receiveth me."

THE END.

SAUL PREACHING CHRIST.

S. S. Lesson for April 22, Acts 9 : 19–31. Golden Text, 1 Cor. 2 : 2. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Saul's New Endowment—New Perceptions—The Effect of Personal Testimony—The Convert Persecuted—A Foiled Plot—His Preaching Becoming Famous—Strange Silence of Christians—The Bondage of Men—Inexplicable Fear of the Disciples—Barnabas Vouches for Saul—Rest after Persecution—Marks of Health and Prosperity.

After Saul of Tarsus had made an open confession of Christ by being baptized, he began to eat again, and "was strengthened." And there, in the very city which he had proposed to make the scene of murderous persecution of Christians, "straightway he preached Christ in the synagogues that He is the Son of God." When Ananias laid hands on him, he said, "that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost." Saul filled with the Holy Ghost saw by the

which the presence of the Holy Ghost created within him, that the whole of the Scriptures were lit up with Christ. The sacrifices and the ceremonies of the law all shone out to him with a new light, the types all spoke out to him of their great Antitype. Melchizedek was the type of Jesus (Heb. 6 : 20 ; 7 : 21) ; the tabernacle was "an example and shadow of heavenly things" (Heb. 8 : 5), and "a figure for the time then present" (Heb. 9 : 9) ; "the blood of bulls and goats," which could not take away sin was a figure of the blood of Christ, which can purge our conscience from dead works to serve the living God (Heb. 10 : 4 ; 9 : 14) ; the veil of the temple, rent at the death of Jesus, was a type of His flesh, His body broken for us (Heb. 10 : 20). No wonder that in this light Paul, versed as he was in the Scriptures, preached with a power which stirred Damascus.

Probably personal testimony was the first thing which moved the people, for "all that heard him were amazed, and said, Is not this he that destroyed them which called on His name in Jerusalem, and came hither for that intent, that he might bring them bound unto the chief priests?" But as he became more at ease in testifying for Jesus, and more conscious that God was bearing him up, "Saul increased the more in strength, and confounded the Jews which dwelt at Damascus, proving that this is very Christ."

How long Saul continued at Damascus seems uncertain ; it was probably some length of time, some months at least. It is not easy to ascertain with certainty whether his journey to Arabia was in the early part of his sojourn in Damascus, and whether the persecution of the Jews was on his return about three years after his conversion, when he went up to Jerusalem, or whether he remained a considerable part of those three years in Damascus, and on being persecuted, went at once into Arabia, and there, after another short sojourn in Damascus, went up to Jerusalem. In any case he was persecuted ; from the very first his preaching was owned of God in such a way that his hearers could not remain in the state in which they were.

"After that many days were fulfilled, the Jews took counsel to kill him ; but their laying await was known of Saul. And they watched the gates day and night to kill him. Then the disciples took him by night, and let him down by the wall, in a basket." One thing more we are told of this time, previous to his visit to Jerusalem, that the churches of Judea who did not know his face "had heard only that he which persecuted us in times past, now preacheth the faith which once he destroyed." Thus we know that from the first, whether in Damascus, in Arabia, or on his journeys, Paul preached Jesus, and men heard of him who had never known him, because his preaching was such as to make men talk, for it moved hearts and consciences; like his Lord

"HIS WORD WAS WITH POWER."

How can it be otherwise when a man is really converted to God? If in very deed he has passed from death unto life (John 5 : 24) from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God (Acts 26 : 18), if he knows his sins forgiven, and that he has an inheritance in heaven, if he tastes the sweetness of real communion with God, if he knows the power of God's deliverance in the time of trials and temptation, he must be more than base if he fails to recognize that it is due to the Saviour who died for him, and it is due to his unsaved fellow-creatures who are on their way to ruin, that he should bear witness of God's great salvation. When his spiritual instincts are not strong enough to impel him to this, he has little acquaintance with the constraining love of Christ, and the power of the Holy Ghost..

It is sadly strange that when men have come across a physician who has discovered some new remedy, and has succeeded under God in effecting the cure of many sick people, they are ready to tell forth to the world what has been done for them. When men have reaped some temporal benefit in the way of food, clothing, business, or even amusement, they are ready to recommend it to others ; and yet we find hundreds and thousands of professing Christians who have

NOT A WORD TO SAY FOR JESUS!

Why is this? They have not really yielded themselves up to Him, they are only half converted, Jesus is not all to them, they have never allowed Him to have full possession, the zeal of God's house does not consume them. Alas! we shall find, when the secrets of all hearts are made known, thousands upon thousands of those who have passed for Christians, and have looked upon themselves as such, who will not pass current with God ; and thousands of those who have been little known, and overlooked by the world, yet whose whole life as well as words have spoken Jesus, will be found at last His best and truest children.

Saul, having been once brought into a real relation to God, became immediately free from man, "When it pleased God, who . . . called me by His grace, to reveal His Son in me, that I might preach Him among the heathen ; immediately I conferred not with flesh and blood ; neither went I up to Jerusalem to them which were apostles before me ; but I went into Arabia, and returned again unto Damascus" (Gal. 1 : 15–17). Well might he write afterward, "Ye are bought with a price ; be ye not the servants of men" (1 Cor. 7 : 23). Now we do become the servants of men if we allow the influence of relations or acquaintances to hinder us from a whole-hearted surrender to God. We may think that they expect of us a certain style in our house, which may mean some hundreds a year spent upon it. We know it is a current idea that a man's position is maintained by the size of his house, and the cost of furniture, the keeping up of his garden, the number of his servants, the dress of his wife and children. Oh, if God has called us to forsake all for Him, let us break loose from and simply follow Jesus. Saul did not so much as seek counsel from men filled with the Holy Ghost, God was with him, he had no will but to serve Him, he knew His voice, and it was enough.

When he did go to Jerusalem, he essayed to join himself to the disciples ; but they were all afraid of him (even Peter and John), and believed not that he was a disciple. How was this, that Peter who read the lie of Ananias by the power of the Spirit, and discovered the treachery of Simon the sorcerer, how was it that he could not recognize in Saul of Tarsus the same Holy Ghost which was in himself? we know not. "But Barnabas, the gentle, loving man (the son of consolation, Acts 4 : 36) took him and brought him to the apostles, and declared unto them how he had seen the Lord in the way, and that he had spoken to him, and how he had preached boldly at Damascus in the name of Jesus." This sufficed, and Saul was with them coming in and going out at Jerusalem. But there also the weight of his words was felt ; "he spake boldly in the name of the Lord Jesus, and disputed against the (Grecian) Jews, see Rev. Ver. : but they went about to slay him."

It is always so ; when the Word of God comes with power, the hearers are pushed to a decision ; they must do something, yield and be converted, or turn fully against the instrument whom God has used to show them when they were wrong. It never leaves men as it finds them. A powerless ministry comes of a divided heart. Paul says, "We are unto God a sweet savor of Christ in them that are saved and in them that perish ; to the one we are the savor of death unto death ; and to the other the savor of life unto life" (2 Cor. 2 : 16) ; but one or the other we surely are if we are living in the power of God. It stands to reason that if God speaks through us, something must happen ; if God is really with us, God in us will be seen and felt in us by our hearers ; and God's word shall not return unto Him void. It was the command of Jesus, "When they persecute you in this city, flee ye unto another" (Matt. 10 : 23), and accordingly when the Jerusalem brethren knew how the Grecian Jews had determined to slay Saul, "they brought him down to Cæsarea and sent him forth to Tarsus."

The Lord graciously so orders it that times of persecution are succeeded by times of rest. "Then had the churches rest throughout all Judea and Galilee and Samaria and were edified ; and walking in the fear of the Lord, and in the comfort of the Holy Ghost, were multiplied." Edified, comforted, multiplied ; blessed marks of health and prosperity! First edified or built up ; the Lord was teaching them, giving them a knowledge of Himself through the Scriptures interpreted by men of God full of the Spirit ; a knowledge which these first disciples must have put continually to the proof ; for knowledge without practice "puffeth up," and only love buildeth up or edifieth (1 Cor. 8 : 1). And then the sure marks of a prosperous church were present, they walked in the fear of God, God was first in everything, in business, in conversation, in home or in church life.

GOD TOOK THE FIRST PLACE, and thus could impart to them the comfort of the Holy Ghost. And the peace and love and sweetness and joy of these disciples could not but tell upon those around them ; they were multiplied, their numbers continually added to. Perhaps some of those very Grecian Jews who were convinced against their will under the searching, powerful Bible teachings of Saul, were gathered in and won to Jesus, by the life and spirit of love in these His followers. This time of rest was but a breathing time before persecution revived ; like a calm, clear, lovely sunset coming in between two days of tempest. The Lord teach us to look for results of our ministry whether by fearless, uncompromising preaching like Saul's, or by a Christlike character such as that of the early church, and never to rest unless we are seeing souls saved and blessed.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The General Restlessness and Uncertainty of Europe is the most prominent characteristic of the intelligence brought by cable last week. The New York Herald in summing up the condition of affairs remarks: "The signs of the times are those that were seen in 1848. The revolution, wholly unexpected, swept in that year over every nation in Europe. Emperors fled and thrones went down. Young Ireland and the Chartists rose in England. Cavaignac fought the Reds in the streets of Paris. Italy and Spain were convulsed; the avalanche rolled into peaceful Switzerland. If the next popular movement is at hand it is likely, as of old, to begin in France. There are all the dangerous symptoms in the Third Republic which preceded the overthrow of Louis Philippe." A similar survey by the Sun leads the editor to a similar conclusion. He says: "In a word, it is not a political war for the restoration of old national boundaries which is feared at the present juncture by the neighbors of France. It is rather a social revolution, aiming at the obliteration of all boundaries and the reconstruction of human society all over Europe on the principle of a common ownership of capital and land." While secular journalists looking from their standpoint at the signs of the times see reason to dread an outbreak of revolutionary lawlessness ending in anarchy, the student of the Word of God learns from the sure word of prophecy that the world is on the eve of just such a time of anarchy and bloodshed.

A Mine Connecting with the Kremlin where the coronation of the Czar is to take place, has been found. The Frankfort Gazette has a telegram from Moscow giving the startling announcement that a large mine has been discovered connecting with the Kremlin. The telegram also states that a request has been wired to St. Petersburg for one hundred sappers, to be sent at once to Moscow for the purpose of destroying the mine. Another telegram says: "Developments of the utmost importance are expected in connection with the forthcoming great trial of nihilists in this city. It was originally believed that this trial would be the last of its kind on the list. Recent arrests have, however, made other nihilist trials probable, and it is the present intention to arraign the newly discovered plotters either before the coronation of the Czar, which will occur in May or June, or directly after that event. The accused have, with three exceptions, already pleaded guilty of belonging to the party which, they assert, is in fact as well as in name, 'The Will of the People.'"

A Panic was Caused Throughout England on April 5th by the announcement that the police had discovered in Birmingham a dynamite factory in which were stored explosives in large quantities, and of a most deadly potency. It was stated that in the one factory there was sufficient dynamite to destroy the whole of London. The apparatus for preparing and mixing the explosive compounds was constructed on scientific principles, and with all the cunning craft which clearly showed its inventor to be not only a thorough scholar in chemistry and machinery, but also an adept in expedients for avoiding notoriety and preventing discovery. Among the noteworthy features of the place was a shrewdly devised method for carrying the fumes up the chimney and consuming the odors. The police assert that they have evidence that the Birmingham factory is only one of a series extending through all the great cities of the empire. The guards at the Houses of Parliament, the residences of the Cabinet, the Queen's palaces, and the public buildings were promptly doubled, as it was learned that men had been seen leaving the Birmingham depot for Windsor and London.

An Important Arrest, Which Probably Prevented the perpetration of a terrible crime, was made by the London police on April 5th. A man carrying a package which excited suspicion, was followed from Manchester to London, and was there arrested. In his lodgings 150 pounds of a highly explosive liquid were discovered. Two other arrests were made the same day in London, and in both cases the same explosive liquid was found in the lodgings the prisoners occupied. The prisoners have all been remanded to avoid the publication of the evidence the police have collected. Several more persons are being sought by the authorities, who believe that the captured men were only the instruments of more astute and dangerous men still at large. The connection of all the prisoners with the Irish in America has been traced.

The French Movement on the Congo, Like her unprovoked hostility to Madagascar has aroused public feeling in Great Britain. On April 3d Mr. Jacob Bright, the brother of Rt. Hon. John Bright, introduced a motion in the House of Commons, declaring that in the interest of the growing commerce of Great Britain in the southwest of Africa no treaty should be made by the government sanctioning the annexation by any European Power of territories on and adjacent to the Congo, or interfering with the commercial freedom hitherto enjoyed in that region by Great Britain. A debate ensued, and Mr. Bright withdrew his motion in favor of one which the House formally adopted, to the effect that no treaty should be made affecting the territory on the Congo that would not afford adequate securities to all agencies working there.

The Thanks of the German Reichstag to America for sympathy and aid to the sufferers in the floods have been enthusiastically expressed. On April 3d the President in his opening address stated that during the recess of the Chamber a large number of donations for the relief of the flood sufferers along the Rhine had been received. Most of them, he said, had come from America. The House adopted a resolution expressing, in the name of the nation, its most heartfelt thanks to those who had so generously responded to the appeals for assistance.

Arabi Pasha Appears to be Reconciled to his exile, and doubtless is grimly amused at the trouble England appears likely to undergo by her intervention in Egypt. He intends, it is said, to study English, and to have his children, even the girls, educated at the English school in Ceylon—the place of his exile. On his being warned that the Christian religion was taught at such institutions, he declared the entire willingness of himself and his colleagues that their daughters should be instructed in Christianity, which, he said, was in itself a good thing, and he expressed his conviction that as their children were well grounded in the Koran, it was impossible they could become Christians at heart. God was good, and they fully relied on the virtues and power of the Koran to keep them in the true faith, but "educated they must and should be."

Troubles in the Transvaal are Becoming more and more grave; and every report which comes from the country testifies to the deplorable condition of affairs. The whole country near the border is in a state of anarchy, and the natives are everywhere taking up arms against the Boers. The native chief, Mapoch, has inflicted a heavy defeat upon them, and upon the South-west Border, Montsoia and Moshette have entered into an alliance to drive back the invasion of Boers from the Transvaal, who they complain ravage their countries and drive off their cattle.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey Concluded Their two weeks' campaign at Manchester on March 15th, and to the very last the meetings were crowded, and there were "showers of blessing." At one of the Bible-readings, in the Free Trade Hall, the Bishop of Manchester and Mrs. Fraser occupied seats upon the platform. At Birmingham a service of thanksgiving for the result of the recent mission of Messrs. Moody and Sankey was held recently. Rev. R. W. Dale, who is well known here, presided. He said it was fitting at times that they should look around upon those who had been brought home to God and received the gift of immortal life through Jesus Christ. When the prodigal came home the house was filled with music and dancing, and there were times when the Christian Church should let itself go on strong currents of thanksgiving and of praise. It might be too early as yet to speak with confidence of the effect of the recent services upon the life of the Christian churches in the town, but looking back to those that were held eight years ago, he could bear testimony that long after the services were brought to a close, there were large numbers of Christian people whose faith was more vigorous, the fervor of whose devotion was more intense, whose hearts were touched with a new pity for the lost, and with a new eagerness to save them, and restore them to God. He confidently hoped they would see the same happy results following from the services on which they were now looking back. Messrs. Moody and Sankey commenced a mission at Leeds on March 16th.

The Need of Christian Work in Russia is earnestly presented by Dr. Baedeker, who having labored in that country is now pressing its claims on the Christian churches of Europe. At a large meeting in the rooms of the London Y. M. C. A. Dr. Baedeker, spoke of the growing power of the Germans in the towns of Russia, of the zeal shown by the German Baptists, of the wretched condition of the Jews in the villages allotted them, of the blessing he received among the people in the Baltic provinces, and said that everywhere there is a desire to get the Gospel. Dr. Baedeker also told how the friends of religious freedom are hindered and hampered by the chief of the Russian Church in St. Petersburg, and how much reason there is for prayer that God would sustain those tried disciples.

An Important Demonstration of Physicians and surgeons on the subject of total abstinence took place in London on March 9th, when several medical gentlemen spoke strongly in favor of the practice of total abstinence from intoxicating drinks. Dr. Norman Kerr, who presided, said the idea of moderate drinking being beneficial was a fallacy, as intoxicating liquor recruited neither bodily nor mental strength. There were present some members of a medical association consisting of 280 medical men, not one of whom was ashamed to own that he was out and out a teetotaller. (Cheers.) Chemistry taught that intoxicating liquors were simply a mixture of an irritant narcotic poison, and physiology showed that such drinks supplied no natural want of the body or brain, but were indulged in as a matter of habit or acquired taste. Pathology, which was the science of disease, further showed that intoxicating liquors had an irritating and narcotic action on the body and brain, deadening the higher intelligence of man. He was one of those who believed, however, that alcoholic liquor was sometimes useful, though not often, in the treatment of disease, but it was so dangerous a remedy that it should never be administered except with extreme caution under a careful physician. Dr. Alfred Carpenter, the eminent physiologist, whose works are widely read in this country, said that alcohol was not a necessary of life, but a dangerous poison.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

If any ask why the name of Peter Cooper occupies so prominent a place on the roll of American worthies, and why men of all creeds, all sections of the political world and all professions, agree in honoring a man who never emerged from the ranks of private citizens, the answer is plain and simple; he delighted in doing good to his fellow-men, and he consecrated his time, his energies, and his wealth to the cause of poor and struggling humanity. He knew the hard road the poor have to travel, he knew how the boy is weighted in the race of life who cannot obtain an education; he sympathized with such youths, having had better experience of their lot, and instead of hoarding his gains he distributed them lavishly that those who came after him might enjoy advantages denied to himself. All this he did heartily and ungrudgingly, and he proved the faithfulness of God to His promise: "He that hateth covetousness shall prolong his days" (Prov. 28: 16). Peter Cooper has gone to his grave in his ninety-third year, having in his early days sought wisdom, and in his latter days furnished an illustration of the truth that in "her right hand is length of days and in her left hand riches and honor" (Prov. 3: 16).

Two monuments will suffice to perpetuate his memory, whether his fellow-citizens erect another or not. The Institute he founded, firmly built and fire-proof, thorough in all its details, will stand to speak of his goodness to all who look upon it; and he will have that which he cared for more than scultpured memorial, a lasting monument in the loving, grateful affection of those who, through his benefaction, are helped in their struggle through this hard, pitiless world. Those two memorials will make the name of Peter Cooper an honored one long after titled names and the names of kings and emperors have passed into the lumber room of history.

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

Early in 1791, there was living on the spot now covered by Water Street, New York, a poor hatter who, in spite of abundant energy and enterprise, somehow failed in every pursuit he entered. His wife was the daughter of John Campbell, a Scotchman, who kept a pot-bakery on the place where St. Paul's Church now stands. She had been educated among the Moravians in Pennsylvania, where her moral nature was developed and strengthened. She has been described as a person in whom there was a rare blending of sweetness and fire, of force and tenderness. Mr. Campbell was an enthusiastic adherent of Washington, and fought in the revolutionary army, attaining the rank of deputy quartermaster-general. He narrowly escaped capture when the British occupied the city. He married his daughter to his comrade in arms, Lieutenant Cooper, who at the close of the war commenced the trade of hat-making and selling near the East River.

Four children had already blessed this union in 1791, when on February 12th, a fifth was born. Those were hard times, and at home and abroad there was trouble and trial for the poor, and anxiety and apprehension for the rich and great. Washington had just commenced his second term as President of the United States, George III. and his famous minister, Pitt, were ruling England, and France was undergoing the premonitory throes of that revolution, the mention of which still sends a thrill of horror through the world.

The hatter was poor; it was with difficulty his young family could be supplied with the necessaries of life. He was a Methodist, and seems to have been of an imaginative temperament, for dwelling on the circumstance of his boy's birth, he seemed to see an angelic vision and to hear a voice bidding him name the new-born infant, Peter, after the great apostle. He obeyed, believing that "the boy would come to something," and Peter Cooper was duly designated among the citizens of New York. There were only 27,000 inhabitants of the city at that time, and it had not been long since there was a stockade standing, which had been built to keep out the Indians.

There could be no idle hands in the Cooper household, and Peter was therefore early taught

THE FIRST OF THE SIX TRADES

he learned and never forgot. After he had reached his third year his father removed to Duane Street and Broadway, with his little hat store, and as soon as the son was old enough to do any work he was employed in the business with the other children. His first work was pulling hair and cutting fur. The advantages of school were denied him. In all his life he only went every other day for a single year. But the father became dissatisfied with his business. He was fond of a country life, and finally sold out to his eldest son, and removed to Peekskill, where he opened a country store. Later than this he began the brewing of ale. The son's share in the business was to deliver the kegs to customers. This venture was not a success either, and Mr. Cooper then tried the combination of making bricks and hats at Catskill, where the boy worked hard in the brick-yard, learning the trade as he had that of hat-making, thus becoming acquainted with two trades before he was well in his teens. The hat store was afterward removed to Brooklyn; and not long after this the family went to Newburg, and the father opened another brewery. Here the son remained until he was seventeen years of age. He had accumulated ten dollars of his own money, and one day coming to New York he invested it in a lottery and lost it all. Late in life he often alluded to this experience as being an excellent lesson, worth more to him than it cost.

Peter had an object in coming to New York. He was seventeen years old, and was anxious to make some progress independently of his father. He applied for work, going almost everywhere in search of a position, but having great difficulty in finding one. At last, after days of effort, he found owned by Burtis & Woodward, and situated at Chambers Street and Broadway, where the building formerly used as a wholesale store by A. T. Stewart & Co., now stands. Burtis & Woodward were willing to accept his services if he would remain until he should be of age for twenty-five dollars a year and his board. The offer was accepted at once. Peter set himself to work with characteristic energy, and was soon master of every detail of the business. All day he worked in the shop, and at night he worked at the carving of the carriage panels and any other employment of a like character by which he could earn a few extra dollars.

Here, too, the inventive genius which characterized him through life was first displayed. He invented an apparatus for making hubs, by which his employers profited considerably. So highly did the firm esteem their apprentice, that when his term expired, and he was determined on leaving their employ, they offered to set him up in business and furnish him with capital, to be repaid at his convenience. But Peter Cooper had a wholesome and declined the tempting offer. Seventy years afterward, speaking of this circumstance, Mr. Cooper said: "When I was twenty-one years old my employer offered to build me a shop and set me up in business, but as I always had a horror of being burdened with debt, and having no capital of my own, I declined his kind offer. He himself became a bankrupt. I have made it a rule to pay everything as I go. If, in the course of business, anything is due from me to any one, and the money is not called for, I make it my business on the last Saturday before Christmas to take it to his business place."

The result of Mr. Cooper's decision justified his sagacity, for when the war with Great Britain broke out the demand for carriages ceased, and the venture would have been disastrous. Still anxious to learn, the young man went to Hempstead, Long Island, where he worked for two years in a woollen factory at a $1.50 per day. There he made his second invention. It was a machine for shearing nap from cloth, and was on the same principle as that subsequently adopted in the lawn mower. It was patented and had a rapid sale at the time of the war, when woollen cloths were in great demand. When Mr. Cooper, elated at his prosperity, had accumulated $500, he went one day to Newburg and found his parents in affliction from inability to pay their debts. He was deeply distressed by the spectacle, and thinking nothing of the advantages of having a little capital of his own, he put his hand in his pocket where lay his $500, and GAVE IT ALL AWAY.

He then became surety for the debts which were not yet matured, and continued the manufacture of his machines, so that he was able to save his father from bankruptcy. He still remained at Hempstead. There, the following year, he met his future wife, Miss Sarah Bedel. Their took place in December, 1813, when Mr. Cooper was twenty-two years old and Miss Bedel a year younger. He is said to have given as one of his reasons for marrying young the belief that more money could be saved by a husband and wife than by a bachelor. Although the belief was doubtless justified, the saving of money was a most inconsiderable benefit compared to others derived from the union. Perfect sympathy existed between the husband and wife. Mrs. Cooper is described as a woman of superior moral qualities, great helpfulness and discriminating charity. Mr. Cooper ascribed to her his happiness and most of his success in life. Before his fortune was assured, and while he was struggling to establish himself, her steady faith and advice were of great assistance to him. Her name appears with his in the deed of trust of the Cooper Institute. Their married life lasted fifty-six years, Mrs. Cooper dying on the anniversary of her wedding day, in December, 1869, in the seventy-seventh year of her age. Her death affected Mr. Cooper seriously. He never spoke of her without emotion, and referred to her as the "day-star, the solace and inspiration" of his life.

An incident of his early married life, as characteristic of the man, deserves mention. It is that of an invention contrived soon after the birth of his first child for

ROCKING THE CRADLE BY MACHINERY.

Mr. Cooper often spoke of this contrivance in later years. He said: "In early life, when I was first married, I found it necessary to rock the cradle while my wife prepared our frugal meal. This was not always convenient in my busy life, and I conceived the idea of making a cradle which would be made to rock by a mechanism. I did so, and enlarging upon my first idea, I arranged the mechanism for keeping off the flies and playing a music-box for the amusement of the baby. The cradle was bought of me afterward by a delighted pedler, who gave me his whole stock in trade for the exchange and the right of selling the patent in the State of Connecticut."

He was, however, irresistibly attracted to New York as the place best adapted to his need, and selling his house and lot at Hempstead he returned to the city and opened a grocery store at the Bowery and Rivington Street. He only remained there one year, and then bought the unexpired lease for nineteen years of the ground and frame buildings, where the Bible House now stands. There he made a conspicuous success. His business grew, and he would doubtless have made a fortune by it, had not the suggestion of a friend led him to commence manufacture. One day John Vreeland, a man then well known throughout the city as a hardware merchant at Broadway and Ann Street, of whom Mr. Cooper had purchased tools while in the carriage factory as an apprentice and afterward while making furniture on Long Island, accosted him while he was standing in the doorway of his store, and said: "By the way, Mr. Cooper, I know a good chance for you. I heard this morning that the glue factory on the Middle Road is for sale. It's a good thing, but has been badly managed, and of course don't pay." This factory was a large structure and provided with means for doing an extensive business. Mr. Cooper listened to the suggestions of his friend, and said he would think of them. The next day found him at the factory in conversation with the owner; terms of sale were discussed, and in less than an hour the factory was purchased by Mr. Cooper for cash, with a lease of the ground for twenty years.

The glue business was subsequently removed to Maspeth Avenue, Brooklyn, where a large factory was built. Thus in nine years Peter Cooper changed his business no less than six times. In doing so he cannot be charged with fickleness, for each change was one so evidently for the better that, as events proved, he would have been unwise to neglect the opportunity. In fact, the promptitude with which he seized the chance of improving his condition, and the facility with which he adapted himself to the new order of circumstances were striking proofs of his business capacity. After this change Peter Cooper remained steadfast. He engaged in other enterprises, but he continued the glue business to the end of his business career.

After the new factory had been in operation a year, it was destroyed by fire in a night. There was no insurance, and the loss was $40,000. To most men such a calamity would have been crushing, but to Mr. Cooper it only came as a call for energy and action. To the foreman who brought him the first news of the event Mr. Cooper said: "Go over at once, hire carts and set men to work carting away the rubbish. I will be over shortly with lumber for another building." In the new building, which was three times as large as the factory it replaced, the business has been carried on to the present day by Mr. Cooper's representatives.

Mr. Cooper soon became a wealthy man. In ten years from the commencement of the glue business the accumulated profits of his labors made a fortune, that in those days was considered enormous.

Mr. Cooper was now able to indulge of founding an educational institution for the free instruction of young men and women. So bitterly did he feel his own youthful deprivation that he resolved at the outset of his career that if ever he became rich he would do something for others situated as he had been. That resolve led to the founding of Cooper Union.

HIS LONG-CHERISHED DESIRE

In the course of a speech made by him at a reception of the Arcadian Club, Mr. Cooper thus described

THE ORIGIN OF COOPER UNION.

He said: "It happened so long ago—my election to the Common Council—that I really cannot tell what year it was—but I remember meeting a gentleman of the Board then who had just returned from France, and he was telling me what great advantage he derived from attending the Polytechnic Institute of Paris, an institution supported by the government. What interested me most deeply was his remark that he found hundreds of young men attending that institution living on a bare crust of bread a day to get the benefit of the lectures, and that representation brought home to me so forcibly my own wants when I was an apprentice and had no opportunities to get what I most wanted, that I determined then, if I should ever be able to get the means, I would try to supply the want for my native city; and the institution you have so kindly alluded to is the result of my labor in that direction."

In considering the question of a site for the building he proposed to erect, his mind reverted to the place where he had once kept a grocery store. It was central, and in the very neighborhood in which the class he desired to benefit might be found. Just below Eighth Street, where the Bowery divides into Third and Fourth Avenues, a plot of ground was secured, and in 1857 the foundation-stone was laid. Within the cavity in the stone a scroll was buried, on which Mr. Cooper thus explained the object he had in view: "The great object that I desire to accomplish by the erection of this Institution is to open the avenues of scientific knowledge to the youth of our city and country, and so unfold the volume of nature that the young may see the beauties of creation, enjoy its blessings, and learn to love the Author from whom cometh every good and perfect gift."

The erection of

occupied five years. It is composed of iron and brown stone and is fireproof. It is of massive Roman architecture, and its shape, as required by the direction of the streets which bound its four sides, is an irregular quadrangle. Its four sides measure respectively 90, 146, 165, and 195 feet. Its estimated cost was $350,000, but when it was completed it had cost exclusive of the site $630,000. To this amount Mr. Cooper added sums for special purposes, such as the formation of a museum, and finally gave $150,000 more as an endowment to maintain a free library and reading-room. The whole being handed over to trustees of which Mr. Cooper was President. In February, 1881, on his ninetieth birthday, he presented to the trustees receipts for $70,000, the cost of adding another story to the building, and a check for $30,000, the interest on which was to be used for defraying the increased expenses of the institution. On the same occasion he added $10,000 to the Golden Wedding Fund of $10,000, which he established on the occasion of his golden wedding, and the interest on which is given to institutions for aiding poor children. The yearly cost of the institution, about $50,000, is defrayed mostly from rents of stores and offices in the building, but sometimes when the expenses have been greater than the income, Mr. Cooper has paid the difference. The total expenditures since the institution was established, including its first cost, are $2,179,192.

Mr. Cooper devoted his principal attention to the management of the Institution, and personally superintended each department. The library contains nearly 20,000 volumes, and last year nearly seven hundred thousand persons availed themselves of its advantages. Of the other departments the following summary is published in the New York Tribune:

"There are seven

DEPARTMENTS OF INSTRUCTION.

The first and most largely attended is the evening school of art and science. The course of instruction is divided into two departments. In the first are taught algebra; plane, solid, descriptive and analytic geometry; plane and spherical trigonometry; theoretical and practical mechanics; natural philosophy; elementary, organic and analytic chemistry. In the Art Department are taught drawing in all its branches—architectural, mechanical, free-hand drawing, and drawing from cast and life; painting; modelling in clay. In these two departments there are employed twenty instructors for six nights of the week. During the term 2839 applicants were admitted to the classes."

In 1876 Mr. Cooper was induced by the Greenback party or the National Independent party, as it was called, to become its candidate for the Presidency. He had been prominent in his opposition to the redemption of specie payments, and had urged strongly by voice and pen the financial doctrines of the Greenback party. He was to the last firmly convinced that those doctrines were the best fitted to promote the interests of the poor. He knew that he could not be elected, and was reluctant to accept the nomination. Ultimately he yielded to the wishes of his friends. He received 81,737 votes in a total of 8,411,136, and he always claimed that he would have received a larger number but for the treachery of one of his professed supporters.

HABITS OF LATER LIFE.

In spite of his great age Mr. Cooper was accustomed to visit Cooper Union every day. He was an early riser, and having breakfasted and read the morning papers, it was his habit to enter his carriage at ten o'clock and drive to his beloved Institution. After an inspection and consultation, he would attend to other business in the city, returning home about five o'clock. A writer in the New York World in this connection mentions a characteristic of Mr. Cooper, which shows how the delight in giving was a luxury to him.

"Mr. Cooper's visits to his office in Burling Slip of late years were somewhat irregular. The burdens of the details of the business have long been borne on other shoulders than his, although when the time came for consultation and the determination of some question of moment, his counsel was never dispensed with. But, no matter at what time he visited his office, whether in the morning or the afternoon, whether every day in the week, or only at intervals of several days, he was sure to be greeted on his departure by a swarm of beggars. It was a mystery how they knew he was coming. It seemed as though they had a man always on guard to spread the news far and near, for he no sooner entered the office than the mendicants began to collect. Not a few were tramps, who, even reeking with alcohol, held out their hands for gifts. They swarmed to the front of the store and even invaded the premises. It was no use telling Mr. Cooper that they were idle and drunken. He would not relinquish his habit of giving something to every man every time. He did it in spite of his partners, and said it gave him pleasure." came to him suddenly after all. He had celebrated his ninety-second birthday, and though at that time he was suffering from a cold, no serious results were apprehended. It was not until Monday, April 2d, that he was confined to his room, and even then he was able to dress and converse with visitors. The following day, however, pneumonia was detected by his physicians, and it was noticed with alarm that the strength which had hitherto sustained him was failing. The writer before quoted thus describes the final scene: "He sank slowly but steadily. It was recognized by those about the dying man that the end was approaching. He himself felt it, and surrendered himself to the will of Providence with Christian resignation. The family gathered about the aged man's bed and were at his side when he breathed his last. Mr. and Mrs. Edward Cooper, Mr. and Mrs. Hewitt and their six children were there. The dying man was conscious of their presence. He spoke of his wishes and of the Institute to which he had given so much thought. Then he beckoned his daughter, Mrs. Hewitt, to his side, and in a voice hardly audible bade her his last farewell. Next he addressed himself to his son and again to the children. They could hardly hear him, and the tears of all were falling fast. Dr. Hull, standing beside the bedside, noticed the breathing of his patient becoming slower. Then it ceased. The measure of a good man's life work was filled—Peter Cooper was dead. He had passed away peacefully and, as he had lived, thoughtful of the welfare of his fellow-men to the last."

His decease cannot be better described than in his own words spoken some years previous to his death. "My experience of life," said he, "has not dimmed my hopes for humanity. My sun is not setting in clouds and darkness, but is going down cheerfully in a clear firmament, lighted up by the glory of God, who should always be venerated and loved as the infinite source and fountain of all light, life, power, wisdom and goodness."

HELPFULNESS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, April 15, 1883.

"Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ."—Gal. 6 : 2.

Every man for himself! If there be room for only one more passenger in the lifeboat, get in yourself. If there be a burden to lift, you supervise while others shoulder it. You be the digit while others are the ciphers on the right hand side—nothing in themselves but augmenting you. In opposition to that theory of selfishness Paul advances in my text the Gospel theory: "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ."

THE UNIVERSAL BURDEN.

Everybody has burdens. Sometimes they come down upon the shoulders, sometimes they come down upon the head, sometimes they come down upon the heart. Looking over this assembly, you all seem well and bright and easy; but each one has a burden to lift, and some of you have more than you can lift. Paul proposes to split up these burdens into fragments. You take part of mine and I must take part of yours, and each one will take part of the other's, and so we will fulfil the law of Christ.

Mrs. Appleton, of Boston, the daughter of Daniel Webster, was dying after long illness. The great lawyer after pleading an important case in the court-room, on his way home stopped at the house of his daughter and went into her sick-room. She said to him, "Father, why are you out to-day in this cold weather without an overcoat?" The great lawyer went into the next-room and was in a flood of tears, saying, "Dying herself, yet thinking only of me." Oh, how much more beautiful is care for others than this everlasting taking care of ourselves. High up in the wall of the Temple of Balbec there are three stones, each weighing eleven hundred tons. They were lifted up by a style of machinery that is now among the lost arts. But in my text is the Gospel machinery, by which the vaster and the heavier tonnage of the world's burden is to be lifted from the crushed heart of the human race.

THE SPIRIT OF HELPFULNESS.

What you and I most need to learn is the spirit of helpfulness. Encourage the merchant. If he have a superior style of goods, tell him so. If he have with his clerks adorned the show windows and the shelves, compliment his taste. If he have a good business locality, if he have had great success, if he have brilliant prospects for the future, recognize all this. Be not afraid that he will become arrogant and puffed up by your approval.

MERCANTILE BURDENS.

Before night some shop-going person will come in and tell him that his prices are exorbitant and that his goods are of an inferior quality, and that his show-window gave promise of far better things than he found inside. Before the night of the day in which you say encouraging words to that merchant there will be some crank, male or female, who will come into the store and depreciate everything, and haul down enough goods from the shelves to fit out a family for a whole winter without buying a cent's worth.

If the merchant be a grocer there will be some one before night who will come into his establishment, and taste of this and taste of that and taste of something else, in that way stealing all the profits of anything that he may purchase—buying three apples while he is eating one orange! Before the night of the day when you approve that merchant, he will have a bad debt which he will have to erase, a bad debt made by some one who has moved away from the neighborhood without giving any hint of the place of destination. Before the night of the day when you have uttered encouraging words to the merchant, there will be some woman who will return to his store and say she has lost her purse, she left it there in the store, she brought it there, she did not take it away, she knows it is there, leaving you to make the delicate and complimentary inference that you prefer to make. Before night that merchant will hear that some style of goods of which he has a large supply is going out of fashion, and there will be some one who will come into the store and pay a bill under protest, saying he has paid it before, but the receipt has been lost. Now, encourage that merchant, not fearing that he will become arrogant or puffed up, for there will be before night enough unpleasant things said to keep him from becoming apoplectic with plethora of praise.

EDITORIAL BURDENS.

Encourage newspaper men. If you knew how many annoyances they have, if you understood that their most elaborate article is sometimes flung out because there is such great pressure on the columns, and that an accurate report of a speech is expected although the utterance be so indistinct the discourse is one long stenographic guess, and that the midnight which finds you asleep demands that they be awake, and that they are sometimes ground between the wheels of our great brain manufactories; sickened at the often approach of men who want complimentary newspaper notices, or who want newspaper retraction; one day sent to report a burial, the next day to report a pugilistic encounter; shifted from place to place by sudden revolution which is liable to take place any day in our great journalistic establishments; precarious life, becoming more and more precarious—if you understood it, you would be more sympathetic. Be affable when you have not an axe to be sharpened on their grindstone. Discuss in your mind what the nineteenth century would be without the newspaper, and give encouraging words to all who are engaged in this interest, from the chief of editorial department down to the boy that throws the morning or evening newspaper into your basement window.

THE ARTISAN'S BURDENS.

Encourage mechanics. They will plumb the pipes, or they will kalsomine the ceilings, or they will put down the carpets, or they will grain the doors, or they will fashion the wardrobe. Be not among those who never say anything to a mechanic except to find fault. If he has done a job well tell him it is splendidly done. The book is well bound, the door is well grained, the chandelier is well swung, the work is grandly accomplished.

Be not you among those employers who never say anything to their employés except to swear at them. Do not be afraid you will make that mechanic so puffed up and arrogant he will never again want to be seen with working apron or in shirt sleeves, for before the night comes of that day when you praise him there will be a lawsuit brought against him because he did not finish his work as soon as he promised it, forgetful of the fact that his wife has been sick and two of his children have died of scarlet fever and he has had a felon on a finger of the right hand. Denounced perhaps because the paint is so very faint in color, not recognizing the fact that the mechanic himself has been cheated out of the right ingredients and that he did not find out the trouble in time; or scolded at because he seems to have lamed a horse by unskilful shoeing, when the horse has for months become spavined, or ringbone, or springhalt. You feel you have the right to find fault with a mechanic when he does ill. Do you ever praise a mechanic when he does well?

FARMERS' BURDENS.

Encourage the farmers. They come into your stores, you meet them in the city markets, you often associate with them in the summer months. Office-seekers go through the land and they stand on political platforms, and they tell the farmers the story about the independent life of a farmer, giving flattery where they ought to give sympathy. Independent of what? I was brought up on a farm, I worked on a farm, I know all about it. I hardly saw a city until I was grown, and I tell you that there are no class of people in this country who have it harder and who more need your sympathy than farmers.

Independent of what? Of the curculio that stings the peach trees? of the rust in the wheat? of the long rain with the rye down? Independent of the grasshopper? of the locust? of the army worm? of the potato bug? Independent of the drought that burns up the harvest? Independent of the cow with the hollow horn? or the sheep with the foot rot? or the pet horse with a nail in his hoof? Independent of the cold that freezes out the winter grain? Independent of the snowbank out of which he must shovel himself? Independent of the cold weather when he stands threshing his numbed fingers around his body to keep them from being frosted? Independent of the frozen ears and the frozen feet? Independent of what? Fancy farmers who have made their fortunes in the city and go out in the country to build houses with all the modern improvements, and make farming a luxury, may not need any solace; but the yeomanry who get their living out of the soil, and who that way have to clothe their families and educate their children, and pay their taxes and meet the interest on mortgaged farms—such men find a terrific struggle.

I demand that office seekers and politicians fold up their gaseous and imbecile speeches about the independent life of a farmer, and substitute some word of comfort drawn from the fact that they are free from city conventionalities and city epidemics and city temptations. My most vivid remembrance of boyhood is of my father coming in on a very hot day from the harvest field and seating himself on the door-sill because he was too faint to get into the house, the perspiration streaming from forehead and from chin, and my mother trying to resuscitate him with a cup of cold water which he was too faint to hold to his own lips, while saying to us: "Don't be frightened; there's nothing the matter; a little tired that's all, a little tired." Ever since that day when I hear people talking about the independent life of a farmer I see through the sham. Farmers want not your flatteries but your sympathies.

PHYSICIANS' BURDENS.

Encourage the doctors. You praise the doctor when he brings you up from an awful crisis of disease, but do you praise the doctor when through skilful treatment of the incipient stages of disease, he keeps you from sinking down to the awful crisis? There is a great deal of cheap and heartless wit about doctors, but I notice that the people who get off that wit are the first to send for a doctor when there is anything the matter. There are those who undertake to say in our day that doctors are reall/ useless. One man has written a book entitled, "Every Man His Own Doctor." That author ought to write one more book entitled "Every Man His Own Undertaker."

"Oh," says some one, "physicians in constant presence of pain get hard-hearted!" Do they? The most celebrated surgeon of the last generation stood in a clinical department of one of the New York medical colleges, the students gathered in the amphitheatre to see a very painful operation on a little child. The old surgeon said: "Gentlemen, excuse me if I retire; these surgeons can do this as well as I can, and as I get older it gives me more and more distress to see pain."

Physicians have so many hardships, so many interruptions, so many annoyances, I am glad they have so many encouragements. All doors pen to them. They are welcome to mansion nd to cot. Little children shout when they see hem coming down the road, and the aged recog-izing the step, look up and say, "Doctor, is hat you?" They stand between our families nd the grave, fighting back the troops of dis-rder that come up from their encampment by he cold river. No one hears such thanks as the loctor hears. They are eyes to the blind, they re feet to the lame, their path is strewn with he benedictions of those whom they have be-riended.

One day there was a dreadful foreboding in ur house. All hope was gone. The doctor ame four times that day. The children put way their toys and all walked on tip-toe, and at he least sound said: "Hush!" How loudly he clock did tick, and how the banister creaked hough we tried to keep it so still. That night he doctor stayed all night. He concentred all is skill upon the sufferer. At last the restless-ess of the sufferer subsided into a calm, sweet lumber, and the doctor looked up and smiled nd said: "The crisis is past." When propped p with pillows, in the easy chair, she sat, and he south wind tried to blow a rose-leaf into the aded cheek, and the children brought flowers—he one, a red clover top; the other, a violet rom the lawn—to the lap of the convalescent, nd Bertha stood on a high chair with a brush moothing her mother's hair, and we were told n a day or two she might ride out, joy came ack to our house. And as we helped the old ountry doctor into his gig, we noticed not hat the step was broken, or the horse stiff in he knees, and we all realized for the first time n our life what doctors were worth. Encourage hem.

LEGAL BURDENS.

Encourage the lawyers. They are often cheat-d out of their fees, and so often have to breathe he villainous air of courtrooms, and they so ften have to bear ponderous responsibility, and hey have to maintain against the sharks in their rofession the dignity of that calling which as honored by the fact that the only man llowed to stand on Mount Sinai beside the ord was Moses, the lawyer, and that the Bible peaks of Christ as the advocate. Encourage awyers in their profession of transcendent im-ortance—a profession honored by having on he bench a Chief Justice Story and at the bar a Rufus Choate.

BURDENS OF THE TEACHERS.

Encourage the teachers in our public schools—ccupation arduous and poorly compensated. n all the cities when there comes a fit of econ-my on the part of officials, the first thing to do always to cut down teachers' salaries. To ake forty or fifty boys whose parents suppose hem precocious and keep the parents from find-ng out their mistake; to take an empty head nd fill it; to meet the expectation of parents ho think their children at fifteen years of age ught to be mathematicians and metaphysicians nd rhetoricians; to work successfully that great uffing machine, the modern school system, is a ery arduous work. Encourage them by the sefulness and the everlastingness and the mag-itude of their occupation, and when your chil-ren do well, compliment the instructor, praise he teacher, thank the educator.

BURDENS OF THE SICK CHAMBER.

Encourage all invalids by telling them how any you have known with the same ailments ho got well, and not by telling them of their unken eye, or asking them whether the color f their cheek is really hectic, or mentioning ases in which that style of disease ended fatally, r telling them how badly they look. Cheerful ords are more soothing than chloral, more imulating than cognac, more tonic than bitters. lany an invalid has recovered through the in-uence of cheerful surroundings.

BURDENS OF YOUTH.

Encourage all starting in life by yourself be-oming reminiscent. Established merchants by elling these young merchants when you got our first customer, and how you sat behind the counter eating your luncheon with one eye on the door. Established lawyers, encourage young lawyers by telling of the time when you broke down in your first speech. Established ministers of the Gospel, encourage young ministers by merciful examination of theological candidates, not walking around with a profundity and overwhelmingness of manner as though you were one of the eternal decrees. Doctors established, by telling young doctors how you yourself once mistook the measles for scarlatina. And if you have nothing to say that is encouraging, O man! put your teeth tightly together and cover them with the curtain of your lip; compress your lips and put your hand over your mouth and keep still.

A gentleman was passing along, crossing a bridge in Germany, and a lad came along with a cage of birds for sale. The stranger said, "How much for those birds and the cage?" The price was announced, the purchase was made, and the first thing the stranger did was to open the door of the cage and the birds flew out into the sunlight and the forest. Some one who saw the purchase and the liberation said: "What did you do that for?" "Ah!" said the stranger, "I was a captive myself once, and I know how good it is to be free." Oh, ye who remember hardships in early life but have come beyond those hardships, sympathize with those who are in the struggle! Free yourself, help others to get free. Governor Alexander Stephens dying a few weeks ago persisted in having business matters brought to his bedside. There was on the table a petition for the pardon of a distinguished criminal, the petition signed by distinguished men. There was also on that table a letter from a poor woman in the penitentiary, written and signed by herself alone.

THE GOVERNOR'S LAST PARDON.

Dying Alexander Stephens said, "You think that because I have been ill so many times and got well, I shall get well now, but you are mistaken; I will not recover. Where is that letter by that woman in the penitentiary? I think she has suffered enough. As near as I can tell she has no friends. Bring me that paper that I may sign her pardon." A gentleman standing by thinking this too great a responsibility for the sick man, said: "Governor, you are very sick now; perhaps you had better wait till to-morrow; you may feel stronger and you may feel better." Then the eye of the old governor flashed, and he said: "I know what I am about." Putting his signature to that pardon he wrote the last word he ever wrote, for then the pen fell from his pale and rheumatic and dying hand forever. Oh, my soul, how beautiful that the closing hours of life should be spent in helping one who had no helper!

HELP FOR BURDEN-BEARERS.

Encourage the troubled by thoughts of release and reassociation. Encourage the aged by thoughts of eternal juvenescence. Encourage the herdsman amid the troughs of sin to go back to the banquet at the father's homestead. Give us tunes in the major key instead of the minor. Give us "Coronation" instead of "Naomi." You have seen cars so arranged that one car going down the hill rolled another car up the hill. They nearly balanced each other. And every man that finds life up hill ought to be helped by those who have passed the heights and are descending to the vale. Oh, let us bear each other's burdens!

A PLOT FOILED.

A gentleman in England died leaving his fortune by will to two sons. The son that stayed at home destroyed the father's will and pretended that the brother who was absent was dead and buried. The absent brother after a while returned and claimed his part of the property. Judges and jurors were to be bribed to say that the returned brother and son was no son at all but only an impostor. The trial came on. Sir Matthew Hale, the pride of the English court room and for twenty years the pride of jurisprudence, heard that that injustice was about to be practised. He put off his official robe. He put on the garb of a miller. He went to the village where that trial was to take place. He entered the court room. He somehow got empanelled as one of the jurors. The bribes came around, and the man gave ten pieces of gold to the other jurors, but as this was only a poor miller the briber gave to him only five pieces of gold. A verdict was brought in rejecting the rights of this returned brother. He was to have no share in the inheritance. "Hold! my lord," said the miller. "Hold! we are not all agreed on this verdict. These other men have received ten pieces of gold in bribery and I have received only five." "Who are you? Where do you come from?" said the judge on the bench. The response was: "I am from Westminster Hall; my name is Matthew Hale, Lord Chief Justice of the king's bench. Off of that place, thou villain!" And so the injustice was balked, and so the young man got his inheritance.

It was all for another that Sir Matthew Hale took off his robe and put on the garb of a miller. And so Christ took off His robe of royalty and put on the attire of our humanity, and in that disguise He won our eternal portion. Now are we the sons of God. Joint heirs! We went off from home sure enough, but we got back in time to receive our eternal inheritance. And if Christ bore our burden, surely we can afford to bear each other's burdens. Let us pray.

The Story of Thirty Years of Vagrancy was related a few days ago by a son who unexpectedly found his father by going to Dayton, Ohio. Thirty years ago Cornelius V. Cain, then a mere boy, ran off to sea on a French merchantman. The ship was taken by pirates, and every one on board except young Cain walked the plank, he being spared by an old Spaniard on account of his youth. For eight years Cain lived as a cattleherder, when his roving disposition again asserted itself, and five years of seafaring followed. He was wrecked off the Bermudas, picked up by an English man-of-war and taken to Liverpool. Several years were spent in travel through the Grecian Isles and into Asia with English merchants. Then followed a trip to the South Sea Islands, and several narrow escapes from shipwreck. Some time was spent in mining in California and in a fruitless search for a brother. Another year was spent herding cattle in Texas, and at last Cain determined to come East and seek his father. Travelling mostly on foot, he reached Ohio entirely destitute, and has wound up in the Dayton Workhouse as a vagrant. But the most wonderful part of the story is that his father, entirely unknown to him, is an inmate of the Soldiers' Home. After thirty years father and son met again, the runaway boy, now a bearded and bronzed man, and the parent, once a prosperous manufacturer, now an old and infirm soldier. This was not a case in which the returning prodigal could be welcomed with the fatted calf, for the father is as poor as his wandering son. The disposition to give a warm welcome is no doubt there, although the ability is lacking. The prodigal who after years of wandering returns through Jesus to his heavenly Father is assured that neither disposition nor ability is lacking there (Luke 13 : 29).

A Dog Prevented a Suicide one Evening last month in London. It appears that a young woman named Amelia Crickland, rendered desperate by the desertion of her husband, jumped into the Thames, near Cleopatra's Needle, and would undoubtedly have been drowned had not a Newfoundland dog been passing near the spot with his master while the woman was struggling in the river. He caught sight, it would seem, of a dark object struggling in the water, ran back to his master, and then barked. Fortunately this proceeding attracted the attention of the owner of the dog, and the drowning woman was observed. The animal having been commanded to plunge into the river, pulled the woman near enough to the steps to enable the dog's owner, by wading into the water, to rescue her with the aid of his cane, which she seized.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE MOODY AND SANKEY MEETINGS IN EUROPE.

Donald's Hard Lot.—Mr. Deware Said at a recent meeting: "An old Christian whom I knew lived in Anderston some years ago. He was my own countryman, and much afflicted with doubts. A minister called upon him when he was ill, and Donald complained much and loudly about his hard lot. 'Give up your murmuring, doubting spirit, and see if the Lord will not fulfil all His promises to you,' suggested his visitor. The man did after a struggle follow the minister's advice, and found that God was faithful who had promised."

What a Surprise!—"A Wife, who Was a real Christian, spoke to her husband often about his soul, till at last he was constrained to give his heart to the Lord. Although she had hoped, prayed, and worked for the realization of this—her dearest wish on earth—for a long time, yet it came upon her as a startling surprise, and she at once began to fear and tremble for her husband. 'Will he stand firm during the New Year holidays?' was her inward question. On New Year's Day her husband died, resting quietly on Christ, as 'all his salvation and all his desire.'"

A Sight of Home.—The Rev. Mr. Carstairs said: "I and my boys climbed a very high hill last year. As we began to descend, my youngest got very tired, so I took him by the hand and helped him on a little. When we came within sight of home in the valley, though it was still a long way off, I pointed it out to him and inquired, 'Can you run?' 'Oh, yes, let's be before the boys.' Off we ran, jumping ditches and leaping streams, so inspiring was the sight of home that the little one forgot all sense of fatigue or weariness. If any of us are tired of Christian work, let us take a long look at the home that is in front of us, and all sense of despair will vanish."

Too Happy to Eat.—Mr. Henderson Stated that "In the work among the fallen women, not one of those rescued have gone back. One of the girls went home to her father and mother and told them that she had been washed in the blood of Christ, and was now with the help of God going to live a new life. The hearts of the worthy couple were broken with joy, so much so, that it was some time before they could taste the food which was on the table when their daughter came in. When they did sit down, the girl desired her father to ask a blessing from God on the food, but he was unable to do so, and she herself did it. The Holy Spirit made her petition so powerful that her parents have accepted Christ as their Saviour."

A Scotch Lassie's Testimony.—"Another Incident was told by an old woman who said, 'My lassie was converted at a meeting in Govan. I heard that she was to give her testimony one night, but I said nothing, only determined in my own mind that if I could prevent her, she should not leave the house that night. So I just quietly turned the lock and put the key into my pocket. The lassie was very sorry and pleaded hard with me to let her out, but I was firm. She soon settled down quietly, and then began to tell me how she was converted, and somehow my heart melted, and I, too, gave myself to the Lord.' As I was shaking hands with the women as they left, the woman said to me very simply, 'This is the lassie, sir, that saved her mother.' Let us be up and doing; God is blessing us, and if we rely upon Him, He will not fail to show us the fruits of our labors."

A Profane Captain Saved.—Dr. Cameron Said: "A Highland sailor in action used an expression which was the means of converting his captain, Sir James Haldane. In the midst of the action the men began to give way, and in calling up another relay to their assistance, the captain spoke in a very profane manner about their cowardice. The sailor overheard him, and touching him, said, 'Are you aware, captain, that if God granted your wish we should all be in hell?' The words were used thoughtlessly in his anger, but the sailor's rebuke went home, and ere long the captain sought and found salvation in Christ. Soon afterward he spoke to his brother Robert, and he too gave himself to the Saviour. Robert went to Geneva, and there he was the means used by God to convert D'Aubigne the French historian, and hence we have the celebrated 'History of the Reformation.' Let every Christian, high or low, speak out for Christ. If it is done in love, the words will never be lost."

Better than Singing.—At a Recent Meeting in Glasgow, Mr. Deware said: "Nearly forty years ago I was under conviction of sin. My trouble of mind was very great, so that when at length I found peace through faith in Christ, the change had such an effect upon me that I thought there was no need to take any particular heed to my steps or have any more care about the true path. I thought I was all right, because I could sing a great deal, but I prayed very little. Very soon I learned the need of prayer, for I felt that, though singing was good, yet something better was needed to keep my soul alive, and that was prayer and reading the Word of God. It is now inconceivable to me how a Christian can live without daily reading of God's word and hourly prayer; the devil is always so active that there is no safe asylum but in the presence and under the conscious smile of God."

A Highland Lassie's Choice.—"A Young woman, whose conversion to Christ delighted me exceedingly, was led to the Saviour thus: In my church we have a special ten minutes for children in the address or sermon. This young person came from the Highlands to serve in a house near my church, and on the first Sunday after reaching her new home, she attended. That day, when speaking to the children, I said that we ought to bring the firstlings of the flock to God, and not act as many do when young, who think that they will keep the firstlings to themselves, and when old and broken, so as to be of no further use to the world, they will bring them to God. While I was speaking this girl thought 'That's me! but by God's grace I will do so no longer.' Sitting in the pew in a strange church she gave herself to the Lord, body and soul. She has since been instrumental in leading a fellow-servant to the same Saviour."

The Bible Among French Silk Weavers.— The Rev. Dr. Bonar said: "A few years ago copies of the Scriptures were taken to a considerable village not far from Lyons. A great change took place in the habits of the villagers which was ascribed to the teachings of the Bible. A stranger visited the place shortly after the happy change got noised abroad, and called upon the mayor to satisfy himself about it. He asked, 'Do you really think, Mr. Mayor, that such a change has been effected through the introduction of this Book?' The answer was, 'I tell you this, sir, that since that time we have had no need to measure the silk.' The people were silk weavers. The question young converts, and old ones as well, should ask themselves is, 'Does my employer or customer need to watch me, or do they trust me implicitly?' Salvation from sin means not only deliverance from the punishment of hell, but also from the power of it in every-day life, and in every transaction."

A Heroic Rescue.—At a Gospel Temperance Meeting, in Cowcaddens, Mr. Robert Simpson said: "A few months ago, during a fearful storm, a large ship was driven a helpless wreck on to the rocks. Her position was such that the lifeboat was of no avail to save her crew. The rocket apparatus was then called into use, and rockets were fired right over the ship, but the men were either unable or did not understand the means employed for their deliverance. Seeing this, a man named George Williams at once determined to risk his own life in an effort to save the lives of these sailors. His friends opposed him, but George persisted, and flung himself into the sea. Sometimes it seemed to the anxious ones on shore that the waves would overwhelm him, but just as the billows came upon him he dived under, and thus struggled on till at last he reached a rock near the ship and climbed on to it. Once on board, he made fast a rope from the rocket, and got the men off one by one, till the last man, when, just as the man got half-way between the shore and the ship, the rope fouled. Williams' friends signalled, 'Save yourself, now, you can do nothing with this man;' but George again plunged into the sea, righted the rope, and the sailor was hauled ashore and saved. In like manner we who seek to save souls from the danger they are in should behave with at least equal self-forgetfulness, not counting our lives dear unto us."

ISHMAEL: PAST, PRESENT, AND FUTURE.

A Prophetical Monograph by the Rev. E. J. Hytche.

Relations of Abraham and his Son—Affectionate Regard—Prayer for the Boy—God's Unconditional Promise—Participates in the Covenant of Circumcision—His Twelve Sons as Promised—Quarrels with his Kinsmen—A Remarkable Prophecy—Two Noticeable Points—Personal Characteristics—His Territory—The Two Sections—Ishmaelites at Pentecost—In the Millennium—Gifts and Offerings—Their Monotheism—Duty of Evangelizing them.

THERE was no chief of patriarchal times who had so few flaws in his moral character as Abraham. He was as remarkable for home-piety as he was for personal religion. Hence it was that God gave this epitome of his parental relations (Gen. 18: 19): "I know him that he will command his children and his household after him; and they shall keep the way of Jehovah to do justice and judgment." This fact was seen in his immediate descendants; and even three hundred years after this encomium was given, we find the descendant of his wife Keturah—Jethro, a loyal priest and worshipper of the one true God.

The same fact that Abraham not only "commanded his children," but "his household," is eminently exemplified in the stirring history of his wife, Hagar, and her son, Ishmael. Hagar, whose very name, signifying as it does "flight," was prophetic of the most salient points in her history. She was an Egyptian. When or how she became a member of Abraham's household is not recorded, but probably she entered his family when driven from Canaan by famine (Gen. 12: 10), he sojourned in Egypt.

When the son of promise was born, she evidenced her faith by obedience, and called him, as directed, Ishmael—or one whom God hears. Some years afterward in redemption of a promise to Sarah, Isaac was born, the true heir of his father, as ancestor of the covenant people, the Jews. Ishmael was now approaching manhood, and knowing that he had lost the dignity of primogeniture, he mocked Isaac, possibly at the instigation of his mother, and so provoked Sarah's wrath. For this cause Sarah bade Abraham to eject Hagar from the camp, to return no more; and if he complied after a protest with this act of cruel injustice, it was simply because God told him that he permitted it as a part of His counsels for the future of Isaac.

While on her road to Egypt, God again met Hagar in grace. She and her son had fainted when the Angel-Jehovah came and rescued them from a terrible death. He then renewed His promise to Hagar (Gen. 21: 18): "I will make him a great nation," and as a proof of the promise,

"GOD WAS WITH THE LAD."

Though Abraham would seem, at the first glance of the inspired narrative, not to have made any provision for Hagar and her son, yet he was too just a man to let his wife and offspring suffer from such neglect. Hence we read (Gen. 25: 6), "Unto the sons of the concubines which Abraham had, he gave gifts, and sent them away from his son Isaac, while he yet lived, eastward unto the east country," known in Bible-time as Arabia; and there thus they remain to this day, as a living proof—in spite of Jowett, Colenso, Davidson, and other neologians—that in the Pentateuch we have a mere transcript of facts, and as such, true to the very letter.

That Abraham loved his son Ishmael, the whole narrative indicates, and he proved it unmistakably by religious training. Moreover, when God promised him a son by Sarah, he said (Gen. 17 : 18), "O that Ishmael might live before Thee." He doubtless knew of the temporal prosperity promised to Hagar; but, as Abraham knew himself to be only a pilgrim to that better country where temporal prosperity is regarded as of little worth, we can scarcely err in concluding that the patriarch in this prayer asked for spiritual blessings for his son. To this prayer of faith God gave a ready response; for He said, "I have heard thee; behold, I have blessed him and will make him fruitful, and will multiply him exceedingly—twelve princes shall he beget, and I will make him a great nation."

For another reason we cannot doubt that Abraham regarded the promise of God as respecting Ishmael to include spiritual blessings. For, after was given, the patriarch, the self-same day (Gen. 17 : 23) circumcised Ishmael and the household, and so dedicated them to God. This rite practically taught—an essential truth of true religion—that even the flesh belongs to God, and ought to be as much consecrated to Him as the soul. So understood by Abraham, the custom has continued to this day among the descendants of Hagar and Keturah, as well as among the sons of Isaac, to whom, as a national covenant, it primarily appertained.

After her ejection from the encampment of Abraham, Hagar took her son to the wilderness of Paran—a territory which includes all the land between the boundaries of Judah and the border of Sinai. Its ancient name is still preserved by the descendants of Ishmael and Keturah, for it is now known as Wady-Ferran. While there, Ishmael's mother sought him a wife among her Egyptian kindred. In conformity with God's promise (Gen. 17 : 20), "twelve princes shall he beget," who became the heads of twelve distinct clans, and from these the bulk of the Arabs claim their descent in the male line. Though a nomad, Ishmael seems to have died a peaceful death, at the ripe age of one hundred and thirty-seven. Longevity would in fact seem to be inherited by the posterity of Ishmael, for travellers who have visited the Bedaweens have discovered not a few who have exceeded one hundred and ten years.

ISHMAEL HAD TWELVE SONS,

From the significant expression (Gen. 25 : 18), "he died in the presence of all his brethren," may we not infer that he died in amity with the sons of Sarah and Keturah? But, if so, this alliance with his Jewish cousin did not last for many years. It had always been the impression of his descendants that he was wrongfully deprived of his birthright, as eldest son of Abraham. Hence it is that the sacred historians record many wars between the Ishmaelites and Israelites. One of the most remarkable of these wars is reported in 1 Chron. 5 : 20–21, where we learn that on an invasion by the Ishmaelites of the territory of Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh—probably in the time of King Saul—"the Hagarites were delivered into their hand" (i.e., Hebrews), and all that were with them; for they cried unto God in the battle, and He was intreated of them—because they put their trust in Him." This narrative incidentally shows how wealthy the Ishmaelites had become, for the Israelites took as spoil "of camels 50,000, and of sheep 250,000, and of asses 2000."

There is one

of Isaiah which cannot be omitted in this sketch—namely (Is. 21 : 13–17): "The burden (or sentence) upon Arabia." Thereby we learn that "the inhabitants of the land of Tema brought water to him that was thirsty—they prevented with bread those that fled from Dedanim from the grievousness of war." Both these districts are in Arabia. The Dedanites were merchants, and by caravan carried on an important trade between the Persian Gulf and Damascus. But although the Temaites not only escaped the invasion of Sargon, the Assyrian king, but exercised the grace of hospitality to the fugitives—yet they were also destined eventually to fall. For God told Isaiah that "within two years—according to the years of a hireling, and all the glory of Kedar should fall; and the residue of the number of archers, the mighty men of the children of Kedar, shall be diminished, for Jehovah God of Israel hath spoken it." Yet, again, here His promise to Abraham did not fail; for the sons of Ishmael were not to be extirpated, but only "diminished" in numerical power. Thus again was Abraham's prayer answered—"O that Ishmael may live before Thee!"—even when they were punished for national sins.

There are two noticeable points in the prophetic history of Ishmael; for they were photographs of his posterity, even down to these days. First: his personal characteristics; and second, the territory given to Ishmael.

First. The Most High had thus portrayed the

before he was even born. Gen. 16 : 12: "He will be a wild-ass man [literal]: his hand will be against every man, and every man against him." As was Ishmael, so are his descendants; for the propensities of a primal ancestor are doubtless entailed. Hence Arnold, in his "Koran and the Bible" (p. 25), says, "The Abyssinians, Jews, Persians, Romans, and other nations, have made war against them, but by no nation, however powerful, could they at any time be persistently subdued. They allege that Ishmael was turned out of his father's house, and received the wilderness for his inheritance, with permission to take what he could. Like the wild ass, each tribe chooses a leader—a sheik from among its own people—under whose direction they fight, rob, and rove about from place to place. It is a proverbial saying among them, "In the desert every one is the enemy of the other."

Second. After describing the characteristics of her unborn son, God promised Hagar (Gen. 16 : 12) what may be regarded as a territorial gift to Ishmael, or, in other words, He gave him a portion of

for the Angel-Jehovah said, "He shall dwell in the presence of all his brethren." Contiguous as are the posterity of Ishmael to the lot of Judah on the one hand, and to the sons of Keturah on the other, we need scarcely say that this prediction has been literally fulfilled. Nor was this prophecy merely a personal one, and so restricted to Ishmael; for when Jehovah said that he should become "a great nation, and beget twelve princes," or heads of distinct tribes, the promise necessarily implied that his sons should be the heirs of his inheritance; and so his descendants regard it even now. So late as the days of Jerome (A.D. 400) that theologian intimates that they were still divided into twelve tribes, and that twelve districts of the Arabian desert were known by the names of the twelve sons of Ishmael. From him they dated their descent in an unbroken male line; and their favorite names were then, as now, Ibrahim (the Arabic form of Abraham) and Ishmael.

But not only was the desert generally given to the Ishmaelites for an inheritance, but we learn from Ezekiel that they were about 1325 years afterward endowed with a specific part by a Divine order to that prophet.

There we read (Ezek. 25 : 3–5): "Say unto the Ammonites," who then occupied the territory between the river Jabbok and the Arabian desert, "Behold, I will deliver thee to the children of the east for a possession, and they shall set their palaces in thee, and make their dwellings in thee, and they shall drink thy milk; and I will make Rabbah a stable for camels, and the Ammonites a couching place for flocks. No words could more correctly indicate the present locality of the sons of Ishmael, or more pointedly indicate in what their wealth consists.

There is a marked contrast between the Sinaitic covenant and the promise given to Hagar concerning Ishmael; for that made with Israel was conditional on their obedience and loyalty to Jehovah (see Exod. 19 : 5, 6). And, if they are now exiled from their fatherland, it is solely because they were unfaithful to their covenant, and superseded the God of Abraham by the idols of the Gentiles.

But the promises given to Abraham in response to his prayer—"O that Ishmael may live before Thee" (Gen. 16 : 12 and ibid. 17 : 8); "Of the son of the handmaid I will make a great nation, because he is thy seed," and he "shall dwell in the presence of all his brethren"—were acts of simple grace, and therefore *un*conditional. We are then warranted in the inference that the territory thus given to Ishmael, and through him, by heirship, to his posterity, was not only given to them in perpetuity, but that, unlike their Jewish cousins, they should never be driven out of it. For it is still true, as in the analogous cases of their kinsmen, the Jews, even though now in abeyance (Rom. 11 : 29), "The gifts and calling of God are without repentance."

THE TWO SECTIONS OF ARABS.

Although the frontiers of Arabia are somewhat undefined, it may be regarded as extending from the river Euphrates on the east, Syria on the north, the Red Sea on the west, and to the Indian Ocean on the south. It is thus about 1500 miles long and 1200 broad. Though occupied chiefly by the sons of Abraham and Lot, there are relics of a still more primitive race. Yet even this section has a common origin with Abraham; for they claim to descend from Houd, known in Scripture as Heber. From this Houd, Abraham descended in the sixth generation.

Though mostly poor, when compared with western standards, these lords of the wilderness are so aristocratic in sentiment as to be led to preserve their pedigrees most carefully, so that there can be no doubt that—whether the sons of Abraham or not—they are all of the same stock, and so may be considered as one family. The Arabs are, in addition to their tribal distinctions, divisible into two sections—namely, the Bedaweens, or dwellers in tents in the desert, and those who live permanently in cities. Of the two, those that people the desert are by far the nobler; for the more civilized have contracted most of the vices which deform Christendom, as represented in Oriental countries; for, unhappily, they find it easier to imitate the Greeks in their cheating and lying, and the British in their drunkenness and swearing, than to retain the simplicity and abstemiousness of their ancestors.

What the Ishmaelites were in Bible times are

THE BEDAWEENS IN THESE DAYS

—primitive in style of living and domestic arrangements, and caring more for independence than for that luxury which is decimating the western nations—they are living illustrations of the patriarchal age. As respects hospitality, they are modern reproductions of their father Abraham. And, if they do not permit European travellers to range the desert without paying for an escort, yet, when such an agreement is come to, they are found faithful even unto death. In exacting such tribute, it is claimed that the desert is their property, conveyed to them by a Divine title-deed, and that no one has any right to traverse their territory without their consent. All travellers who have sojourned among them for any time speak highly of the domestic qualities of the sons of Ishmael, as well as of their hereditary wisdom and piety.

Arabia is nominally a province of the Turkish Empire, but the Arabs are practically independent and self-governed; the only real tie being found in that of Islam, of which the Sultan is the hereditary Caliph. As followers of Mohammed, who declared that his mission was to extirpate idolatry, they are monotheistic in creed. Unhappily, few Bedaweens know anything of Christianity, save in its Greek or Latin form; and, as these apostate creeds supplant the religion of Jesus, by picture or image worship, no wonder that they either view it with contempt or feel for it a bitter hatred.

The Names and Addresses of Colored Baptist ministers in the South sent to the office of this journal in response to our invitation, are largely in excess of our resources. The fund generously placed at our disposal by our friend in Iowa enabled us to supply a hundred of these ministers with The Christian Herald for a year, but we have received the names of nearly another hundred to whom the reading of the paper every week would be of incalculable benefit, and would be the means of blessing indirectly to the thousands of their race who depend upon them for spiritual instruction. We regret that, owing to the fund having been exhausted before their names were received, we are unable to supply them. We have, however, placed the names on file, and should any Christian brother, having the welfare of the colored race at heart, be prompted of God to send a contribution for the purpose, we will send the paper to those ministers whose names arrived too late for participation in the first fund. Any donor sending money to this office for the purpose will receive by mail a list of the persons who will benefit by his donation.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Civil Service Commissioners have Prepared the rules, which will govern the classification and examination of Government clerks and employes who fall within the provisions of the new law, and as soon as the President returns to Washington they will be submitted to him for his approval. The requirements of the rules for examination will not be made public until they have received such approval. The statement is made, however, by a leading journal that the standard of qualifications recommended will probably not be so high as to limit competition for places in the public service to college-bred men and women, but that, on the contrary, it will offer reasonable encouragement to any person of fair intelligence who possesses such an education as can be obtained in the public schools of any State in the Union.

The Statistics of Immigration Always Merit careful attention, because they furnish an indication of the materials, which compose the population of the country and contribute to its political, moral and religious condition. The figures for the month of March are now issued. During the month there arrived in the customs districts of Baltimore, Boston, Detroit, Huron, Minnesota, New Orleans, New York, Passamaquoddy, Philadelphia and San Francisco 44,483 passengers, of whom 38,730 were immigrants. Of this total number of immigrants there arrived from England and Wales 3286; Ireland, 2518; Scotland, 905; Austria, 818; Belgium, 294; Bohemia, 305; Denmark, 846; France, 383; Germany, 14,759; Hungary, 1328; Italy, 3365; Netherlands, 384; Norway, 667; Russia, 338; Poland, 85; Sweden, 988; Switzerland, 1602; Dominion of Canada, 5661; and from all other countries, 192. In March, 1882, 65,234 immigrants arrived. In the nine months ended March 31st, 1883, there arrived in the ports named 339,214 immigrants, as against 449,327 for the corresponding period of the previous year.

The Design for the New Two-Cent Stamp which will shortly supersede the present three-cent stamp on all domestic letters under half an ounce in weight has been submitted to Postmaster-general Gresham, and approved. The stamp bears a tablet, upon which is a profile of Washington similar to that on the present three-cent stamp. Surrounding the profile is an oval band. In the upper part of the band are the words: "United States postage;" beneath the band a large "2," and at the extreme bottom of the tablet the words, "Two cents." The design will be returned to the American Bank-note Company of New York for engraving, after which the department will decide upon the color to be used.

The Will of the Late Peter Cooper was Filed for probate on April 11th. The estate was smaller than was expected, owing to the fact that the deceased philanthropist had been to a large extent his own executor and had given away large sums recently in public and private charity. A written statement was left at the surrogate's office to the effect that Mr. Cooper's estate amounted to about $2,000,000. About $200,000 would be required to meet special bequests which Mr. Cooper had made, but for which no provision had been made in his will. The bequests are of a personal nature, and illustrate the consideration which Mr. Cooper, down to the time of his death, gave to all persons who he thought had claims upon his bounty. Among the bequests was one of $100,000 to the endowment fund of Cooper Union.

The Production of the Passion Play Under the plea that the proceeds would be devoted to charity has been prohibited in the courts. Justice Barrett last week, after listening to argument, granted an order continuing the injunction recently granted restraining Salmi Morse from producing the play. Mr. Morse, in an affidavit read in the argument, says: "I solemnly swear the persons who were to assist in the representation of the play were not professional actors." Justice Barrett asked if it was really meant to be said that all the people were at the representation as mere volunteers. The counsel for Mr. Morse said the actors received no compensation. It was, however, proved by an affidavit that at least one of the actors was hired, as actors usually are, to perform for Mr. Morse in the Passion Play, and expected to receive compensation.

The Answers of the Police Commissioners of New York City to the questions addressed to them by Mr. Robert Graham and the committee appointed by the Steinway Hall meeting have been received. The commissioners appear anxious to clear themselves of blame for the failure to enforce the excise laws. They reflect on the police justices, but statistics collected by the Times show that the allegations are not sustained by facts. The Commissioners' allegations against the justices are two: First, that they discharge so many of the persons arrested that it is useless to arrest them, but the statistics show that very nearly seven eighths of the persons arrested have been held; second, that bail for only $100 is demanded by the justices, which is insufficient, but the maximum bail is fixed by law at $100, and the offence is bailable, so that the justices have no alternative. As to the final trial, the Commissioners say that they cannot get the evidence to convict, but Dr. Crosby points out that where there are two witnesses to an offence there is no trouble in getting convictions, and there ought to be no difficulty in having two witnesses. Mr. Graham states that a series of interrogatories will be submitted to the police justices, and after replies from them have been received a public meeting will be summoned when the committee will explain what has been done and state the causes of the failure of the present Excise law and present a new one for ratification, in which all the defects of the old law shall be left out, and which it is hoped, when prepared, will be satisfactory. This bill is to be prepared by Judge Peabody and ex-Judge Arnoux. The fight for law and order, it will be observed, has been thoroughly organized and deserves to succeed. Mr. Graham points out, however, that success will mainly depend on the support of a strong public opinion unmistakably expressed.

Temperance Work among the Colored People in the South has made considerable progress during the past season. Successful meetings have been held throughout a wide district by Mr. J. N. Stearns, the indefatigable secretary of the National Temperance Society, and Mr. C. H. Mead. Among the good things reported as being said by those who indorsed the remarks of the temperance speakers is the following. An old man who addressed the meeting at Weldon, N. C., said: "When I sees a man going home wid a gallon of wiskey and a half-pound of meat, dat's temperance lecture 'nuff fur me, and I sees it every day; I knows dat ebery ting in his house is on de same scale—gallon of misery to ebery half-pound of comfort."

Rev. E. Payson Hammond's Services in the Brooklyn Tabernacle have been extensively blessed in the conversion of children. Many of those brought in are the children of Roman Catholic parents. A large number of boys and girls say that they never saw a Bible in their houses. It is an interesting fact that among the workers in the children's and adults' meetings are some who ten, twelve, or even twenty years ago, were blessed in Mr. Hammond's meetings. One of these, a lady, who has been a missionary in India for six years, plays the organ for the children's meetings.

The Election of the Hon. John Jay as President of the Evangelical Alliance in succession to the late Hon. William E. Dodge is announced. Mr. Jay is a member of the Episcopal Church, a resolute upholder of the principles of the Reformation, and an uncompromising foe of Romanism in all of its forms, especially as practised by the Jesuits. In 1869 he held the office of United States Minister at the Court of Vienna. He comes of an eminently Christian family. His grandfather, John Jay, who was the first Chief Justice of the United States, was President of the American Bible Society; his father, William Jay, a jurist and philanthropist, was President of the Westchester County Bible Society, and of the American Peace Society.

Ben Hogan, the Prizefighter, Converted at Mr. Sawyer's meetings, is doing a good work in Omaha. The Omaha Herald reporting his evangelistic meetings, says: "The people are somewhat amazed to see Ben Hogan on a platform with ministers of the Gospel, and upholding Christ as the Saviour of mankind, when but a few years ago he was fighting for the championship of America and this corruptible crown, and is now fighting for the incorruptible crown—life everlasting; but he says the people are not so much astonished as he was when converted and brought from darkness into light." Hogan holds his audience spellbound by the hour, and there have been many conversions of desperate men and many families have been made happy by the change the grace of God has made in the heart and life of the husband and father. One man testified that he went into the opera house one Sunday afternoon and listened to Mr. Hogan, having known him personally in the oil country. He said to himself, "If God could save a man like Hogan, He can surely save me." The day of the election he was afraid he might get entangled with same of his old comrades, so he took his little girl with him for a guardian. Afterward he gave himself to Christ, and is now trusting, and his family rejoicing in Him.

A Minister who is an Ex-lawyer has Succeeded in checking the tour through Massachusetts of the notorious Jesse James Theatrical Troupe, which through his exertions have been held in bail for the Grand Jury for corrupting the morals of the young by making vice attractive. Mr. Melville Smith, the minister in question, based his action on the plea that the pictures on the bill-boards were immoral in their tendencies, as they made robbery heroic and attractive to the youthful observer. As the dime novels have the same tendency, perhaps Mr. Smith may now be encouraged to move against them.

A Sneak Thief was Betrayed by his Grammar in Philadelphia, recently. The Philadelphia correspondent of a New York journal says: "An old lady, nearly blind, heard a noise in the upper part of her house, and on calling upstairs she was answered by a strange voice, saying, 'It's me, mother.' Having brought up her children to use proper language, the old lady knew at once that there was a strange man in the house, and quickly went to a neighbor's house and gave an alarm." It is often so in the church with hypocrites who endeavor to pass themselves off as the sons of God. Their speech betrayeth them (Jer. 23 : 16, 17).

A Curious Discovery of the Susceptibility of plants to the light of the moon has been made by an eminent botanist. He sowed in pots some seeds of plants. When they had grown a few inches they were put in a very dark place and kept there some time, so that the stems became thin and white and the few leaves yellow. Then, on three successive nights last month, when the sky was exceptionally clear, the plants were placed in a large window looking south, where they received the direct light of the moon from 9 P.M. to 3 A.M. Almost directly the stems began to bend over toward the moon, and to follow it in its course. About 2 A.M., owing to the moon's position, the stems became nearly straight, the terminal bud always pointing to that orb. The plants being then brought to a window looking west, a new flexure occurred, and continued till the moon disappeared. A few minutes after this the stems straightened. It thus appears that darkness gives increased sensitiveness to the plants, so that the comparatively feeble light of the moon affects them. We may see in this discovery a type of the uses of the darkness of affliction. When the believer is in danger of forgetting the Sun of Righteousness and his eyes are too much occupied with the world's prizes to perceive the true light of his soul, he is mercifully withdrawn into the silence and darkness of the sick chamber that he may become more sensitive to the heavenly influence (Isa. 54 : 8).

From the Coffin to the Bridal Altar is a passage not often made, but a marriage solemnized in Baltimore on April 12th furnishes one instance of that experience. The bride was Miss Mary Griffith, and her marriage recalls the fact that some years ago she came near being buried alive. Her family resided in Cincinnati at the time, and one day she fell downstairs and received injuries which were considered fatal. Several prominent physicians called to see her and pronounced her case hopeless. One day the young girl grew much worse, fell into a comatose state, and, as it was thought, died. The body was prepared for burial, but it was noticed that it did not undergo the changes which usually occur after death. The day of the funeral arrived, and at the appointed time the carriages and hearse drove up to the door. Just as the coffin was being closed it was noticed that the life-like appearance of the supposed corpse became more pronounced, and there were slight signs of returning vitality. A physician was called, and after an hour or so Miss Griffith returned to consciousness. The solemn gathering was turned into one of joy. The young girl recovered rapidly and grew up well and strong, and last week was married in Baltimore. This incident is a type of the experience of every child of God. As a member of the bride of Christ he comes from a state of spiritual death, and when Christ comes He will bring with Him as His bride those who have also been physically dead (Eph. 2 : 1-6).

A Mad Dog in a Crowded Church at Charlotte, N. C., caused a panic during a recent service. It appears that for several weeks there has been some excitement in the city over a report that an epidemic of madness had broken out among the dogs, and in the course of a few days several animals were shot. On April 10th, while the congregation of the Davidson Presbyterian College was engaged in worship, a dog believed to be suffering from hydrophobia ran up the middle aisle of the church, foaming at the mouth and howling. The church was crowded, and a panic ensued. Men, women, and children attempted to get out. Some mounted the tops of the benches. The pastor stopped in the midst of a sentence, and requested some one to kill the animal. One of the worshippers drew his revolver and fired twice at the dog. Other men assisted with walking sticks and spittoons, and beat and pelted the dog to death near the pulpit. It is not surprising that during the prevalence of the excitement the appearance of the dog in the church should have caused alarm and led to its death. Unhappily, one whom the Psalmist compares to a dog and who, it is to be feared, often seeks his prey in the church is not so easily disposed of (Psa. 22 : 20).

A Judge's Courage and Independence was displayed in his own court in Indiana some time ago. The incident has found its way into the newspapers in connection with the recent appointment to the postmaster-generalship. It is stated that Judge Gresham, who is now postmaster-general, was one day holding court when, on an important case being called, the district attorney announced that it would be withdrawn from the docket. "By whose authority?" asked Judge Gresham. "By instructions from Washington," was the reply. "But whose instructions?" The rejoinder was, if not evasive, unsatisfactory. "We do not recognize the right of anybody at Washington, even the President himself," said Judge Gresham, "to interfere whether by instructions or requests in the trial of a cause before this court. Proceed with the trial of the case." The trial proceeded, and a conviction was secured. The result was a surprise to the criminal who apparently had no fear of a conviction after securing friends in the Federal Capital and the compliance of the district attorney. The judge's firmness, however, prevented a miscarriage of justice. The most encouraging features of the plan of salvation by Christ is that although the believer's name is withdrawn from judgment, justice has been satisfied by his divine Substitute (Rom. 8 : 1, 2).

A Connecticut Burglar Trap is Described in the Youth's Companion. It appears that a country store keeper in that State found that his money-drawer was frequently robbed in the night, and he determined to stop these depredations. With characteristic ingenuity he arranged in the floor a trap-door which perfectly matched the boards of the floor. In the day-time the door was securely fastened, but at night on leaving the store a catch was so fixed that the moment the unsuspecting burglar stepped on the door to operate on the money-drawer, the trap door opened and dropped him into a pit in the cellar below. The sides of the pit were smooth and higher than a man's head, so that once dropped the burglar could not escape. The trap closed automatically by a spring, ready for a second burglar. A practical trial of the trap proved successful, for one morning the store-keeper found evidence of an entrance to his store in the night, and on looking into the pit discovered the imprisoned burglar. He coolly went about his business, and in due course had the burglar arrested. The reflections of the man so snared, as he awaited his release in the morning must have been very humiliating. It would be well for him if they led him to seek escape from that other pit into which, unless he should change his course of life, he must one day fall, and from which he must not hope to escape (Isa. 38 : 18).

THE WORD OF A KING.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Where the word of a king is, there is power."—Ecclesiastes 8 : 4.

Why Personal Government Fails — Why a Theocracy must be Blessed—The Word of the Heavenly King—Its Power—I. Excites Awe—Kills and Makes Alive—His Promises and Threats—His Prophecies—II. Insures Obedience—Solomon's Counsel—Devil's Providences—Whales not so Plentiful as in Jonah's Time—Have a Tender Mouth—III. Inspires Confidence—Worthless I. O. U.'s—IV. Directs Effort—In the Pulpit—Power not in a Choir—Power in Winning Souls—In Filling a Church—The Nourishing Meat.

Kings in Solomon's day had a vast amount of power, for their word was absolute. They did according to their own will, and none could check them; for, as Solomon said, "the king's wrath is as the roaring of a lion; whoso provoketh him to anger sinneth against his own soul." When such a monarch happened to be wise and good, it was a great blessing to the people; for "a king that sitteth in the throne of judgment scattereth away all evil with his eyes." But if he was of a hard, tyrannical nature, his subjects were mere slaves, and groaned beneath a yoke of iron. We do not sufficiently give thanks for the blessings of a constitutional government, but if we were for a season put beneath the power of a grinding despotism we should set more store by those liberties for which we have to thank our Puritan ancestors. Mercies are seldom appreciated till they are taken away. May we not prove ungrateful under free institutions, for if so, we shall be more brutish than any men.

There is, however, one King whose power we do not wish in any degree to limit or circumscribe. God doeth as He wills among the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of this lower world; none can stay His hand, or say unto Him, What doest Thou? In this we greatly rejoice. The personal rule of one individual would be the best form of government if that individual were perfectly good, infinitely wise, and abundant in power; and the reason why an autocrat turns into a despot is, that there is no man who is perfectly good, unselfish, or wise. God hath no fault or failing; and therefore it is a joy that He doeth according to His will. He never wills anything that is not strictly just; in the exercise of absolute sovereignty He is neither unjust nor unmerciful; it is not possible to Him to err, and therefore it is a great subject for joy that "the Lord reigneth, He is clothed with majesty."

Now, because God is the absolute Monarch, His word hath power about it, and of that word of power I am going to speak at this time. May the Holy Spirit help us to think of the power of God's word for four purposes—first, to excite our awe; secondly, to insure our obedience; thirdly, to inspire our confidence; and fourthly, to direct our efforts.

I. First, we would see the power of the word of the Lord in order of Him. What are we poor creatures of a day? What is there in us as we appear in God's sight? Do we not pass away as the flower of the field? As for our word, what is it? We sometimes talk exceedingly proudly, and we say "shall" and "will" as if we could do anything; when, after all, our word is but breath, a vapor, a mere sound in the air. Man proposes, but God disposes; man resolves, but God dissolves; that which man expecteth God rejecteth; for the word of the Lord standeth forever, but man passes away and is not.

Think of the day before all days when there was no day but the Ancient of days, and when God dwelt all alone; then He willed in His mind that there should be a world created. "He spake, and it was done; He commanded, and it stood fast." "By the word of the Lord were the heavens made; and all the host of them by the breath of His mouth." What a word is that which created all things!

And remember that this same word can destroy all things; for "the heavens and the earth, which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men." If He were but to speak, all things that are would melt away as a moment's foam dissolves into the wave that bears it, and is lost forever. "Thou turnest man to destruction; and sayest, Return, ye children of men"; and at that irresistible word man's spirit returns to God who gave it, and his body moulders into dust.

Think how God's word both makes alive and kills. He promised Abraham that he should have a seed in whom all the nations of the earth should be blessed. It seemed impossible that there should come from him a son that should be the founder of a race—his body was dead, and Sarah was old—yet God in due time made them to laugh, for Isaac was born into the house. "The Lord setteth the solitary in families." "He maketh the barren woman to keep house, and to be a joyful mother of children." It is the Lord who makes alive, and equally is it the Lord who kills. It only needs God to will it and the pestilence lays men low in heaps, like the grass of the meadow when the mower's scythe has passed over it. The Lord has but to call for pestilence or war, and myriads of men are laid low. Oh, how we ought to worship Thee, Thou dread Supreme, upon whose word life and death are made to hang!

I might in another division of this part of my subject remind you of the power which attends both His promises, and His threatenings. God has never promised without performing in due time to the last jot and tittle. Those that have resisted Him have found His threatenings to be true also; let Pharaoh confess how the plagues followed fast upon the word of the Lord till even his stout heart was melted within him. Men have gone on for awhile resisting God, and in their pride they have laughed Him to scorn, but by and by He has spoken to them in His wrath, and vexed them in His hot displeasure. Who can stand against this terrible God, whose word overthroweth the mighty, and casteth the proud beneath His feet?

There is

so that, when He tells what is to be in the future, we know that it shall come to pass. "Seek ye out of the book of the Lord, and read; no one of these shall fail, none shall want her mate." It seems impossible that the heathen should ever be the Lord's, or that the uttermost parts of the earth should be Christ's possession; but it will be, for the King hath said it, and "Where the word of a king is, there is power." We fear that the time will never arrive when peace shall reign through all the world, and when men shall hang the helmet in the hall, and study war no more; but the vision of faith shall yet become a fact, for "Where the word of a king is, there is power." He spoke of old of Edom and Moab, Philistia and Ammon, Ninevah and Babylon, Greece and Rome, and whatsoever He hath spoken hath been fulfilled. Not one word of the prophecies of Daniel and Ezekiel has failed of its accomplishment, and we may be sure that not one glorious vision of the seer of Patmos will remain a dream. Let us worship the great Ordainer, Benefactor, and Ruler, whose every word is the word of a king, in which there is power.

"His very word of grace is strong
As that which built the skies;
The voice that rolls the stars along Speaks all the promises."

II. Secondly, we would think of the power of God's word in order to it. Whenever God gives a word of command it comes to us clothed with authority, and its power over our minds should be immediate and unquestioned. To Christians the Word of God is the only rule of faith and practice. Our doctrine is of authority because it is God's word, and for no other reason. Our ordinances are valid because instituted by God's word; they are idle ceremonies if they be not so commanded. All the rites, rules, and regulations of man are of no value. The book of human decrees is not to be regarded in the Church of Christ. You may put in the front of it, "printed by authority," but to the Church of Christ it has no authority. You may adopt a creed as the standard of any particular church, but that gives it no authority to bind the conscience; it may be authorized by princes, bishops, and holy men, but wherein it differs from the word of the Lord, or adds thereto, it is to the children of God as a puff of wind.

TO INSURE OUR OBEDIENCE

THE SOLE AUTHORITY IN THE CHURCH is Christ Himself; He is the Head of His church, and His word is the only authority by which we are ruled; for "where the word of a king is, there is power," but all are usurpers who act as lords in the church, where Jesus alone is Master and Lord.

Let me refer you to what Solomon says in the second verse of this chapter, "I counsel thee to keep the king's commandment." This is admirable counsel for every Christian; if the commandment were of men, even the wisest of men, we might break it, and perhaps do right in breaking it; but if it be the King who gives the command, even the Lord Jesus Christ, who is the King in Zion, then the advice of the Preacher is wise and weighty—"I counsel thee to keep the king's commandment."

Perhaps some of you would ask me, "What is the best course for me to pursue in certain difficult cases?" "I counsel thee to keep the King's commandment." "But I am a young man just beginning life, and may get into trouble if I am rigidly scrupulous in doing that which is right." "I counsel thee to keep the King's commandment." "But at this present time I may lose my situation if I keep all His statutes. Could I not wink rather hard, and forget one of the commandments for a little while?" "I counsel thee to keep the King's commandment." If He be a King, then it is a solemn hazard to your soul if you come short of the least of His commandments. Remember that one treason makes a traitor; one leak sinks a ship; one fly spoils the whole box of ointment. He that bought us with His blood deserves to be obeyed in all things with all our heart, and mind, and soul, and strength. Such a King as we have ought never to hear us ask the reason why He commands, but we should be like the brave men of Balaclava, of whom the poet said:

"Theirs not to reason why,
Theirs not to make reply,
Theirs but to dare and die."

Solomon goes on to say, "Be not hasty to go out of His sight." There is such power in God's word that I would have you also obey this precept, and seek to remain in His presence. Some of His people seek to get away from their Lord instead of keeping close to Him. So little do they delight in communion with their God that they seem to say, "Whither shall I go from thy spirit? or whither shall I flee from thy presence?" Did it never happen to you as it did to Jonah, when he must needs go to Tarshish, though the Lord told him to go to Nineveh? He did not want such a large field of labor, such an anxious and unremunerative post of duty; he would rather go to a village-station, or to a seaside place. For a time he believed that Providence helped him, for he found a ship going to Tarshish. There are many which make sin easy and obedience difficult. The precept, not the providence, is the rule of duty. The providence which gave Judas the opportunity to sell his Master did not excuse that son of perdition. "So he paid the fare thereof, and went down into it, to go with them unto Tarshish from the presence of the Lord." Alas, poor Jonah!

I remember how I felt when first in London; I could not endure the horrible wilderness of bricks by which I was surrounded. I sighed for the green fields and the fresh air, and longed to get back to my country charge. But this kind of self-indulgence will not do: "Where the word of a king is, there is power," and wherever the King sends you, you must go, and go without questioning. If He should send you to preach at the gates of hell, go and preach there. "Be not hasty to go out of His sight," for if you get out of the sight of the King, if you no longer wait in His blessed presence, depend upon it, like Jonah, you will fall into trial, tempest, sinking, and terror. There may be no whale to swallow you, and cast you up again; they are not so plentiful now as they were then; and you may not be delivered so easily as Jonah.

Keep in the Lord's presence and favor, no matter where you may have to go in order to do so. Walk in communion with Christ in whatever path He may point out to you. Never mind how rough it is; do not imagine it is the wrong road because it is so rough; rather reckon it to be right because it is rough, for seldom do smoothness and rightness go together. Oh, to abide in Christ the Word, and to have His word abiding in us!

Solomon then says, "Stand not in an evil thing." There is such power in the Word of God that He can readily destroy you, or heavily chastise you, therefore be quick to amend, and "stand not in an evil thing." Repent, obey, submit, confess, seek pardon at once. "Be ye not as the horse, or as the mule, which have no understanding; whose mouth must be held in with bit and bridle." Have a tender mouth; let God guide you with His eye, let a word be enough for you, do not need a bit or bridle. I wish we all had great tenderness of conscience. We should tremble at God's word, and humble ourselves in the dust before Him, praying to be cleansed by His grace.

III. And now, thirdly,

TO INSPIRE OUR CONFIDENCE,

let us think that "where the word of a king is, there is power." If there is a heart here that is seeking mercy, if you can go before God with such a promise as this in your mouth, "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him return unto the Lord, and He will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for He will abundantly pardon," that word of His is not a mere sound, there is the power of truth in it. If you do what He there bids you do you shall find that He can and will abundantly pardon. Whatever sins you have committed, though they are too many to count, and too awful to mention, if you will come and trust yourself with Jesus Christ, God's word is, that you shall be saved; and saved you shall be.

Do you tell me that you cannot conquer your evil passions and corrupt desires? Here is a promise from the word of the Lord, "From all your filthiness, and from all your idols, will I cleanse you. A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you." Now come and plead these precious promises, there is power in them, they are the words of a King, and if you plead them at the mercy-seat you shall become a new creature in Christ Jesus; old things shall pass away; all things shall become new. When you get a promise from God treat it as undoubted truth, and rely upon it as you do upon the promise of your father or your friend.

There are men around you whose promises you never can believe; when they promise to pay you, you dare not regard it as an asset in business, for you are too sadly aware that you have a little bundle of their I O U's already, and you have had a view of their

and cheques indorsed with "no effects." But God's word is not like that of false and fickle mortals. No charge of falsehood or failure can be brought against the God of truth. He has never broken His word yet, and He never will. Then, dear souls, if you want forgiveness of sin and renewal of heart, get the promise to that effect, and believe it with all your soul; and as sure as it is the word of a King you shall be washed in the blood and in the water which flowed from the wounded side of the crucified Christ.

And you Christian people, are there any of you who are struggling at this time with a remaining corruption which you cannot conquer? Now come and lay hold of the promise that you shall overcome, and plead it before the mercy-seat. If you do but get any promise of God suited to your case, make quick use of it, for there is power in it; it is the word of a King!

Then, also, are there any of you in great trouble? I cannot know all your cases, but if any one of you has a trial which you could not tell, or a trouble, which if you did tell it nobody could help you out of, go and spread it before the Lord. Remember His word, "Many are the afflictions of the righteous: but the Lord delivereth him out of them all." Go and tell Him that He has thus spoken, and that He has therein pledged Himself to deliver you out of all afflictions; and be sure of this, He will be as good as His word.

Do you expect soon to die? Are you somewhat distressed because sickness is undermining your constitution? Be not afraid, for His Spirit teaches you to sing, "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." Go and tell the Lord of His own word, and you will look forward to death without fear.

IV. Fourthly, I am coming to my last point, on which I shall crave a little time; and here I intend to address myself to all people of God who are associated in church-fellowship, and striving to do the Lord's service. My text is to be used

TO DIRECT YOUR EFFORTS.

You need power; not the power of money, or mind, or influence, or numbers; but "power from on high." All other power may be desirable, but this power is indispensable. Spiritual work can only be done by spiritual power. I counsel you in order to get spiritual power in all that you do to keep the King's commandment, for "where the word of a king is, there is power." Lay not a stone of your spiritual church without His overseeing; do all things according as He has ordained; regard Him as the wise Master-builder, and be all of you under the command of His word. The day cometh when much that has been built shall be destroyed, for the fire will try every man's work of what sort it is.

It is very easy to heap up a church with wood, hay, and stubble, which the fire will soon destroy; and it is very hard work to build one up with gold, silver, and precious stones; for these are rare materials, and must be diligently sought for, laboriously prepared, and carefully guarded. The materials that will stand the fire of temptation, trial, death, and the like, are not to be brought together by any word but the word of the Lord; but these alone are worth having. I had sooner have half a dozen Christian people, truly spiritual and obedient to the word of the Lord in all things, than I would have half a dozen thousands of nominal Christians who neither care about the word nor the King. If you want power, keep the King's commandment, keep close to it in all things, and make it the law of your house and the motto of your flag.

Let us take care that we

for power, for that will be leaving the fountains of living waters to hew out to ourselves broken cisterns which hold no water. I fear that some Christian people have been looking in many other directions for the power which can only be found in the word of the King. At one time we were told that power lay in an educated ministry; people said, "We must have a minister who knows Greek and Latin; you cannot save souls unless you are familiar with the heathen classics." This superstition has suffered many a blow from the manifest successes of those whose only language is the grand old Saxon. Then the cry was, "Well, really, we do not want these men of education; we need fluent speakers, men who can tell a great many anecdotes and stories. These are men of power." I hope we shall outgrow this delusion also.

The Lord works by either of these classes of men, or by others who have not the qualifications of either of them, or by another sort of men, or fifty sorts of men, so long as they keep to the word of the King, in which there is power. There is power in the Gospel if it be preached by a man utterly without education; unlearned men have done great things by the power of the word. The polished doctor of divinity has been equally useful when he has kept to his Master's word. But if either of these has forgotten to make Christ's word first and last, the preaching has been alike powerless, whether uttered by the illiterate or the profound.

Others have thought it necessary, in order to have power among the masses (that is the cant phrase), that there should be

FINE MUSIC.

An organ is nowadays thought to be the power of God; and a choir is a fine substitute for the Holy Ghost. They have tried that kind of thing in America, where solos and quartets enable singing men and singing women to divide their services between the church and the theatre. Some churches have paid more attention to the choir than to the preaching. I do not believe in it. If God had meant people to be converted in that way, He would have sent them a command to attend the music-halls and operas, for there they will get far better music than we can hope to give them.

If there be charms in music to change the souls of men from sin to holiness, and if the preaching of the Gospel will not do it, let us have done with Peter and Paul, with Chalmers and with Chrysostom, and let us exalt Mozart and Handel into their places, and let the great singers of the day take the places of the pleaders for the Lord. Even this would not content the maniacs of this age, for with the music-room they crave the frippery of the theatre. We must keep to the King's word if we desire to have this spiritual power for the Lord's work.

If we want to win souls for Christ we must use the word of God to do it. Other forms of good work languish unless the Gospel is joined with them. Set about reforming, civilizing, and elevating the people, and you will lose your time unless you evangelize them. The total-abstinence movement is good, and I would that all would aid it, but it effects little unless the Gospel furnishes the motive and the force. It will win its way in proportion as it is carried on in subordination to the Gospel, and is viewed as a means to reach a still higher end. The rod works no wonder till Moses grasps it; and moral teaching has small force till Jesus operates by it.

There is power in accepting that word, in getting it into you, or receiving it. You never keep the truth till you have received this word of a King, into your spiritual being, and absorbed it into your spiritual nature. Oh, that you might every one of you eat the word, live on it, and make it your daily food!

And then, there is power in the practicing of it. Where there is life through the King's word, it will be a strong life. The sinner's life is a feeble life; but an obedient life, an earnest Christian life, is a life of strength. Even those who hate it and abhor it cannot help feeling that there is a strange influence about it which they cannot explain, and they must respect it.

You will see its

POWER TO FILL THE PLACE.

There is nothing so attractive as the gospel of Christ. A certain minister preached Universalism, or the doctrine that everybody would be saved in the end, and after a time his chapel became empty. His neighbor, who preached that those who did not believe would be lost forever, had his house full. One day the Universalist met his neighbor, and asked him, "How is it that the people come to you when you preach that unbelievers will be sent to hell, and they do not come to me though I tell them that in the end they will all be in heaven?" The other replied, "They suspect that what I tell them is true, and that what you tell them is false." Where gentlemen of this order have been preaching, people have sense enough to come to the conclusion that if what they say is false it is not wise to hear them, and if what they say is true there is no need to hear them.

When you preach the Gospel,

SOULS WILL BE SAVED.

To secure that end you must stick to the Gospel, for that is the one means ordained by God for the conversion of sinners. The other day a Gospel minister spoke to a woman who had attended certain revival services, in which there was much shouting of "Come to Jesus," but nothing about Jesus. She said, "I heard you preach this afternoon, and if what you preached is true, then I am a lost woman. I have been converted ten times already." Ah me! what is the use of such poor work as this? We must teach the King's word if our work is to be blessed to the salvation of souls.

Preach the King's word, for it will give you power in private prayer, power in the Sunday-school, power in the prayer-meeting, power in everything that you do; because you will live upon the King's own word, and His word is meat to the soul. The prophet said, "Thy words were found, and I did eat them; and thy word was unto me the joy and rejoicing of mine heart." If you try this meat you will all find it is nourishing to you also. The Lord bless you, and grant that it may be so. Amen.

EXPLOSION IN THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT OFFICES.

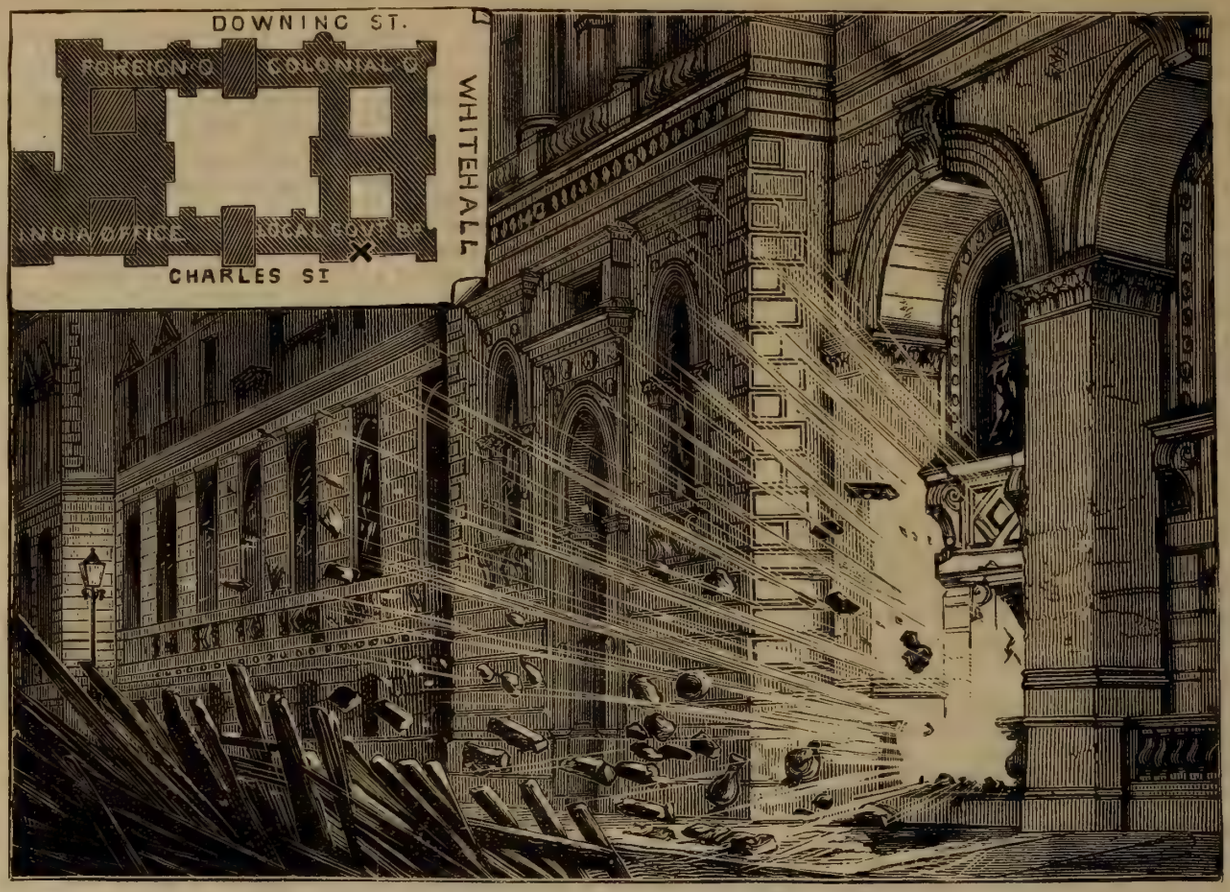
As already narrated under the heading of Foreign Topics in The Christian Herald of March 22d, all England was startled on March 15th by the news that one of the offices of the Government had been partially destroyed by an explosion of dynamite.

On the night of March 15th, about nine o'clock, while Parliament was sitting, a loud explosion was heard, shaking the windows and doors of the Legislative Chamber, and suspending the attention of the members. The explosion had taken place at no great distance, indeed, from the House of Commons, great damage having been caused, as was afterward discovered, to the Local Government Board Office at the corner of the handsome pile of public buildings accommodating the Indian and Foreign Secretaries. (The cross on the picture of the ground-plan shows the precise point where the explosion took place.)

It was clear that a treasonable attempt of apparently Fenian origin had been made. By what may or may not prove a mere coincidence, this infamous act befel almost simultaneously with an incendiary attempt, of apparently similar character, committed on the premises of the Times newspaper office.

The attempt appears of the most ominous nature, and an eye-witness supplies the following account: "At nine o'clock I happened to be within the precincts of the Houses of Parliament, at Westminster. Big Ben had struck the hour, and just as the sound was dying away, a tremendous explosion rent the air. The noise was as loud and not at all unlike the firing off of a cannon. One's first thought was whether a great gas explosion had occurred. If it were not that, what was it? Was it a peal of thunder? No, the state of the atmosphere precluded the very idea, the heavens being clear and bright. What was it, then? Was it dynamite?

"After a little delay, one ran across Palace Yard, from whence hundreds of excited persons were to be observed running through Parliament Street toward the new Government offices in Whitehall. The roadway in Parliament Street was strewn with myriads of fragments of glass. At the Whitehall Club and the various large offices adjacent not a sound pane of glass was to be seen, and the people were looking out of the windows wondering what it was that had caused the panic.



The Explosion in the British Government Building on March 15.

"Arriving at the point where Charles Street and King Street converge, the seat of the mischief was soon discovered. A cordon of police surrounded this section of the Government offices, keeping the stretch from Whitehall on the one side to St. James's Park on the other clear of the mob. The police were vigilant, but after a little manœuvring I managed to elude them and to get to the Local Government Board Office in Charles Street, where a truly remarkable scene presented itself.

"The whole of the windows along the last-named department, as well as the India Office—a distance of 150 yards—had been shattered, and the heavy plate-glass lay literally in heaps in the street. On the right-hand side of entrance to the Local Government Board Office a portion of the structure had been blown away, not as the result of a gas explosion assuredly, for not the slightest smell of gas was to be detected.

"The part of the building which had been especially damaged was a clerks' office on the basement. The massive balustrade in front of the window and the heavy stonework surrounding it had been demolished, and the office was in a complete state of wreck. The flooring had been torn up and the desks and other paraphernalia destroyed."

The residents in Parliament Street sustained a considerable shock to their nerves and no slight damage to their plate-glass windows by the explosion, the strength of which may be judged by the fact that houses more than two hundred yards off seriously suffered. Immediately after the occurrence extra guards of military and police were placed about the Government offices, and additional precautions were also taken for the protection of State Ministers.

This attempt on the part of the minions of lawlessness is only a further illustration of the spirit which is predicted to become dominant about the middle of the outpouring of the Sixth Vial (Revelation 16 : 12–14), and whose energetic and portentous development is already so strikingly manifest in the Communism of France, the Socialism of Germany, the Nihilism of Russia, and the Black Hand of Spain.

COOPER INSTITUTE.

The Institute founded by the late Peter Cooper, as described on page 243, and of which a picture is here given, is doing a work more beneficent and extensive than even New Yorkers who see something of it, generally conceive. The following account condensed from an exhaustive article published by the New York Herald will give some idea of its benefits :

The title of "The Cooper Union, Established for the Advancement of Science and Art," expresses a high purpose, but falls far short of conveying any idea of the vast range of the good work of the Union. The advancement of science and art is well enough, but to teach, without one cent of charge, 40,000 men and women to earn a good living at skilled trades ; to cultivate, without money and without price, the hands and brains of scores of thousands so that they may advance themselves in the world, and to exalt, mentally, morally and physically, the poor and friendless, are far nobler objects.

WHAT THE SCHOOLS OF THE COOPER UNION DO is to give boys and girls that practical education which will be inestimably valuable to them in their trades and professions and enable them to earn bread and butter, and a something besides, for their families.

The actual work of the Cooper Union is one of the largest of any educational institution in the world. The reading room furnishes amusement and instruction to over two thousand people every day, and over three hundred papers and magazines and five hundred books are called for. It is open from eight in the morning until ten at night every day, and every respectable person is admitted without restriction. It is the largest reading room in the country, is well lighted and comfortable, and fully supplied with the periodical literature of many languages.

But the reading room is the least important part of the educational machinery of Cooper Union. The number of pupils who entered the various classes last year was 3334. And besides these there are public lectures every Saturday night during the fall and winter in the great hall of the Union, where about two thousand people assemble once every week to hear the most distinguished men in the country discourse upon the questions of the day in science, art and literature.

The schools occupy the greater part of the building. The whole of the large structure above the reading room, which is on the second floor, is divided into class rooms and devoted to educational purposes of a wide range. Large as is the number of pupils, there would be many more if the building would accommodate them. The demand is growing every year, and in all the departments the applicants seeking admission far exceed the accommodations. In some classes the number of those who were turned away at the beginning of the present year was greater than the number admitted. The pupils are received on the simple rule of first come first served, the necessary qualifications on the part of the applicant being good character, a suitable age and an expressed intention to turn the advantages of the institution to industrial purpose and self support. Great care is taken to select for admission those who are the least able to pay the usual charges of educational institutions for special instruction. Young men and girls with poor parents, or who are dependent upon their own resources, are always given the first choice.

The art school admits over 1200 pupils during the term, and teaches them drawing in perspective, mechanical and architectural drawing, drawing from the cast, form drawing, industrial drawing, free hand drawing and modelling in clay. The students join whatever classes they please, choosing those, of course, which will best fit them for the calling which they expect to follow. Nearly all the pupils work at their trades during the day, and attend the schools at night. The hours are from half-past seven to half-past nine, and every class-room is occupied every evening. The students must be over fifteen years of age and have a good rudimentary education in reading, writing and arithmetic. The majority are lads of from eighteen to twenty serving their time in workshop or office, but it is a common sight to see a middle-aged man standing by the side of a boy of seventeen.

THE SCIENTIFIC CLASSES.

Most of those in the scientific classes are embryo machinists, designers, artistic woodworkers, stone-cutters, jewellers, painters and workers in metals. Stationery, materials required in the chemical and modelling classes, etc., are furnished free, and text books are sold at cost price.

There are some forty ladies in the engraving class. The advanced pupils do clever work and are employed on the Century magazine and other publications. There are sixty or more young ladies who study telegraphing. The Western Union Telegraph Company has so far interested itself in this school as to pay a teacher who trains the pupils in the thorough methods of that company. It can thus draw competent operators for its offices from this school, and it has provided a large proportion of the graduates of this school, in times past, with employment on its lines, although it is under no special obligation to provide a place for any.

The last thing Mr. Cooper did before he died was to purchase six typewriters. Instruction in their use has been added to the women's schools, and it has been found a very useful adjunct. Work can easily be procured for girls who understand this process of copying.

In summing up this brief view of the Cooper Union the thoughtful mind will reflect on the fact that with a sum of money less than the annual expenditure of many a wealthy family in this city the Cooper Union counts its yearly beneficiaries by the thousands. This institution not only bestows its charity in the best form—that of promoting self-dependence and intellectual training for the work of life.

PETER BLAKE'S VOYAGE.

A SERIAL STORY BY HESBA STRETTON.

Peter Engages to Go.

THE autumn was sweeping along irresistibly over land and sea, putting summer to flight with ever-shortening days and nights of deeper darkness. For some time past the morning mists had been gathering more thickly on the river and in the streets of London, giving due warning of the denser fogs that were about to follow in their wake. The wind had been easterly, with a touch of northerly in it when it veered at all. The Thames was of a more slaty hue than it had been in the sunnier light of summer. But it had been calm still weather for some days; and when the mist rolled away each day toward noon, a light, bright blue sky shone overhead, with soft clouds floating slowly westward before the low east wind.

Down at Wapping, in the High Street, where the houses toward the river have almost all been turned into wharves and warehouses, there was a good deal of stir and activity. Vessels lay outside to be laden; and the clanking of the cranes lowering the cargoes into the holds might be heard all day. But for sounds like this Wapping would have been the quietest spot in London. No omnibuses were passing; and there were not many trains running to the little station on the bank of the river.

A little shop here and there was doing a struggling business in nails, wooden dolls, and red herrings. In some dark windows there was an attempt at a display of tempting literature; and penny books were dangling along a string stretched across the lower panes, such as "The Story of Cinderella," "Jack the Giant Killer," and "Mother Goose." In the public-house windows might be seen some ancient number of Punch, much soiled and yellow with age. But for the stir and business about the wharves and docks, Wapping on an autumn day is not a spot where a man out of work will feel his spirits happiest and brightest.

It was quite plain that Peter Blake did not find his spirits high. He had been gazing vacantly for some time through the railings of St. John's churchyard, where the moist yellow leaves were falling slowly from the trees upon the damp graves and stained headstones below them; but at last he moved listlessly away, and sauntered homeward into High Street. His feet stopped, as if of themselves, before the blackboard at the police station, and he read the notices on it slowly and carefully, his lips moving with each word. They were all of bodies found drowned. He read through each description, the supposed age, the color of the hair and complexion, the marks by which their friends, if they had any, might identify them; but he hardly paid attention to these details. There was a general vague impression on his mind that six or seven persons had been drowned lately in the Thames; but what was that compared with the loss of life at sea?

That he was a seaman any one could see at a glance. His face, young as it was, was weather-worn, and had fine lines on it which would soon be deep enough to be called wrinkles. His gray eyes were deep-set, and gleamed out from under his eyebrows, as if he knew himself bound to keep a sharp look-out both afloat and ashore. He was thin and slight, but wiry, and could climb a mast as quickly as any sailor of his acquaintance.

There was a limber suppleness about him not altogether English. When you came to know that his mother had been a French fisherman's daughter, from the coast of Normandy, you could account for the spring and elasticity of his frame, as well as for its strength and toughness. A first-rate mariner without a doubt; if only he was as good a man in other ways.

"Hullo, Blake!" cried a cheery voice behind him, "you're the very fellow I'm searching for."

Peter turned quickly from his study of the dismal list, and faced a man with a frank, pleasant face, weather-worn like his own; but his hair was white, and his skin deeply furrowed with wrinkles, though he was scarcely past middle age. Peter took off his blue cap, but at the same time stretched out his hand, which was cordially shaken by the person who had spoken to him.

"Good-day, captain," he said; "you've been searching for me?"

"High and low, Peter," he answered. "Come, now, I want one more good fellow to make up my crew—one man and a cabin boy. The pay's good; I'm not bound to stint the pay. There will be fourteen of you. Come. You know the sort of skipper I am; and I know you. You may come upon pretty much your own terms. Choose your own berth, and there's only the mate's I can't give you."

"I've half promised Bessie to give up the sea," said Peter, with a smile.

"And a fine land-lubber you'd make of yourself!" cried the captain, contemptuously. "What could a fine fellow like you do? Turn counter-jumper, eh? and measure out yards of ribbon and tape? and sell pins and needles? No, no. Stick to the sea, my lad; stick to the sea. There's more danger for you and me ashore than afloat."

"You and me, we've seen plenty of danger afloat, though, captain," answered Peter.

"Ay, lad," he said, "there's perils by sea and perils by land, as the Bible tells us; but give me the perils by sea. Let me go and talk to Bessie, and old madam, your mother. It's the French blood in you talks of giving up the sea."

"No, no," answered Peter, warmly; "it's the rowdy crews, and the drinking captains, and the rotten old boats, and the thought of Bessie and the children and my old mother thrown on cold charity and the wild world, if aught happened to me. There's times and times I think that a God-fearing man, and a man that loves the poor things hanging on him for life, has no call to go to sea."

"Well! I'm none of your drinking captains," said Captain Norcott, heartily, "and the crew is no rowdier than can be helped, and the boat's not rotten. You can go and see for yourself. She's the Dolphin, and they're loading her at Penrose's wharf, hard by."

"I wouldn't set my foot aboard one of Penrose's boats; no, not for a thousand pound down," exclaimed Peter.

"Did I say it was Penrose's boat?" asked the captain. "They're only loading her; a miscellaneous cargo. She's as pretty a sailing vessel as ever you saw, and rides on the water like a bird; sails as white as milk, and as freshly painted as if a royal princess was expected aboard. Blake, do you think I'd go out in her, if I didnt think she was all right, and my poor old wife left behind, crying and praying for me all the while I'm away?"

"Where is she bound for?" inquired Peter.

"A mere run to Algiers, my lad," he said, "and there you'll be no end of use to me, with your French lingo. Come; I'll not stint your pay. Why! if the wind keeps fair, we shall run down the Channel like a steamer, and be home again before the women's eyes have lost their redness from crying. To Algiers! It's nothing, just nothing. I'm not asking you to go to the Pacific, or the North Pole. Come on; and let me reason a bit with Bessie and the old mother. You promise them some fine gimcrack or furbelow, and they'll let you go fast enough."

"We're living down here, in Wapping," said Peter; "it's close by. Bessie has a sort of cousin, a sailmaker, and he gives her a lodgement in the house rent free, to look after it a bit; but he doesn't live there himself. I'll lead the way, captain."

The sailmaker's house was not many yards distant. As Captain Norcott and Peter ascended the staircase to the second floor, they heard a young boyish voice singing loudly, and a woman's soft sweet note chiming in. The words of the chorus rang clearly out, as they stood for a minute listening at the closed door:

"We're out on the ocean sailing,
To a home beyond the tide."

"That's Victor and Bessie," said Peter, with a smile of pride; "they're always at it, specially Victor."

Quietly he opened the door, and Captain Norcott saw a large, old-fashioned room, with a deep bow-window, looking out upon that part of the Thames called the Pool. The ceiling was low, and discolored by time; and the wainscotted walls had been painted of a color which it was now impossible to tell. There was little furniture in it, but it was good and clean, and a bright fire was burning without ashes in the large old grate.

On one side of the fireplace stood a huge antique wooden cradle, with long rockers, beside which sat an old Frenchwoman, with dark, brilliant eyes, and a withered sallow face, which seemed the sallower from the whiteness of the cap she wore. She was rocking the heavy cradle with one foot, while her thin yellow hands were busy knitting a sailor's cap. Bessie was getting tea ready, and was standing for a minute waiting for the kettle to boil. Victor, a bright handsome boy of thirteen, was nursing fondly a little girl of about five years of age. Peter paused for a few seconds, and Captain Norcott stood silent, looking on at the pleasant little home before him, while a sudden thought of the rough life on board flashed across him. The only one who saw them at the door was the child on Victor's knee, who stared solemnly and shyly at the stranger.

"Mother! here's Captain Norcott," said Peter loudly. The singing suddenly ceased, and the two women felt a sharp pang of dread. The sight of a sea captain in their pleasant room was a sure sign of a coming sorrow.

"Ay! you know what I'm come for, Bessie," said the captain, shaking hands with her and the old mother; "it's for Peter again. You must be a brave lass, and bid your husband go along with me. He's willing, if you are. A short voyage; good pay; no bullying, and as much of his own way as he can get. Those are the terms; come, don't let his shipmates say he's tied to his wife's apron-strings, and turned molly-cot."

"You men don't know what it is," said Bessie, half crying, "sitting in the house, and watching, and waiting, and seeing the storms blow up, and hearing the wind howl, and thinking of Peter in some nasy old ship that's only fit for firewood. I only wish Peter had to do it, and he'd soon find work on land or on the river."

"The ship, is it a good ship?" asked the old mother, staying her busy foot and hands; "is it a very good, strong, large ship. Peter is my very good son, and he must go in a very good ship. His father, Peter Blake, my husband, was a good man, and he voyaged in a bad ship, and he came back never, never."

"She is a very good ship, madam," answered Captain Norcott, speaking loudly, as if the old Frenchwoman was deaf; "Peter can go and see her, and I hope he will. Why, there's me and a dozen more ready to run the risk, what risk there is, and Peter is as brave as any one of us. Don't make him a coward. Peter's calling is to the sea, and he'll do no good off it. Fleck's one of the crew, and if there's any danger, catch Fleck going. You all know what Fleck is. He'll only go when there's a good job on hand."

"Fleck's a coward," said Bessie, more hopefully; "he's been in jail twice for breaking articles. Now if Peter signs he'll go; there'd be no keeping him back. But suppose Fleck deserted at the last minute again?"

"If Fleck's signed articles it's all right," said Peter; "he knows his boat, you may depend on it. He's not going aboard any old one, and he's not going to run himself into jail again. But I'll go down and look at her myself, and then I'll sign. I'm thinking I must go with you this once, captain."

Victor had pushed himself forward in the little group, and stood looking up intently into his brother's face, as if his own fate hung upon his decision. Now he uttered a shout of gladness, and caught Peter's arm between both his hands.

"And take me as cabin boy!" he cried; "mother'll let me go with you, Peter. I've been out to Dunkirk many a time, and to Havre twice. I know a boat almost as well as you do, Peter."

"Ay, it's true," said Peter, looking to the captain; "you know Victor, sir. I'll answer for him being obedient and trustworthy, and I don't deny I'd like having him along with me."

"Why, this is just as it should be," answered Captain Norcott; "I'm in want of a cabin-boy, and Victor's a born seaman. Only look here; you must decide sharp. We must go out with the tide to-morrow, and if you don't come I've to find others that will. Go down and see her at once, Blake; it's light enough yet, and they're getting her cargo in as fast as they can. Let me know to-night if you'll come or no. I'm lodging in Red Lion Street, hard by."

"Are you sure it is a very good ship?" asked the mother, eagerly; "they are my two only sons. In France one takes care the ships are good enough, but here in England you do all as you please. If I was a sailor I would go tap, tap all over the ship before I say I will go. My poor husband, he laughed at me, but all the same his good ship did break up like a little match-box, and he drowned himself. If my two only sons drowned themselves, what must we do, Bessie and me, and the two little babies?"

"You trust them to me," shouted the captain, "and I'll bring them safe home again. I knew your husband, madam, and he was a brave man. Now, Blake, go and look at the Dolphin, and let me know what you mean to do."

Captain Norcott walked back to Red Lion Street slowly and thoughtfully. For some days past there had been a few teasing doubts and suspicions troubling him, which seemed to have gathered tenfold strength when set against the little home scene he had just left. All the rest of his crew he had found and engaged about the docks and wharfs, where the transaction had been a mere matter of business. But he had gone with Peter Blake into his home; he had seen his old mother, a foreigner and stranger, and his little children, and his anxious young wife. The unwelcome misgivings that had been haunting him about the good ship Dolphin were certainly deepened by the interview. He had spoken cheerily and confidently to the women, because he looked upon them as timid creatures who would be afraid of the best vessel that sailed on the seas. But was the Dolphin as good a ship as he had assured them she was?

Captain Norcott was an honest man and a well-known careful commander. He took every reasonable precaution, in his own opinion. There was not a spark of cowardice in his nature, and the risk of the present voyage did not appear to him so great as many he had run into with his eyes open. But he had been on shore some time, and he was eager to be off again. He did not know for certain that the Dolphin was not thoroughly seaworthy; though he had a shrewd suspicion that she belonged only nominally to Blackburn, the owner whose name appeared on the ship's papers.

Penrose was the real owner—old Penrose, whose name was notorious among seafaring men and at insurance offices. Penrose was superintending the lading, and the cargo was not of such a character as to remove the captain's doubts. He wished he had not told Peter so positively that the Dolphin did not belong to Penrose. He did not think for a moment of drawing back from his own engagement, but he hesitated when he thought of Peter Blake and the bright young lad Victor. If harm came of this what would these two helpless women say to him?

He turned sharply about to hurry back to the sailmaker's house. But the recollection came to him of the emphatic manner in which he had assured them all that the ship was good. Well! no doubt she was good enough; he had nothing definite to say against her. And if the story got wind and reached Penrose's ears, how could he explain himself? Besides, it would be better for all sides to take a steady, trusty, able seaman like Peter, and a brisk intelligent boy like Victor, than pick up any idle loafers he might find hanging about the docks. The voyage would be all the safer with such good hands on board; and if he failed in getting the full crew, he knew very well old Penrose would send the Dolphin to sea under-manned.

Surely the chances were at least even. The weather was calm and the wind favorable. His crew was a fair one, taken altogether, though the mate was a stranger to him—a man of the name of Blackburn, related to the owner, and put in by Penrose. But he knew quite half his men. Peter Blake in himself was worth three of the others. No; he could not let Blake off. All that a captain could do he would to insure the success of the voyage. He would hold himself ready to sacrifice property to life at the first certainty of danger. He would not run the risks he should feel it to be his duty to if he knew assuredly his vessel to be a sound one. No! no! The crew should be saved whatever else was lost.

He strolled down to the water's edge and looked at the shipping in the river. They were still busy at Penrose's wharf, and he could see the long arm of the crane swinging to and fro as the cargo was being lowered into the hold. A man and a boy stood near, looking on. They must be Peter Blake and Victor. Well! They should decide for themselves. Peter was quite as able to form an opinion as himself; he knew a good boat when he saw one. The captain turned away, and walked off to his quiet, old-fashioned lodging in Red Lion Street.

In about an hour's time he was called away from his fireside to speak to a sailor at the house-door. It was Peter Blake, and Victor's eager young face met the captain's eye as they stood in the light of the street lamp. He scarcely knew what he wished them to say. They would be valuable to him; but the thought of those women and the little children still weighed heavily on his heart.

"Well, Blake!" he said.

"We'll sign articles to-morrow captain," answered Peter; "Fleck says she's all right, and I don't see aught amiss with her as yet. We'll go."

PETER WORKING MIRACLES.

S. S. Lesson for April 29, Acts 9: 22, 43. Golden Text, ver. 34. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Peter's Journey — His Commission — The Sick Man at Lydda—The Commission Fulfilled—Co-operation Essential—The Faith in Action—Influence of the Cure on the Church and the World—The Responsibility for Lukewarmness—Peter's Peculiar Mission—Its First Exercise—The Chamber of the Dead — Difference in Results — Spiritual and Physical Work Simultaneous—The Fool's Cry—The Signs of the Last Times.

THE last we heard of Peter and John was that on their departure from Samaria "they returned to Jerusalem, and preached the Gospel in many villages of the Samaritans." Whether it was on the course of this journey or whether in a pastoral journey later on we read, "It came to pass, as Peter passed through all quarters, he came down also to the saints which dwelt at Lydda." It is not impossible that he would go round by Lydda on his way to Jerusalem; but it is more than probable that the glorious results of his journey and John's to Samaria, had led him to inquire of the Lord whether it were not His will that he should visit other places where the disciples who had been driven out of Jerusalem by persecution were winning souls to Jesus. And it may be that the Lord had guided Him to go alone (it does not seem that John was now with him), and that in the course of his travels he had come to Lydda.

His mission was "to the saints which dwelt at Lydda." But when Peter was first called to be an apostle, and when he, as one of the twelve, received his vocation to "preach the Gospel," he was commanded equally to

"HEAL THE SICK."

Jesus said to them, "As ye go, preach, saying, The Kingdom of Heaven is at hand. Heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead, cast out devils; freely ye have received, freely give (Matt. 10:7, 8, see also Mark. 3:14, 15; 6:7, 12, 13; Luke. 9:1). And this command was substantially repeated after the resurrection when Jesus said, "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature. . . . And these signs shall follow them that believe. . . . they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover."

There was a sick man in Lydda; no uncommon thing: very likely there were many more. We are not told how Peter found him out. It may be that news of the marvellous tide of healing which immediately followed the outpouring of the Holy Ghost, had reached Lydda, and it may be that friends of the sick man had told Peter of him. Or it may be that God told Peter of him and sent him directly to him. Eight years this poor man had kept his bed afflicted with the palsy. It would not be difficult to find out many who have been bedridden twice or three times as long; there is nothing so very remarkable about his sickness. But Peter came to him as a man sent from God, and said to him, "Eneas, Jesus Christ maketh thee whole; arise, and make thy bed."

Peter's commission was fulfilled; he could do no more. There was no power in him to heal the man, he must himself put forth faith. Just as when we lead a sinner to Christ, we may put him in the way, we may show him how completely his salvation is a finished work, we may tell him he has but to claim it, letting go himself and his sins, but then we can do no more; we cannot break with his sins for him, we cannot take the step of faith for him; if he does not himself accept Jesus, he remains unsaved. So it is with healing: we may show a poor sick one how Jesus took his infirmities and bore his sicknesses, we may show him the many blessed encouragements there are in the Word of God to put his case into the Lord's hands, we may pray over him and anoint him with oil in the name of the Lord, but unless he himself puts forth the hand of faith, we have no more power to heal him than we have to save his soul. Eneas acted faith, "he arose immediately." Wherever a poor sick one responds thus to the received command of Jesus, whether through the Word of God, or directly through the voice of the Holy Spirit, God honors his faith, and he is healed.

Eneas was just like those who are healed in our own day, he seems to have made it known around, and it produced a profound impression; men were surely less hardened in those days than now, there was a deeper sense of awe at the manifest working of God in their very midst. Satan had not then inaugurated and attempted an organized disturbance of religious meetings; there was left some fear of God, which in these last days seems to have vanished from our midst. There must have been a glorious revival, for "all that dwelt in Lydda and Saron saw him (Eneas) and turned to the Lord." These men only wanted to know the truth in order to receive it; oh, for such hearers nowadays; we seem to have reached the culmination of daring defiance of God, and what has brought it about? Instrumentally, I say without hesitation, the unrighteous, unholy, worldly lives of professing Christians. Men, even men of God, affirm that healing and miracles were needed in the time of Christ and His apostles, in order to convince men of the truth of the Gospel, but that in these days of light and knowledge there is no longer need of them. Surely, surely, if they were needed when the Son of God was on earth in person, and when men bowed in multitudes to that which they recognized as His working, surely now this manifest power of God is needed when men who know the truth and some of whom have tasted of its power yet deny, blaspheme and oppose their God.

Peter had another mission; one which was not given to the seventy as healing was (Luke 10:9) and which was not among the signs which should follow "them that believe." (Mark 16: 17, 18). Peter was also told to raise the dead. In the life of our Lord, we notice that only in three cases did He raise the dead, and do not read in the Acts of the Apostles of any other than one of the apostles acting as God's instrument in raising the dead. Probably the twelve and Paul had special instruction from God in regard to this matter.

A well-known disciple among the little flock of Christians in Joppa fell sick and died. This was no small loss to the church; for this good woman "was full of good works and alms deeds which she did." Had she lived in our own day, she would not have held a mother's meeting once a week, and helped a little in a mission just when everybody else was there, and it was so pleasant; afterward returning to a life of ease, comfort, and self-indulgence. Dorcas was she needed nothing from the world to fill up the interstices, she was full already; to serve Christ sufficed. She was not one of those who needed recreation; to her it was all holiday, because it was all for Jesus. It was a blessed life, and no doubt to die was gain to her. But, as in Paul's case, the Lord saw that to abide in the flesh was more needful for His little church. The friends of the dead woman washed her and "laid her in an upper chamber." No doubt many came to see the remains of one who gave herself unreservedly for God and for them; but knowing that Peter was at Lydda they sent two men to beg him not to delay to come unto them. He "arose, and went with them," and they took him into the chamber of death. Sorrow and lamentation were there, the good deeds of Dorcas were in the mouth of everybody. But Peter had a message from God, and he put them all forth, and like Elisha with the Shunamite's child, he was shut in alone with God and with the dead. He kneeled down and prayed, and he knew that he was answered, for "turning him to the body, he said, Tabitha, arise, and she opened her eyes; and when she saw Peter, she sat up."

It was the first time he had exercised this part of his commission, and he was small enough to be trusted by God to do it. He was no longer the boasting man, who said, "Though all men shall be offended because of Thee, yet will I never be offended." (Matt. 26: 33). He stood, and spoke, and lived in the strength of Another, it was no more Peter who lived, but Christ who lived in him. "And he gave her his hand, and lifted her up, and when he had called the saints and widows, presented her alive. And it was known throughout all Joppa; and many believed in the Lord." It might seem to us a strange thing that as the result of the healing of a single case, such as we have seen repeatedly within the last few years, a whole city should have become converted, and yet as the result of the raising of the dead, only a portion of another city became converted. We cannot calculate results according to the instrumentality used. Oh, how small and insignificant is the instrument, oh, how terrible the hardness and unbelief of men's hearts!

Peter had work still in Joppa, preaching and healing were carried on in those days so closely in combination that sometimes the one, sometimes the other, took precedence in order of time. Here the spiritual work followed the other. Why should there be in our day such a disrelish and such a fear of healing by the Lord? why should men try to disprove it? why should they seek to hinder those who have been healed from speaking of it? why should they impute it to every other cause than the power of God among us? The fool has said in his heart, and hundreds are saying in their hearts now, In healing no God except through means. If God works, He must not manifest His presence or get glory to His Name. He must not interfere with that which everybody receives. Many are shutting God out of business, education and family life. Religion, they say, is all very well, but no experience, no God; prayer is very well, but answers to prayer are not to be spoken of; sermons are all right, but if they turn men from darkness to light and from the power of Satan to God, the preacher is to be avoided. "No God." Oh, let those of us who believe, who know God, hear God, feel God, love God, oh, let us arise and come to the help of the Lord against the mighty. As we exercise our faith it grows stronger, we shall see greater things than these, the times of Pentecost are coming again, the very strength of opposition against the truth shows us that Satan is aware he has desperate odds against him; persecution may revive, far more than at present, nay, it will revive, but the Lord is at hand, He is coming for His Bride, she is making herself ready; and a people is being prepared against He comes. In the midst of the confusion it shall be that "the people that do know their God shall be strong and do exploits," although "some of them of understanding shall fall, to try them, and to purge and to make them white, even to the time of the end." (Dan. 11: 32–35.)

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Triple Alliance against France is Represented as a league of peace. Herr Tisza, President of the Hungarian Council, in a speech delivered at Pesth on April 13th, practically admitted the existence of the alliance. He was careful to add that it did not imply hostility to France nor guarantee the respective territory of the three countries. He said the statement made in 1882 by Count Kalnoky, Austrian Minister of Foreign Affairs, that Italy had joined in the conservative foreign policy of Austria and Germany to preserve the peace of Europe, still holds good. While representing the alliance as a treaty of peace it is stated that Germany and Austria have promised Italy their "energetic assistance to defend her national honor and protect her maritime interests." The phraseology of the promise, however it may be explained, does not impress the public as being particularly pacific in tone.

Wholesale Arrests of Nihilists are Being made in Russia by the police, who have been aroused into unusual activity by the approaching coronation of the Czar. It is reported that 2000 persons have been arrested in Moscow alone on suspicion of being engaged in plotting against the life of the Czar. Advices have been received from St. Petersburg to the effect that the secret police in that city, as well as at Moscow, are making numerous arrests at night-time in consequence of the recent strong revival of nihilist intrigues. On the 4th inst., thirty-nine arrests were made in a house where a quantity of prepared explosives was discovered. A European correspondent of the Sun states that the information obtained by the police only serves to show that the nihilistic order is more numerous and more hostile than ever, that its determination is unconquerable, and that it is absolutely fearless and reckless as to the consequences which its acts may entail. It would seem as if the intended coronation was to be made a test struggle between the nihilists and the empire. The desperation of the conspirators is deeper than at any time in the reign of the late Czar, and their animosity against the reigning sovereign is inflamed to a degree that is almost incredible. They say that it does not matter how many plots are unfolded, how many men and women are imprisoned or executed, their plots are too many to be all detected, and their members who are ready to die, too numerous to be defied.

Brady, One of the Gang Charged with the murder of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke in Phœnix Park, Dublin, was tried and convicted last week. He was sentenced to be hanged on May 14th. An attempt was made to prove an alibi in his defence, but it broke down under cross-examination. The prosecution had abundance of evidence. Almost all the prisoners had volunteered to testify against each other, and were ready to furnish the government with information. The government lawyer remarked that the case should teach one lesson—that there could be no honor among members of such a society. The men who had instigated it and warmed it into life, the men who had supplied it with funds which encouraged it to carry on its designs, had fled to foreign lands. If there were any further proof required of how conspirators deserted those who were unlawfully leagued with them, it was furnished by the fact that the Crown had even in this case been compelled to provide the means for defending Brady from this terrible charge. The informer Carey was the principal witness, and his testimony was the chief means of convicting the man who had been his colleague and instrument. The court was surrounded by a mob which evinced its sympathies with the convicted murderer by howls of execration when the result of the trial was made known. Carey admitted that he was a regular attendant at the communion during the whole time he was arranging for the commission of the Phœnix Park murders. He identified during his evidence a photograph shown him of a man named Tynan. He said that it was a portrait of the man he had known as "Number One," who was the real chief of the conspiracy. Tynan, it appears, fled to Paris in time to escape arrest, and there after consultation with prominent Irishmen, and by the advice of a French lawyer he sought refuge in Mexico, with which country England has no extradition treaty.

The Irish Invincibles have been Startled by the dictum of Judge O'Brien, who stated that every member of the order might under the law be held guilty of the murder of Mr. Burke, even though they were absent from the scene of the crime. Referring to the existence of regularly organized secret societies drawn and held together for the purpose of committing murder, he said those members of such societies, who were actually guilty of taking the lives of their fellow-beings, and those who were guilty of assisting and encouraging them in their deeds, were clearly guilty of murder. The latter were equally guilty with the former. As Mr. Burke had been sentenced by the society all the members were responsible for the crime of his murder. The murder of Lord Frederick Cavendish not having been premeditated, only those present at the assassination could be held responsible.

An Enactment Dealing with Explosives has been passed by the British Parliament. It does not deal with cases in which the explosion causes loss of life, because that is already covered by the law against murder. As to other explosions and the possession of explosives, its provisions are very stringent. It provides that the maximum penalty for causing an explosion by which life or property is imperilled shall be lifelong servitude. An attempt to cause an explosion, or the making or keeping of explosives with intent to cause an explosion is made punishable by imprisonment for a term of twenty years, and the unlawful making or keeping of explosives under suspicious circumstances is to be punishable by fourteen years' imprisonment. All accessories to such crimes are to be treated as principals. Provision is made in the bill for the ordering of official inquiries into the crimes specified, for the arrest of absconding witnesses and for searching for explosives. The penalties are to be inflicted irrespective of the damage done by the explosives. The conservative party approved of the bill, and as it met with no opposition it was rushed through its three readings in both Houses of Parliament in one night. This unusual promptitude was due to the fact that the police had obtained information that persons bearing explosives were then crossing the Atlantic from America, and might be expected to arrive at any time.

The Difficulty between France and Tonquin is apparently still unsettled. A telegram received in London from Hong Kong, dated April 11th, says the French Minister to China had arranged the Tonquin affair satisfactorily in December, but the new French Ministry rejected the arrangement. The result, the despatch says, will probably be a long and costly war for France. China will use her best troops, which will probably be commanded by European leaders, and will, perhaps, have the assistance of another ally. It is remarkable that with internal affairs in a precarious and disturbed condition, France should embroil herself abroad in so many places. Her foreign policy has aroused the hostility if not the contempt of Europe. Her conduct in Tunis has alienated Italian sympathy, in Madagascar she has offended England and Germany, and she is now moving on Tonquin in defiance of England and Russia.

The Malagese Government has now Twenty thousand men under arms to resist the French troops. Much anxiety is beginning to be felt regarding the safety of the white settlers in outlying districts, where, in the event of hostilities breaking out, the foreign population would probably be attacked indiscriminately, the natives there being quite unable to distinguish between French and other foreigners. A further result of a struggle would be the development of a strong feeling against Christianity. Already the leaders of the old or heathen party are going through the country preaching that the present difficulties are owing to the admission of the missionaries and the conversion of the Court. If this movement were to gather strength, Christianity would probably disappear for a time over a great part of the country, and the people would relapse into barbarism. The Queen has not yet abandoned hope of the friendly mediation of Germany and England. The acting Foreign Secretary of the London Missionary Society asks special prayer for Madagascar, where the missionaries and foreign residents have much ground for solicitude in the present threatening crisis.

The Progress of Infidelity in France has been represented as extremely rapid, and the cablegrams published in the daily journals confirm this opinion, but M. de Pressensé who has abundant opportunities of personally testing its truth denies the assertion. In a letter to The National Baptist he says: I am more and more convinced that as far as our working-classes are concerned, infidelity has taken no deep root. In their irritation against Ultramontane clericalism they have seized without minute scrutiny the first weapon which has been furnished them. They have not forged it; it comes to them from the would-be scientists, who repudiate the idea of God with a levity unknown to true scholars. these do not allow themselves to pass the domain of scientific observation, in order to launch into unproved hypotheses. Atheism in our people, having no hold upon personal convictions, is but superficial. Proof of this comes to us every day. As to political affairs the same Christian writer says: A great improvement has taken place in the situation owing to the constitution of the Ferry Ministry. Its leader is a loyal, energetic man who has increased in power and who possesses a real gift of oratory. He has consequently rallied a majority firmly and closely united for the moment.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey Expected to Sail from Liverpool on Saturday in the Alaska for New York for a brief period of rest and recuperation. Their services at Manchester were successful beyond those in any other city. One of the local papers states that it is impossible to estimate the number of those who have received benefit from the mission. Some idea of it, however, may be gained from the fact that "inquiry cards" were given out each evening, and the names entered from them in a book daily. From this source the pastors have now the names and addresses of 1843 persons who profess to have received good. These inquirers had sent to them, by post, on Tuesday, March 13th, cards admitting to the closing service or the following evening, and on that evening "they occupied three rows in the body of the hall from the front of the platform right back to the clock." On March 31st the evangelists commenced a mission in Liverpool, where they will labor until they sail for America.

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman (London), for April, may be obtained at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, price six cents, postage paid.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

The Rt. Rev. E. W. BENSON—His Enthronement as Archbishop of Canterbury.

THE RT. REV. E. W. BENSON, D.D.,
The New Archbishop of Canterbury.

His Educational Course at Birmingham—Success at Cambridge—Experience as a Tutor—Becomes Preacher to the University and Chaplain to the Bishop of Lincoln—Is Appointed to the Bishopric of Truro—Elected Archbishop of Canterbury—The Enthronization Scene in Canterbury Cathedral.

THE portrait on the front page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week is that of the ninety-second Archbishop of Canterbury. Among all the dignitaries of the Protestant Episcopal Church in England he occupies the first place, though the monarch is always the nominal head of the Church. The dignity and responsibility of the Primate are so great, and the power he exercises by virtue of his position is so widely felt, that an interest attaches to his personality wherever Episcopalians are found. Other denominations, too, conscious of the influence the Archbishop of Canterbury exerts, cannot be indifferent to the character and abilities of the divine selected to fill that position. There are many clergymen and laymen who, when an Archbishop of Canterbury is chosen, disapprove of the choice, and think that another and different man should have been selected, but when the appointment has been made, there are few God-fearing men anxious for the well-being of the grand old Church, who do not pray that God will endow its chief ruler with the wisdom he will need.

The Right Rev. Edward White Benson, D.D., the new Archbishop of Canterbury in succession to the late Dr. Tait, is the eldest son of E. W. Benson, Esq., and was born at Birmingham in the year 1829. He is now, therefore, fifty-four years of age.

HIS METHODIST ANCESTOR.

It is remarkable that the future Archbishop should have had for an ancestor a prominent Methodist preacher. Joseph Benson, his paternal grandfather, to whom we refer, was born in 1748. He availed himself of early opportunities, and acquired a knowledge of Latin and Greek. Some of Wesley's itinerant preachers aroused in his mind serious impressions, and in 1764 he resolved to go to Newcastle, where the great revivalist then was, and offer himself for any services Wesley might deem desirable for him. His aged father accompanied him part of the way on foot. They separated, it is said, on the highway, "with a flood of tears," and never met again. A great deal turned on that parting of the ways.

Wesley had left Newcastle when Joseph Benson arrived there, and with very limited means the young man resolved to set out on foot to seek him in London. Wesley speedily recognized his ability and gifts, and he became classical tutor at Kingswood. Later on, through the influence of the Countess of Huntingdon, he was appointed head of Trevecca College. Some theological differences led to his resignation, and he entered St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford, with a view to the ministry in the Church of England. But his antecedents were against him. The tutor of his college declined to sign his testimonials, and though others were obtained, the Bishop of Worcester refused him ordination. Thus did the Church of England, in its hostility to Methodism, drive away from her those who might have been its truest and noblest sons.

At first Mr. Benson was greatly perplexed and distressed; but taking the best means of relief, he started out on a preaching expedition in Wiltshire, which was attended with such success that he became convinced that the whole matter was of God's ordering. "The Lord scattered my doubts," he said, "and showed me more clearly the way of salvation by faith in Christ."

At the Methodist Conference of 1771, when Benson was but thirty-three years old, he was appointed to the London circuit. Twice he was made President of the Conference, and he journeyed far and wide in apostolical labors. As a preacher he is said to have been at once thoughtful and fervid. Disposed to expository and grave discourse, his perorations were often marked by a Demosthenic eloquence which swayed his audience as the storm shakes the forest. Joseph Benson was withal a man of solid character, intellectual in habit, wise in counsel, and with a calm dignity of bearing which impressed men deeply. He was famed for his accurate and profound acquaintance with the Greek New Testament. His "Biblical Commentary" was a standard work. Horne, in his "Introduction to the Critical Study of the Holy Scriptures," speaks in high terms of it.

Thus Joseph Benson was altogether a man of mark in his connection. His portrait is still familiar in Methodist circles. He died in 1821, and his now famous descendant was not born till eight years after his decease. It is remarkable, however, that the grandson of the Methodist divine, who was refused ordination by the prelate of the Episcopal Church, should now have attained the highest office in that communion.

The future Archbishop's early education was received at King Edward's School, Birmingham, a popular institution of the midland metropolis of England. When young Benson studied there the principal was the Rev. James Prince Lee, who afterward became Bishop of Manchester. He was an able teacher, and under his care, at the same time as Edward Benson, were several boys who have since attained eminence. Among them were Professor Westcott, one of the company for the Revision of the New Testament, and one of the foremost Biblical scholars of the century; and the Rev. Dr. Lightfoot, the present Bishop of Durham.

UNIVERSITY CAREER.

Having honorably terminated the prescribed course at King Edward's School, he proceeded thence to Trinity College, Cambridge, where his career was rapid and successful, and of which he was successively Scholar and Fellow. In 1852 he graduated Bachelor of Arts, securing at the same time a First Class in classical honors, and winning also the enviable distinction of Senior Chancellor's Classical Medallist. He obtained also the much-coveted place of a Senior Optime in the mathematical tripos, and the "Members' Prize" for the best Latin prose essay.

In 1855 he graduated Master of Arts, proceeding in 1862 as Bachelor of Divinity, and obtained the diploma of Doctor of Divinity in 1867. He was for some years an assistant-master in Rugby School, and discharged the onerous function of the Head Mastership of Wellington College from its initiation in 1858 down to the year 1872, when he was selected as Canon Residentiary and Chancellor of Lincoln Cathedral, having held the prebend of Heydour with Walton in the same cathedral for three years previously.

SELECT PREACHER AND EXAMINING CHAPLAIN.

As a well-deserved tribute which was paid to his eminent qualifications, he was appointed Select Preacher to the University of Cambridge in 1864, and again in 1871, receiving a similar proof of the high estimate in which he was held from the University of Oxford and occupying the same position in this ancient seat of learning in 1875-76. For several years he acted as Examining Chaplain to the Bishop of Lincoln, and not only proved that he was actuated by sentiments of a purely evangelical character, but manifested also his earnest sympathy with all who, by means of missionary operations, were seeking to spread the truths of the gospel in the neglected parts of the diocese.

BISHOPRIC OF TRURO.

But higher and more responsible honors awaited him. His ripe scholarship and administrative abilities suggested his nomination by the late Earl of Beaconsfield, to the newly-founded Bishopric of Truro, Cornwall, and he received the prescribed episcopal consecration in St. Paul's Cathedral, London, on Wednesday, April 25th, 1877. The ceremony was performed by His Grace, the Archbishop of Canterbury, assisted by a large number of bishops. The diocese over which Dr. Benson was called to exercise episcopal sway was formerly included in the See of Exeter. The extent of the diocese rendered a division expedient, and the Diocese of Truro was taken out of it. It is virtually a restoration of the ancient British diocese of Cornwall, consisting of the county of Cornwall, the Isles of Scilly, and five parishes of Devonshire, with the ancient church of St. Mary, Truro, as a cathedral. (The building appears in the left-hand corner of the upper part of our frontispiece.) The enthronization took place on May-day, 1877.

ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

Dr. Benson, as already intimated, has now been chosen as Archbishop of Canterbury. The confirmation of his election took place on March 3d, in Bow Church, Cheapside, London, and the enthronement, a much more imposing ceremonial, took place in Canterbury Cathedral, on Thursday, March 29th, when the ancient city kept holiday, and in the evening was illuminated in honor of the event.

The new Archbishop has published several volumes of considerable intrinsic merit, among them being his "Wellington College Chapel Sermons;" a beautiful memorial discourse upon the decease of Bishop Lee, of Manchester; "Cambridge University Sermons;" besides numerous single sermons preached on special occasions. He is also one of the contributors to "The Speaker's Commentary."

CHARACTERISTIC REMARKS.

Some insight into the character of Dr. Benson may be gained from the letter in which on his appointment to the Archbishopric he bade farewell to his friends of Truro. He wrote: "I believe you think it was right to accept this call to the Primacy. I could never have thought so but for the constant prayers offered far and wide ere it came, and for the strange concurrence of circumstances which preceded and attended it." Dr. Benson then thanks the clergy and the laity of the diocese. He extends his thanks to the laity, whose experience has been gained in bodies which honestly endeavored to make up what was left undone in the past. "Little justice," he says, "should I do to my creed or my feelings if I did not yet again, as often in the past, acknowledge with love and gratitude that activity for Christ's sake, that open-handedness, that kindness toward all good works, that favor at beholding growing activities in the Church which have been shown by the Wesleyans and by very many others, who, nevertheless, have, and use energetically, organizations of their own. Where I go I have a noble, holy example before my eyes in my great predecessor in the archiepiscopal see."

In his published works occur many gems of thought beautifully expressed. Of these the following are a few specimens:

"Light, and Warmth, and Strength, our three vital needs, are only derivable in Christian life from contact with Chrisht—from the contact which, not denied to the loneliest soul, is promised in fulness and in power to united prayer."

"Rest is the blessing of toil; spiritual rest in prayer presupposes spiritual toil in prayer."

"It is not a little thing to come to believe that two or three very imperfect Christian worshippers 'make a Church,' as the Fathers say; that two or three make one divine yet human presence to be supernaturally here 'in the midst,' beyond the way in which God is always in every place."

"Life without worship is hard of outline, colorless, cold of temperature; worship without life is a gaudy idolatry; one is of marble, the other of wax."

"Every man must, like his Saviour, some day face the Tempter alone; and he cannot be strong till that is over. What is never wrought in loneliness will never be wrought in power."

In spite of these utterances, however, the English religious journals of the Evangelical party do not conceal their apprehension that the appointment of Dr. Benson may be fraught with danger to the Church. That he is an aggressive High Churchman is admitted. Mr. Gladstone, who appointed him, has always shown a marked partiality for men of that school. It will be a grievous thing if ritualism, already rampant in the Church, should, under Dr. Benson's sway, flourish and extend its influence. The Record, the leading Evangelical journal of Great Britain, plainly intimates that there is danger of this result ensuing. It says: "It becomes the function of the Evangelical body in the Church to make a stand against what we cannot but think is a most mistaken policy. They must stand all the more firmly together as the effort to divide them becomes stronger. And why? Not surely for the sake of a party name or a party tradition, but for the sake of the distinctive principles of Evangelical religion. Those principles created the Evangelical body, and for the sake of them we must strive our utmost to maintain it. Again, upon the Evangelical body will mainly depend whether the Protestant principles of the Reformation are adhered to, or whether they are supplanted by the principle of so-called "catholicity." This has ever been the work of Evangelical Churchmen, but in the future it will be so in a more special manner."

THE ENTHRONIZATION SCENE,

as depicted in our frontispiece, is a ceremony of great magnificence and some solemnity, which is repeated on the occasion of the formal and public induction of every archbishop to the duties of his high ecclesiastical position. The interior of Canterbury Cathedral then presents an unusually striking scene, and never, perhaps is the ancient edifice, more than eight hundred, years old, looked upon to greater advantage—the lofty vaulted nave; the long vista of columns lining the aisles; the simple magnificence and vast extent of the Anglo-Norman choir; and the rich effect of the stained-glass windows filled with the records of prophets, saints and martyrs, and embellished with heraldic emblazoning of princes, priests, and nobles—benefactors to the Church—can scarcely fail to produce in the mind of the devout and sympathizing spectator feelings of an exalted and sublime nature.

The enthronization, which took place on March 29th, was the last of several ceremonies, which are required by law and custom to be solemnized before the Archbishop is duly constituted. One of these, which has evoked some little ridicule, is that of the Dean and Chapter "electing" the Archbishop. In these cases the election does not rest with the Dean and Chapter. They must elect the man whom the Prime Minister for the time being has chosen.

On January 18th there was issued in the Queen's name a congé d'elire, "empowering the Dean and Chapter of the Metropolitical Church, of Canterbury, to elect an Archbishop of that see," the notification also specifying that the Queen had "been pleased to recommend to the said Dean and Chapter the Right Reverend Father in God, Dr. Edward White Benson, now Bishop of Truro, to be by them elected Archbishop of the said see.' This document is now stripped of all significance. The law makes members of chapters who disobey the royal letters recommendatory liable to outlawry and imprisonment during the sovereign's pleasure. Even if the Dean and Chapter should prove stubborn, their opposition would be futile, as the Crown could appoint its nominee by letters patent after a lapse of twelve days. The "solemn mockery" of the whole process has been frequently insisted upon, and to the American mind it does seem as if the invocation of heaven to guide the members of the Chapter in selecting a candidate long since indicated might be omitted.

This and other preliminaries having been completed, the enthronization took place. The Bishop of Long Island and the Bishop of Saskatchewan, British North America, represented the Church on this side the Atlantic on the occasion. Nearly 10,000 applications had been made for tickets, but considerably less than 3000 were issued, owing to the space required for the progress of the procession through the nave, choir and transept. Seats for something over 2000 spectators were prepared, and standing-room was found in the nave for 500 more. The clergy of the diocese appeared in surplices and hoods and Becket's favorite flower, the lily of the valley, was worn by nearly every one in the building. About 600 persons were in the procession, which moved twice around the aisles of the nave. The Duke of Edinburgh, representatives of Oxford and Cambridge universities and a great concourse of clergymen were present.

The mandate for the enthronization having been read in the presence of the dean, canons, honorary canons and six preachers, the procession was formed, and passed through the cloisters to the nave of the cathedral. The hundred and twenty-first and hundred and twenty-second Psalms were chanted, while the clergy passed through the choir and settled in their places and the Archbishop and bishops were conducted to their seats within the altar-rails, when the Hallelujah Chorus was sung. The Archdeacon then administered to the Archbishop the formal affirmation, declaring that he would maintain the rights and liberties of the Church, and the Archdeacon, Dean and Vice-Dean having retired to their stalls the service was begun. At the end of the first lesson the Archdeacon conducted Dr. Benson to the throne. There the Vicar-General presented the mandate for enthronization to the Archdeacon, who, after it had been read, proceeded in a Latin speech to formally induct, install and enthrone the Primate. The service was then continued, and on its conclusion the Archdeacon and Bishops, with the Dean and Vice-Dean, conducted the Archbishop to

THE MARBLE CHAIR.

This famous seat is of Purbeck marble, in four pieces for convenience of transportation, and has for decoration a raised cross on the back. Here the Archbishop repeated the form of induction, but adding the word "Metropolitan;" he then conducted the Archbishop to the dean-stall, in token of his Grace having taken actual possession of the See, and the service was closed with the singing of the Te Deum and the pronouncing of the benediction by the Primate.

The procession was then reformed and proceeded to the Chapter House, where the Archdeacon conducted the Archbishop to the chief seat and promised canonical obedience to him, an act in which the Dean and the other members of the cathedral body also participated, and a memorandum of the proceedings having been signed and attested in the presence of the notary public, the Archbishop was at last in complete possession of the temporalities of his primacy.

ARCHIEPISCOPAL RANK.

The Archbishop receives for life a salary worth $75,000 a year. He is also entitled to a seat in the Queen's Privy Council, and he is a member of the House of Lords. His position in that chamber, however, differs from that of secular peers, in that it is not hereditary. The Archbishops and Bishops when they die are succeeded in the House of Lords by the prelates who fill their places in the diocese, and not, as in the case of the lay peers, by their eldest sons. The Archbishop of Canterbury is also entitled to an honor very highly esteemed in Great Britain. On all occasions of state ceremony he takes precedence next to the royal family. His rank is above that of dukes (the highest order in the peerage), unless they happen to be sons or grandsons or other personal relatives of the sovereign. He is thus enabled to vote on all questions of Church and State that are introduced for legislation in the House of Lords. The new Archbishop is, it is stated, a resolute opponent of the reform of the marriage laws much desired in England, which would permit the marriage of a deceased wife's sister.

An Outrage in St. Paul's Cathedral, London, occurred during the singing of an anthem at the afternoon service on March 24th. A man of respectable appearance hurriedly approached the altar, and, jumping on the communion-table, threw down the gold cross, which was broken in the fall, and knocked over the floral decorations. He was at once seized by two or three of the clergy and others, and removed by a side door, vociferating at the top of his voice, "Protestants, to the rescue!" The man was handed over to the police. He was taken before the magistrate on the following Monday, and fined five pounds. The money was immediately paid by friends of the accused. Sir Christopher Wren's towering fane, it is mentioned, was never before the scene of such an attack. The historians of the cathedral recall, however, that it has thrice been robbed of its plate—once by the commissioners of Edward VI., once by the Long Parliament, and once by some burglars, who were never brought to justice.

Death of a Young Actress.—The Following affecting incident is related by an evangelist. He says: "I was once called in great haste to pray with some one that was dying. The person who called for me led me through the streets, until we arrived in front of a miserable-looking building, which we entered. I was conducted down a flight of steps into a cellar, where I saw lying upon some old rags the form of a young woman. Her dark hair, now damp with the dew of death, hung in masses over her shoulders, while her white, thin face and black, sparkling eyes, full of terror, were uplifted to mine. She had been an actress. Her life had been spent upon the stage, but she was now called upon not only to leave the stage of the theatre, but the stage also of earthly life. The night before, she had been found in a dying state in an empty house, and she had been removed to this cellar. I prayed with her, and told her of the love of Jesus, and of His desire that she would take the pardon of her sins from His bleeding hands, and then, when life should close, go to dwell in heaven. But as I knelt by her side she drifted further and further out on the dark river of death, and presently, with a convulsion of unspeakable agony, and an utterance of despair, she died Christless and unforgiven. 'Seek ye the Lord while He may be found; call upon Him while He is near.'"

A Christian Japanese Convert Related his experience to the Rev. H. Maundrell, of Nagasaki, Japan, as follows: "I am a native of Kumamoto, and about eleven years since went to the principal school here, of which Captain James, an American gentleman, was master. He labored for four years to bring his pupils to Christ. Every Saturday evening he held a Bible-class in English, and on Sunday preached in English from two to three hours, to the first, second, and third classes in the school. We used to attend in order to get more knowledge of English, and also to criticise the Christian doctrine, but at last it conquered us. He used to bid us tell the lower classes in Japanese what we had heard. At last thirty of us put down our names on paper, and met on a hill among the trees and brushwood, to pray. We pledged ourselves to be servants of Jesus Christ, and give up idolatry entirely. Twenty of these fell away, but ten came back after a time, and ten more joined us, and nearly all of these thirty are now followers of Christ, and working as preachers and catechists for different churches. After my conversion my friends shut me up for seventy days in the house, but my schoolmates sent letters exhorting me to be firm. To stop correspondence with others, I was sent away to a distant relative, and kept close for seventy days more in order to prevent my being at the school examination. My heart got very faint when quite alone, but at last I was brought back, and the family said, 'You can go away; we do not want any one who is a Christian among us; go!' This was seven years ago; now I return for the first time and meet with a friendly reception. I went to Osaka and received instruction from missionaries there, then went to Yokohama, and now am stationed at Bizen, 100 miles west of Osaka, where I have been about two years, and where no foreign missionary is resident. I have there 160 Christian adherents, 60 of whom are communicants."

SOLICITUDE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, April 22, 1883.

"A wise son maketh a glad father; but a foolish son is the heaviness of his mother."—Prov. 10 : 1.

Reckless Parents—Animal Protection for its Young—A Drowning Mother's Cry—I. The Alleviations—Results of Early Watching—The Dry Dock of the Home—The Restraining Voice—A Discussion at a Theatre Door—Begin Early—Are Your Children Safe?

In this graphic way Solomon sets forth the idea that the good or evil behavior of children blesses or blights the parental heart. I know there are persons who seem to have no especial interest in the welfare of their children. The father says: "My boy must take the risks I took in life. If he turns out well, all right; if he turns out ill, he will have to bear the consequences. He has the same chance that I had. He must take care of himself." A shepherd might just as well thrust a lamb into a den of lions, and say: "Little lamb, take care of yourself."

Nearly all the brute creation are kind enough to look after their young. I was going through a woods, and I heard a shrill cry in a nest. I climbed up to the bird's nest and I found that the old bird had left the brood to starve. But that is a very rare occurrence. Generally a bird will pick your eyes out rather than surrender her young to your keeping, or your touch. A lion will rend you if you come too near the whelps; even the barnyard fowl with its clumsy foot and heavy wing, will come at you if you approach its young too nearly, and God certainly intended to have father and mother as kind as the brutes.

Christ comes through all our households to-day, and He says: "You take care of the bodies of your children and the minds of your children; what are you doing for their immortal souls?" I read of

A SHIP THAT FOUNDERED.

A lifeboat was launched. Many of the passengers were in the waters. A mother, with one hand beating the wave and the other hand holding her little child out toward the lifeboat, cried out: "Save my child!" And that impassioned cry is the one that finds an echo in every parental heart in this house to-day. "Save my child!" That man out there says: "I have fought my own way through life; I have got along tolerably well; the world has buffeted me, and I have had many a hard struggle; it don't make much difference what happens to me, but save my child." You see I have a subject of stupendous import, and I am going, as God may help me, to show the and then the alleviations of that solicitude.

I. The first cause of parental solicitude, I think, arises from the imperfection of parents on their own part. We all somehow want our children to avoid our faults. We hope that if we have any excellencies they will copy them; but the probability is they will copy our faults, and omit our excellencies. Children are very apt to be echoes of the parental life. Some one meets a lad in the back street, finds him smoking, and says: "Why, I am astounded at you; what would your father say if he knew this? where did you get that cigar?" "Oh, I picked it up on the street." "What would your father say, and your mother say, if they knew this?" "Oh," he replies, "that's nothing, my father smokes!" There is not one of us to-day, who would like to have our children copy all our example. And that is the cause of solicitude on the part of all of us. We have so many faults we do not want them copied and stereotyped in the lives and characters of those who come after us.

Then solicitude arises from our

and unwisdom of discipline. Out of twenty parents there may be one parent who understands how thoroughly and skilfully to discipline; perhaps not more than one out of twenty. We, nearly all of us, are on one side or are on the other.

Here is a father who says: "I am going to bring up my children right; my sons shall know nothing but religion, shall see nothing but religion, and hear nothing but religion." They are routed at 6 o'clock in the morning to recite the Ten Commandments. They are wakened up from the sofa on Sunday night to recite the Westminster catechism. Their bedroom walls are covered with religious pictures and quotations of Scripture, and when the boy looks for the day of the month he looks for it in a religious almanac. If a minister comes to the house he is requested to take the boy aside, and tell him what a great sinner he is. It is religion morning, noon and night.

Time passes on, and the parents are waiting for the return of the son at night. It is 9 o'clock, it is 10 o'clock, it is 11 o'clock, it is 12 o'clock, it is half past 12 o'clock. Then they hear a rattling of the night-key, and George comes in and hastens up-stairs lest he be accosted. His father says: "George, where have you been?" He says, "I have been out." Yes, he has been out, and he has been down, and he has started on the broad road to ruin for this life and ruin for the life to come, and the father says to his wife: "Mother, the Ten Commandments are a failure; no use of Westminster catechism; I have done my very best for that boy; just see how he has turned out." Ah! my friend, you stuffed that boy with religion, you had no sympathy with innocent hilarities, you had no common-sense.

A man at mid-life said to me: "I haven't much desire for religion; my father was as good a man as ever lived, but he jammed religion down my throat when I was a boy until I got disgusted with it, and I haven't wanted any of it since." That father erred on one side.

Then the discipline is an entire failure in many households because the father pulls one way and the mother pulls the other way. The father says, "My son, I told you if I ever found you guilty of falsehood again I would chastise you, and I am going to keep my promise." The mother says: "Don't; let him off this time."

A father says: "I have seen so many that make mistake by too great severity in the rearing of their children; now, I will let my boy do as he pleases; he shall have here, my son, are tickets to the theatre and opera; if you want to play cards, do so; if you don't want to play cards you need not to play them; go when you want to and come back when you want to; have a good time; go it!" Plenty of money for the most part, and give a boy plenty of money, and ask him not what he does with it, and you pay his way straight to perdition. But after a while the lad thinks he ought to have a still larger supply. He has been treated, and he must treat. He must have wine suppers. There are larger and larger expenses.

After a while, one day a messenger from the bank over the way calls in and says to the father of the household of which I am speaking, "The officers of the bank would like to have you step over a minute." The father steps over and a bank officer says, "Is that your check?" "No," he says, "that is not my check; I never make an 'H' in that way, I never put a curl to the 'Y' in that way; that is not my writing; that is not my signature; that is a counterfeit; send for the police." "Stop," says the bank officer, "your son wrote that."

Now the father and mother are waiting for the son to come home at night. It is 12 o'clock, it is half-past 12 o'clock, it is 1 o'clock. The son comes through the hallway. The father says, "My son, what does all this mean? I gave you every opportunity, I gave you all the money you wanted, and here in my old days I find that you have become a spendthrift, a libertine and a sot." The son says: "Now, father, what is the use of your talking that way? You told me to go it, and I just took your suggestion." And so to strike the medium between severity and too great leniency, to strike the happy medium between the two and to train our children for God and for heaven is the anxiety of every intelligent parent.

Another great anxiety, great solicitude, is in the fact that so early is developed

CHILDISH SINFULNESS.

Morning-glories put out their bloom in the early part of the day, but as the hot sun comes on they close up. While there are other flowers that blaze their beauty along the Amazon for a week at a time without closing, yet the morning-glory does its work as certainly as Victoria regia; so there are some children that just put forth their bloom and they close, and they are gone. There is something supernatural about them while they tarry, and there is an ethereal appearance about them. There is a wonderful depth to their eye and they are gone. They are too delicate a plant for this world. The heavenly gardener sees them, and He takes them in.

But for the most part the children that live sometimes get cross, and pick up bad words in the street, or are disposed to quarrel with brother or sister and show that they are wicked. You see them in the Sabbath-school class. They are so sunshiny and bright you would think they were always so; but the mother looking over at them remembers what an awful time she had to get them ready. Time passes on. They get considerably older, and the son comes in from the street from a pugilistic encounter, bearing on his appearance the marks of defeat, or the daughter practises some little deception in the household. The mother says: "I can't always be scolding and fretting and finding fault, but this must be stopped." So in many a household there is the sign of sin, the sign of the heart's being wrong, the sign of the truthfulness of what the Bible says when it declares, "They go astray as soon as they be born, speaking lies."

Some go to work and try to correct all this, and the boy is picked at, and picked at, and picked at. That always is ruinous. There is more help in one good thunderstorm than in five days of cold drizzle. Better the old-fashioned style of chastisement, if that be necessary, than the fretting and the scolding which have destroyed so many.

There is also the cause of great solicitude sometimes because our young people are SURROUNDED BY SO MANY TEMPTATIONS.

A castle may not be taken by a straightforward siege, but suppose there be inside the castle an enemy, and in the night he shoves back the bolt and swings open the door? Our young folks have foes without and they have foes within. Who does not understand it? Who is the man here who is not aware of the fact that the young people of this day have tremendous temptations?

Some man will come to the young people and try to persuade them that purity and honesty and uprightness are a sign of weakness. Some man will take a dramatic attitude, and he will talk to the young man, and he will say: "You must break away from your mother's apron-strings; you must get out of that Puritanical straight-jacket; it is time you were your own master; you are verdant; you are green; you are unsophisticated; come with me, I'll show you the world; I'll show you life; come with me; you need to see the world; it won't hurt you." After a while the young man says, "Well, I can't afford to be odd, I can't afford to be peculiar, I can't afford to sacrifice all my friends; I'll just go and see for myself." Farewell to innocence, which once gone never fully comes back. Do not be under the delusion that because you repent of sin you get rid forever of its consequences. I say farewell to innocence, which once gone never fully comes back.

Oh, how many

TRAPS SET FOR THE YOUNG!

Styles of temptation just suited to them. Do you suppose that a man who went clear to the depths of dissipation went down in one great plunge? Oh, no! At first it was a fashionable hotel. Marble floor. No unclean pictures behind the counter. No drunken hiccough while they drink, but the click of cut glass to the elegant sentiment. You ask that young man now to go into some low restaurant and get a drink, and he would say, "Do you mean to insult me?" But the fashionable and the elegant hotel is not always close by, and now the young man is on the down grade. Further and further down until he has about struck the bottom of the depths of ruin. Now, he is in the low restaurant. The cards so greasy you can hardly tell who has the best hand. Gambling for drinks. Shuffle away, shuffle away. The landlord stands in his shirt sleeves, with his hands on his hips, waiting for an order to fill up the glasses.

The clock strikes twelve—the tolling of the funeral bell of a soul. The breath of eternal woe flushes in that young man's cheeks. In the jets of the gaslight the fiery tongue of the worm that never dies. Two o'clock in the morning, and now they are sound asleep in their chairs. Landlord comes around and says, "Wake up, wake up! time to shut up!" "What!" says the young man. "Time to shut up." Push them all out into the night air. Now they are going home. Going home! Let the wife crouch in the corner and the children hide under the bed. What was the history of that young man? He began his dissipations in the bar-room of a Fifth Avenue Hotel, and completed his damnation in the lowest grog-shop on Atlantic Street.

Sometimes sin does not halt in that way. Sometimes sin even comes to the drawing-room. There are leprous hearts sometimes admitted in the highest circles of society. He is so elegant, he is so bewitching in his manner, he is so refined, he is so educated, no one suspects the sinful design; but after a while the talons of death come forth. What is the matter with that house? The front windows have not been open for six months or a year. A shadow has come down on that domestic hearth, a shadow thicker than one woven of midnight and hurricane. The agony of that parent makes him say: "Oh, I wish I had buried my children when they were small!" Loss of property? No. Death in the family? No. Madness? No. Some villain, kid-gloved and diamonded, lifted that cup of domestic bliss until the sunlight struck it, and all the rainbows played around the rim, and then dashed it into desolation and woe, until the harpies of darkness clapped their hands, and all the voices of the pit uttered a loud "Ha! ha!"

The statistic has never been made up in these great cities of how many have been destroyed, and how many beautiful homes have been overthrown. If the statistic could be presented, it would freeze your blood in a solid cake at your heart. Our great cities are full of temptations, and to vast multitudes of parents these temptations become a matter of great solicitude.

II. But now for

THE ALLEVIATIONS.

First of all, you save yourself a great deal of trouble, Oh, parent, if you can early watch the children and educate them for God and heaven! "The first five years of my life made me an infidel," said Tom Paine.

A vessel puts out to sea, and after it has been five days out there comes a cyclone. The vessel springs a leak. The helm will not work. What is the matter? It is not seaworthy. It never was seaworthy. Can you mend it now? It is too late. Down she goes with 250 passengers into a watery grave. What was the time to fix that vessel? What was the time to prepare it for the storm? In the dry dock. Ah, my friends, do not wait until your children get out into the world, beyond the Narrows and out on the great voyage of life! It is too late then to mend their morals and their manners. The dry dock of the Christian home is the place. Correct the sin now, correct the evil now.

Just look at the character of your children now and get an intimation of what they are going to be. You can tell by the way that boy divides the apple what his proclivity is and what his sin will be, and what style of discipline you ought to bring upon him. You let that disposition go. You see how he divides that apple? He takes nine tenths of it for himself, and he gives one tenth to his sister. Well, let that go, and all his life he will want the best part of everything, and he will be grinding and grasping to the day of his death.

LORD BYRON'S MOTHER.

People hurl their scorn at the life of Lord Byron. Lord Byron was not half so much to blame as his mother. The historian tells us that when her child was limping across the floor with his unsound foot, that instead of acting like any other mother, she said, "Get out of my way, you lame brat!" Do not denounce Lord Byron half as much as you denounce his mother. All the scenes in Venice, all the scenes in Greece, all the scenes of outrage wherever he went an echo of that bad mother's heart and that bad mother's life.

Two young men came to

A DOOR OF WICKEDNESS.

The one entered. The other turned back. Why? Difference of resolution, you say. No. The one had a Christian influence, the other had no pious training. The one man went on his evil way. He entered, and went on. No early voice accosted him, but the other heard a voice whose tones may have died from the ear twenty years before, saying, "Don't go there, don't go there!" I think it was almost the first time I ever made a religious address—it was in Dr. Bethune's church—it was an anniversary of the Young Men's Christian Association—I came in from my village home, and I remember nothing of that anniversary, except that one of the speakers that night said: "Many years ago, two young men stood at

THE DOOR OF PARK THEATRE,

New York. They were discussing whether they had better go in or not. There was an immoral play to be enacted that night. One of them said, 'I will not go in.' The other said: 'Don't be afraid; let us go in; who cares?' The one who entered went on from sin to sin, the terminus of his life delirium tremens, with which he died in a hospital. The other man turned back, came to Christ as his Saviour, entered the gospel ministry, and he stands before you to-night. What was it that stopped me at the door of Park Theatre, New York, so many years ago. It was a pressure of a hand on my shoulder—the pressure of my mother's hand."

with your children. You stand on the banks of a river and you try to change its course. It has been rolling now for a hundred miles. You cannot change it. But just go to the source of that river, go to where the water just drips down on the rock. Then with your knife make a channel this way and a channel that way, and it will take it. Come out and stand on the banks of your child's life when it is thirty or forty years of age, or even twenty, and try to change the course of that life. It is too late! It is too late! Go further up at the source of life and nearest to the mother's heart where the character starts, and try to take it in the right direction.

But oh, my friend, be careful to make a line, a distinct line between innocent hilarity on the one hand and vicious proclivity on the other. Do not think your children are going to ruin because they make a racket. All healthy children make a racket. But do not laugh at your child's sin because it is smart. If you do, you will cry after a while because it is malicious. Rebuke the very first appearance of sin. Now is your time. Do not begin too late.

Remember

IT IS WHAT YOU DO

more than what you say that is going to affect your children. Do you suppose Noah would have got his family to go into the ark if he stayed out? No. His sons would have said: "I am not going into the boat; there's something wrong; father won't go in; if father stays out, I'll stay out." An officer may stand in a castle and look off upon an army fighting; but he cannot be much of an officer, he cannot excite much enthusiasm on the part of his troops, standing in a castle or on a hill-top looking off upon the fight. It is a Garibaldi or a Napoleon I. who leaps into the stirrups and dashes ahead. And you stand outside the Christian life and tell your children to go in. They will not go. But you dash on ahead, you enter the kingdom of God, and they themselves will become good soldiers of Jesus Christ. Lead, if you would have them follow.

HAVE A FAMILY ALTAR.

Do not with long prayers wear out your children's knees. Do not have the prayer a repulsion. If you have a piano, or an organ, or a melodeon in the house, have it open while you are having prayers. If you say, "I cannot construct a prayer; I am slow of speech and never could construct a prayer," then take Matthew Henry's prayers, or take the Episcopal Church Prayer-book. There is nothing better than that. Put it down on the chair, gather your children about you, and commend them to God. You say it will not amount to anything. It will, long after you are under the soil. That son will remember father and mother at morning and evening prayers, and it will be mighty help to him, it will be mighty rescue to him.

And above all, in private commend your children to God. Say: "Here, Lord, I am—all my imperfections of discipline and government—here are these immortals—make them Thine forever. The angel that redeemeth us from all evil, bless the lads." Are all your children safe? I know it is a stupendous question to ask, but I must ask it.

ARE ALL YOUR CHILDREN SAFE?

A mother when the house was on fire got out the household goods, many articles of beautiful furniture, but forgot to ask until too late, "Are the children safe?" When the elements are melting with fervent heat, and God shall burn the world up, and the cry of "Fire! fire!" shall resound amid the mountains and the valleys, will your children be safe? will your children be safe?

I wonder if the subject this morning strikes a chord in the heart of any man who had Christian parentage, but has not lived as he ought? God brought you here this stormy morning to have your memory revived. Did you have a Christian ancestry? "Oh, yes!" says some man, "if there ever was a good woman my mother was good." How she watched you when you were sick! Others wearied. If she got weary she nevertheless was wakeful, and the medicine was given at the right time, and when the pillow was hot she turned it. And oh, then when you began to go astray, what a grief it was to her heart!

All the scene comes back. You remember the chairs, you remember the table, you remember the doorsill where you played, you remember the tones of her voice. She seems calling you now, not by the formal title with which we address you, saying, "Mr." this, or "Mr." that, or "Honorable" this, or "Honorable" that. It is just the first name, your first name she calls you by this morning. She bids you to a better life. She says: "Forget not all the counsel I gave you, my wandering boy; turn into paths of righteousness; I am waiting for you at the gate." Oh, yes, God brought you here this morning to have that memory revived, and I shout upward the tidings. Angels of God, send forward the news. Ring! Ring! The dead is alive again, and the lost is found!

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE MOODY AND SANKEY MEETINGS IN EUROPE.

A Happy Servant Girl.—Mr. J. Campbell White said at a recent meeting: "It was only yesterday that I saw a lady who told me of a servant girl who came for a few weeks only to a house. She was about seventeen or eighteen years of age, but her cheerful, bright life so told upon those with whom she served that first one and then another gave themselves to her Divine Master."

A Dreadful Sight.—At a Meeting in Cowcaddens a tall, stalwart man, with strong marks of dissipation stamped upon his features, stood up after the hymn, "Take me as I am," was sung, and in a voice which had a ring of despair in it, said, "Be not deceived; God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap. I am a drunkard, and fear that Jesus has not died for me; but I believe in prayer, and ask you to intercede with God for me." We hope that by this time this victim of drunkenness and sin has found out for himself the grand and blessed truth—"His blood can make the foulest clean."

A Happy Year for an Old Scoffer.—Another man said: "On Monday the 1st I shall have been one year in the Lord's service, and it has been the only happy year of my life. I was a scoffer and a drinker, but my wife was a prayer-loving, God-fearing woman. For many weary, heart-breaking years she prayed faithfully for me. When Mr. Moody was here last year I heard him preach from Gal. 6 : 7, 'God is not mocked, for whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap.' I was stricken to the heart, but, thank God, He who wounded also cured. Now I hate the life which I used to revel in, and desire to have my heart kept near to my Saviour. 'In His favor is life, and His loving-kindness is better than life.'"

How the Appetite was Conquered.—At a testimony meeting a working-man, about thirty-three years of age, said: "I bless and praise God for His infinite goodness to me. Till about a year ago I was given up to drunkenness, swearing, and other sins, but now I stand here a man saved by grace. Frequently, very frequently I tried to reform, and took the pledge, but it was of no use. I was dragged forward to sin by a power mightier than my own. I was a slave. My appetite for drink, my desire for evil was too strong for me. Only when the Lord filled my heart with His love, did I get power over my hateful appetite. And I stand here now, with my heart full of gratitude, the galling, crushing chains snapped asunder, a free man whom the Lord by His mighty power has redeemed, and whom He will preserve for His mercy's sake."

Good Cure for a Bad Thirst.—A Man, Apparently about thirty years of age, said: "I am a stranger among you, but I am a young convert, and have just come from Hawick. I have, I regret to say, tasted of most of the so-called pleasures which the world offers to its votaries, but, like the woman at the well in Samaria, I always thirsted again. Now, having accepted the kind invitation of Christ to come and drink of the water which He gives, my bad thirst for earth's muddy streams, or rather stagnant ponds, is gone. Blessed be His name! I never thirst for such things now. The only thing I do thirst for is more love to Christ and more humility. A year ago last September I was going along a road with two companions, on a Sabbath day. Our talk was not to edification, you may be sure. Suddenly I thought, 'Am I to continue this way of life long? No, I will not,' and that day I sought Christ, and gave myself to Him."

Killed on the Railway.—The Rev. Mr. Munro said: "Just previous to my leaving America to return to this country, a sad accident took place on the railway. A strong man was crossing the line, when his foot slipped between the points, and was caught fast by them. He was quite close to the station, but hidden from it by a curve in the line, so that the people could not see him, neither could they hear his shout for help. Only a small thing held him in that spot, yet it was sufficient to cause his death. He heard the train which he had been hurrying to catch stop at the station, and the whistle as it started, and soon it appeared round the curve. The engineer did not at first see that he was fixed to the spot till it was too late, and though he then put on the brakes, and reversed the engine, the momentum of the train carried it onward. The man saw death was inevitable, faced the engine as it dashed upon him, lifted up his eyes to heaven in prayer, and in a moment he was torn to pieces. Beware of little sins, as they are foolishly called. The smallest, the least noticed may become the cause of the eternal damnation of an impenitent soul."

Died on the Way Home.—Mr. McFarlane said: "I shook hands with a gentleman in the street the other day, and inquired, 'Are you going home?' 'Yes; but no one knows nowadays whether he will get there or not,' was his answer. 'What makes you say so?' I asked. He then told me the following incident: 'A friend of mine left his office and took the train for Bothwell, where he resided. When he started he was quite well, but in the train he felt a slight faintness stealing over him. On alighting at the station he was unable to stand, and was carried to the nearest house. "Send for my daughters," he murmured. His house was only a few hundred yards away, but when his daughters came to him he could not recognize them, and he died without a word or sign.' Be ye also ready, for no man knows the hour at which the call to appear before God may come to him. Death may be very near. Faith in Christ's finished atoning work extracts the sting of death, and opens a pathway to a blissful immortality."

Just Missed the Silver.—The Rev. Mr. Drummond said: "I was travelling in the North of England with a friend. As we neared a mountain with a large hole in it, he said to me, 'I sank thousands of pounds in that hole.' 'How did you do that?' He replied, 'I thought that there was silver in the mountain, and put on men to dig for it; they dug for months, and yet there was no sign of the ore. At the end of a year I told them, "I will give you three months more to find it; if, at the end of that time, silver is not found, I will stop the workings." At the end of that time I visited the hill, but there were no signs of silver. I gave the order to stop the works. In a short time a stranger came to me and inquired, "Why did you stop the workings?" "Because there was no silver in it," I said. "Will you sell the hill and mine?" was the inquiry, and I responded, "Yes, with pleasure." I sold the whole affair for a comparative trifle, and thought that I had made a great bargain. The stranger formed a company, which set men on to dig again; and after going down a foot or two, came upon the richest silver vein in England.' I am persuaded there are many souls who are just near the richest of all blessings which man can have in this world, but who fail to take the step which will enable them to grasp it. 'The gift of God is eternal life.' Is that not the best kind of riches that any man can desire? Put out your hands and take it now."

A Terrible Swim to Shore.—Major Colquhoun said at a recent meeting in Glasgow: "A gallant ship had rounded the Cape of Good Hope and coasted up by Algoa Bay. It is a rock-bound coast, with little or no shelter and very bad anchorage, so that when ships are driven ashore they are broken into pieces. This ship was so driven and became a total wreck. There was a strong man on board who determined to save his wife and child; he was a good swimmer, and felt that being so near the shore he could save them, but, alas! he did not know the power of the heavy surf which beats on the verge of that bay, and as he struggled manfully on with the child in his arms and his wife on his back, he realized with a feeling of despair that he could not save both his dear ones. Then began the inward conflict. 'Wife or child, which shall I drop?' For either he would give his own life gladly; how much more for both. 'I cannot part with my wife; I cannot part with my child,' was the thought of his heart; but nature soon decided for him, and almost involuntarily his arm relaxed, and his darling child was swept away in the raging sea. He reached the shore with his wife, but his child, for whom he would have given his life, was gone. He was not 'mighty to save;' he would have saved if he could, but he had not the power. Christ is mighty to save. He can save to the uttermost, and He is willing to save all who truly call upon Him."

A Whiskey-Seller Saved.—Mr. Dunn, the evangelist, said: "One woman who had a rumshop in Kilsyth came to our meetings, and the Holy Spirit convicted her of sin. I called upon her the next day and noticed people stare to see me going into such a place. When she saw me, she began to speak about her business, the evil one trying to persuade her to argue about it and defend it; but I said, 'I have not come here to speak about your business, but to speak about the Lord Jesus.' After a long conversation she accepted Christ as her Saviour and guide. Two days afterward I again called, and said, 'I have come to-day to speak about your business and not about your soul. A rumshop and the Lord Jesus can never go together.' We then knelt down and prayed about it. When we rose, she said, 'I will go to the city and put my business into a lawyer's hands for sale, so that all my creditors may be paid in full.' Pray, my friends, that she may continue resolute."

ISHMAEL: PAST, PRESENT, AND FUTURE.

THOUGH there is no specific promise that, like their brethren of the house of Lot, the sons of Ishmael should be nationally restored in the last days (see Jer. 48 : 47; 49 : 5,6), God's promise, in fact, that they "should dwell (or abide) in the presence of all their brethren," implies that they should never be scattered, like the sons of Isaac; and we have seen that the Most High has been faithful to His promise.

Like the sons of Hobab, their history has many foreshadows of those days when the Ishmaelites shall be united with the children of Sarah in holy fellowship. In connection with and as symbolical of this fact, it is pleasing to find that, whatever the jealous hostility of Ishmael to his brother Isaac in youth, he seems to have become his friend in manhood. It is possible that the counsels of Abraham, who was eminently a man of peace, brought about this reconciliation, after the death of Sarah had removed that obstacle to brotherly union. Hence we read that (Gen. 25 : 9) "his sons, Isaac and Ishmael, buried him."

Again, we find later in the Hebrew history, that King David not only held friendly intercourse with the house of Ishmael, but that some were members of his household. Thus in 1 Chron. 27, which contains a list of the twelve "rulers of David's substance" or property, that (v. 30, 31) "over the camels was Obil, the Ishmaelite; and over the flocks was Jaziz, the Hagerite. Knowing that the Philistines, Uriah and Ittai, among his chief captains, were Jewish proselytes, we are warranted in inferring that these Ishmaelites were worshippers of Jehovah, either by birth or conversion. If so, then the prayer of their great forefather was answered, and that they, at least of the sons of Hagar, spiritually "lived before Jehovah."

Nor was this a solitary instance of the connection of the Ishmaelites with the house of David. Ithra, who married his sister Abigail, is stated in the text of 2 Sam. 17 : 25 to have been an "Israelite," but the margin represents him to have been "an Ishmaelite." That the marginal is the correct reading is clear from 1 Chron. 2 : 17, which states that Ithra was an Ishmaelite.

All these facts lead to the conclusion that not a few of the sons of Hagar, were not only allied to their kinsmen the Jews by birth or office, but were living proofs that the religious family training, which characterized Abraham, was not abortive, but brought forth fruit many centuries after his death. May we not then regard these Ishmaelites as types of what the whole race will be

DURING THE MILLENNIUM?

Another fore-glimpse of the unity of the Ishmaelites with their brethren of the house of Isaac, if not in the last days of this dispensation, at least during the Millennial age, we gather from an episode in the history of that noblest of the kings of Judah, Jehoshaphat. (II Chron. 17 : 10, 11.)

The last fore-glimpse we have of Ishmael in connection with Jerusalem in the last days, we trace in of first-fruits which was kept after the ascension of our Lord. At that festival the Holy Spirit came down, in accordance with almost the dying promise of Christ, in manifested power. Among the many disciples of Jesus, that gathered "in one place" in Jerusalem, Arabians are specifically enumerated. Like the other nationalities there represented, they "spake in various tongues, the wonderful (or rather, the mighty) works of God." Nor need we be surprised at this result of the baptism of fire; for as now—Theists and adherents of Judaism, the Arabians had but one step to take to embrace Him, of whom Moses and the prophets spake, either by direct teaching, or indirectly by parabolic rites and symbols.

The fact that so many of the sons of Hagar and Keturah were not only Jewish proselytes, but believers in Christ's mission, supplies one clue to the reason why Paul, after his miraculous conversion, when he left Damascus for a time (Gal. 1 : 17) "went into Arabia." For he not only tarried with his kinsmen after the flesh, but with his brethren in Jesus, some of whom had personally received the baptism of the Holy Ghost, at the feast of the first-fruits some years before his conversion.

Such as were Ishmael's sons in the past, so will they be in for Scripture clearly shows that they will take a prominent part in the awful scenes which will close this dispensation, as well as during that "morning without clouds" which will be visibly ushered in by the Son of Man. Whether the Ishmaelites will be associated with Antichrist during his lawless career is somewhat doubtful; or, if they are, it seems to be uncertain whether they will be enrolled among his battalions at his last invasion of the Holy Land.

It is in connection with the downfall of Babylon and the restoration of the Jews to God's favor that we learn something about the future of the Ishmaelites, and of the other Arabians, who trace their descent to Heber, Nahor, and Abraham. During all the past dispensations, Mosaic and Christian, the Ishmaelites have been a nomadic and pastoral race; and what they have been in past ages they will apparently be during the Millennium. Hence when Isaiah records the destruction of the eastern capital of Antichrist, Babylon, he says (see Isa. 13 : 20; and also Rev. 18 : 21-23): "It shall never be inhabited, neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation—neither shall the Arabian pitch his tent there, neither shall the shepherds make their fold there." This last change indicates that the wealth of Ishmael will consist then, as now, and as of old, in flocks and herds; and as these will require a large range of pasturage, we can readily infer why they will be chiefly a nomadic race, moving as will be necessary from place to place to provide for the wants of their huge multitude of cattle.

This fact is, however, further confirmed by the mode whereby they will show their union with the restored Israelites during the Millennium. Thus we read (Isa. 60 : 7): "All the flocks of Kedar shall be gathered together unto thee—the rams of Nebaioth shall minister unto thee," or Jerusalem. The two eldest sons of Ishmael were respectively called Nebajoth and Kedar (Gen. 25 : 13); and as they were primary in dignity they may be regarded as representing the other princes of the house of Ishmael in the latter days. There Ishmael, wealthy as he will be in cattle, will repeat what he did in the days of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 17 : 10-11) and bring their

to their kinsmen in Jerusalem. So large will the number be of the camels there brought as presents that Isaiah (60 : 6) says that "the multitude of camels shall cover thee—the dromedaries of Midian and Ephah." The land betwixt the present desert and the Holy Land will be covered with these free-will offerings.

Though a portion of those presents will be as gifts to their brethren the Jews, yet there can be no doubt that another part will be sent for sacrifice—namely, the future burnt-offerings and peace-offerings described in Ezekiel 46.

Nor will the Ishmaelites give of their substance merely to the Jews; but they will also probably aid in beautifying that last great Temple in Jerusalem, which is depicted by the Divine Architect in Ezek. 40 to 43. It is also said (Isa. 60 : 13): "The glory of Lebanon shall come unto thee; the fir-tree, the pine-tree, and the box together to beautify the place (house) of My glory." For, if "the sons of strangers will build up the walls" of the Holy City, we may readily infer that the palace of Christ—as in the days of Solomon—will be built by Gentiles as well as Jews; and, if so, can we doubt that the sons of Hagar and Keturah will be foremost in the God-given labor?

There are two other facts connected with the costly gifts of the sons of Ishmael—namely, personal worship and acceptance on the part of Messiah. Hence in the Messianic Psalm (62 : 9), we read: "They that dwell in the wilderness shall bow before Him." But specifically it is said of the Ishmaelites and Keturahites (Isa. 60 : 6), that "they shall show forth the praises of Jehovah." Nor will their free-will offerings and personal worship be in vain; for it is added (v. 7) "they shall come up with acceptance on My altar."

All these positive and inferential facts clearly show that, though three thousand eight hundred years have passed away since God so graciously responded to Abraham's prayer, "Oh, that Ishmael may live before Thee," the promise has not been annulled, but will rather have a still during the reign of Messiah. At present the bulk of Ishmael's posterity adheres to the creed of their kinsman Mahomet. Monotheists, as he and his brethren were, he declared—and that is one of the brightest articles in the creed of Islam—that his mission was to extirpate idolatry, whether that of avowed paganism, or in its more subtle form—namely, the picture worship of the Greek, and the image and bread worship of all the apostate Eastern and Latin Churches. To this principle, amid all the errors of their creed, the Ishmaelites are still faithful; and so strict are they in this respect, that as a body, they will not permit any picture or image to enter their tents, lest their children should be thereby corrupted.

It is also pleasing to find—when unhappily the large majority of ministers, in spite of the teachings of both the Old and New Testament, deny that the present dispensation will end in an apostasy more direful than that of any age, culminating as it will do in the worship of Antichrist—that these denizens of the desert expect the advent of Antichrist in the last days. They also believe that he will be ultimately defeated by Allah by the means of a heaven-sent messenger, called El-Mahdi. Thus these sons of Ishmael still hold to a primitive truth derived of Mahomet from tradition—a dogma which ought to be regarded as a most important article in latter-day truths.

Holding primary Bible truths like these, and those mentioned above, there seems to be on which to base the lever of true Christianity. It is therefore painful to know how little is being done by true Christians to show the Ishmaelites that the doctrines and rites of the ancient Oriental Churches, are mainly awful caricatures of Christianity. Some American missionaries, it is true, have attempted to reach the outlying districts of Arabia, but they have chiefly acted through the education of youth, instead of by direct Gospelizing the mass of the Arabs; and, as might be expected, their converts have been very few. Miss M. L. Whately, too, the daughter of the late Archbishop Whately, has also labored earnestly in Cairo for nearly a quarter of a century; and many Arabian children have been received into her schools and orphanage. But unhappily, while the social and educational results have been encouraging, the spiritual fruits have been almost nil.

It is questionable, then, whether the bulk of missionaries to the Asiatics have taken the right steps to bring the sons of Ishmael to the foot of the cross; and whether they would not be more successful in their undoubtedly earnest labors, if they, in future, would imitate the greatest missionary who has adorned the Church; and that like the Apostle Paul, were "determined to know nothing among men, save Christ, and Him crucified." For surely when God has preserved the sons of Ishmael for nigh four thousand years on the territory He gave to their ancestor, we may infer that He must have spared them as a sacred race—even if we had no scriptural authority for the belief—and that for a benign purpose. If so, ought we not to echo Abraham's prayer, "Oh, that Ishmael may live before Thee."

In urging the evangelization of the Ishmaelites and other tribes of the desert, another fact is pressed upon our attention—namely, to whom it has been a home for nigh four centuries, and all of whom claim Abrahamic descent. It is somewhat difficult to obtain a correct census of such nomadic races, but Mr. Skene, the British consul at Aleppo, estimated in 1866, the Bedaweens at 4,000,000. He stated that the Annesee alone had 70,000 tents. Surely then a population so large has every claim on those who really believe that, apart from Christ, there is no hope of salvation. Another reason ought to influence the students of prophecy, at least, to echo Abraham's prayer—namely, the prominent position the Ishmaelites, like other Orientals, will occupy in the events which will wind up this dispensation. At present the West dominates the East, but prophecy declares—whether we regard the Hebrew prophets, or John the seer of Gospel times—that the East will predominate in the last days. At Babylon, the first attempt at universal empire was made by Nimrod, and there his abortive aim will be, for the first time, accomplished by Antichrist. Even now Palestine and Egypt are potent factors in the politics of Europe; and the recent war in Egypt shows what a power for evil or for good, are the descendants of Heber and Abraham.

These Eastern nations will become models to every Western nation during the Millennial age. For Isaiah was instructed to declare (19 : 24): "In that day (or the times of Messiah), shall Israel be the third with Egypt and with Assyria—even a blessing in the midst of the land," or rather the earth. Then will the East, from whence we have derived our origin and religion, not only again become the centre of Gospel light, but also models and specimens of what every Western nation may become. For God will thus place His seal upon their position as teachers of the West—"Blessed be Egypt, My people, and Assyria, including the desert, the work of My hands, and Israel, Mine inheritance."

Well, then, may we, when we remember what the Ishmaelites now are, and what they are destined to be in the Millennial age, echo the prayer of their great ancestor, Abraham, "Oh, that Ishmael may live before Thee."

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Report that the President was Seriously ill on board the Talapoosa at Savannah, Ga., was telegraphed to New York on Friday, and caused much excitement. Later telegrams modified the more alarming rumors. Contradictory statements were in circulation until the end of the week. The generally accepted account is that the President spent some hours in driving in an open car on Thursday in the hot sun. Later he attended a rifle-shooting contest, and partook of lunch. He afterward drove to the residence of friends in Savannah, where he dined, returning to the Talapoosa shortly before midnight. During the night he was suddenly seized with bilious colic, and was attended by the ship's surgeon, who succeeded in relieving his pain. He decided to return to Washington by rail, and commenced the journey at 4 P.M. on Saturday.

An Emphatic Denunciation of the Dynamite plotters in New York was uttered on April 19 by Judge Noah Davis. He said: "They are a society of fiends who disgrace our shores, and I speak of them because it is your duty as American citizens to frown down and denounce all their detestable crimes. I tell you the time has come when we must speak out on this subject. If not legally, we are morally responsible for all the dynamite that is sent to England, for it is all sent by American money. Suppose a man standing one inch this side of the border line between the United States and Canada were to fire a shot that would blow up a Canadian town. Would we not be detested by every one if we allowed such a wretch to remain among us? Or suppose it were possible for a man to stand in America, and by means of the Atlantic cable cause a dynamite explosion in London. What would be said of us if we permitted the man who touched the spring of that cable to live in New York? And though we are not as legally we are every whit as morally responsible for harboring the vampires and assassins that now disgrace New York, as we would be if we retained that man; and I tell you, we and all respectable citizens should make it so warm, by our unceasing denunciation, for these Irish vampires, that they can no longer hide their cowardly carcasses behind the American constitution."

The Prohibitory Amendment in Iowa has again been declared void by a majority of the Supreme Court. The opinions are voluminous, the majority covering eighty-four pages of legal cap, and the minority, consisting of Judge Beck's alone, covering one hundred and thirteen pages. The majority opinion is in harmony with that rendered at the first hearing, declaring the amendment null and void. The opinion of the court was delivered by Chief-Justice Day. On the only new question raised in the argument for the rehearing, that of jurisdiction, the court is positive that courts are instituted for the purpose of adjudicating acts of the Legislature.

An Interview with Edward O'Meagher Coudon, the supervising architect of the Treasury, was published last week in the Washington journals. In the course of the interview Coudon took occasion to express his approval of the dynamite plots in Ireland. This expression of opinion by a man in the employ of the government is to be deplored. It is matter for regret that any person approving assassination should be in the Treasury, and it is especially to be regretted that he has so little discretion as to compromise the government, as far as it is in his power to do so, by publicly stating his views. The man Coudon is a released convict. He was charged with taking part in the cowardly assassination of a policeman in Manchester, England, was convicted, and sentenced to be hanged. His sentence was commuted by the clemency of the British Government to penal servitude for life, and after serving eleven years he was released through the intercession of the United States Minister.

The Liquor Question in Ohio has been Again under consideration in the lower House of the Legislature. A bill has been passed imposing a tax of $200 on the sale of spirituous liquors, and half that sum on the sale of malt and vinous liquors. The old law making it a penal offence to sell liquor to be drunk upon the premises is suspended. It has been a dead-letter since it was first enacted, and its suspension will have no effect in increasing liquor drinking. The regulation of the sale of wine, ale and beer on Sunday is left to the councils in cities and villages.

The General Surprise and Disappointment Expressed through the country at the recent defeat in Chicago of the law and order party, has been accompanied by severe animadversions on the character of the citizens of Chicago. The Chicago Advance, in commenting on the result, points out one important feature of the situation which has been, but should not be, generally overlooked. It reiterates its assertion that the better elements predominate in this city, and adds: Let it not be forgotten that a large percentage of the voters who are in favor of reform and decency and honesty in city government, whose whole financial interests are in the city, live in the suburbs, and therefore have no vote in municipal affairs. It is safe to say that out of every thousand voters who come into Chicago on one railroad each morning, 850 would have voted against Mayor Harrison, if they could.

The Florence Night Mission was Opened at 29 Bleecker Street, New York, last week. It is in a neighborhood long notorious for immorality. It is a three-story building entirely devoted to the purposes of the mission. The basement is used for a kitchen and dining-room, where the wards of the mission will be temporarily fed. The first floor is a meeting-room, where late religious meetings will be held every night for women who are found in the street, who can be induced to attend. The second floor is devoted to a parlor and the housekeeper's room, and the third floor is a dormitory where women will be temporarily accommodated with sleeping room. The Rev. John Dooly, who has labored successfully for fourteen years at missionary work in the lower part of the city, is President of the Board of Managers of the mission. In his opening address he said that the work of the mission was not exclusively for fallen women, and that the mission was not a home for fallen women. It was, however, planted in that locality with the special view to their rescue. Mr. Allen, the missionary of the mission, who does work every night in the dance-houses, saloons, and similar places in the lowest part of the city, also made an address, and told of some of the incidents of his labors. He said that there was not a dance-house, gambling-house, or saloon in which he was not welcomed and allowed to work, although the proprietors knew that he was trying to break up their business. The mission is named the Florence after the dead daughter of Mr. C. N. Crittenton, of No. 115 Fulton Street, the treasurer of the mission, who has done a great deal toward its organization.

The Twenty-fifth International Convention of Young Men's Christian Associations will convene in Milwaukee, Wis., May 16th. The first service will be held in Association Hall, 212 Grand Avenue, at ten o'clock. The sessions will continue through Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday. The Milwaukee Association are making extensive preparations to entertain the convention, which promises this year to be very largely attended, and purpose doing all in their power to make the delegates welcome. In inviting the convention to meet with them, they tender entertainment to all regularly accredited delegates, but do not consider themselves bound to provide it, unless they receive notice prior to May 6th of those intending to be sent as delegates.

The Bequest of Two Hundred Thousand dollars to the Young Men's Christian Association, of Brooklyn, was announced at the twenty-fifth anniversary of the association, recently celebrated. The president, Mr. Packard, said that the executors of the will of the late Frederick Marquand had set apart $200,000 from the amount he had bequeathed in his will to charitable and religious work, for a new building for the association, provided the association raise $150,000 for an endowment fund. Mr. Packard said that $51,000 of this amount had already been raised, and urged the necessity of making up the remainder of the necessary sum immediately.

Efforts to Encourage Temperance by Providing a free supply of water for thirsty travellers have been made in many cities of the Union by Dr. Cogswell, a philanthropist of San Francisco. Mayor Rehan, of New Orleans, received last week an offer from him for that city. Dr. Cogswell offers to present to the city an ornamental bronze drinking fountain and statue. The conditions are that the fountain shall be the property of the city, shall be located in a public place, supplied with ice made by a machine accompanying the fountain, and that the city shall lay the foundation of the structure, and place around it four lantern or electric lights. The height of the fountain, with granite base, is seventeen feet, and the width seven feet. The cost of carrying out the conditions described is estimated at $500.

An Appeal Has Been Issued in Behalf of the Presbyterian Church of Lawrenceburg, Ind. The congregation had with much self-denial raised the walls and roofed in their beautiful church, and had worshipped in the basement only two or three times when the flood came and covered the floor of the main audience room a foot deep. They still needed $3000 to complete the building and clear it of debt. Much of this was to be collected on subscription, but now most of the congregation having been driven from their homes by the water are unable to meet their subscription. The pastor is a heavy sufferer in his library and household furniture, which are almost ruined. Help is needed to complete the church and to repair the damage effected by the floods.

Successful Temperance Meetings have been held by Miss Frances Willard in the West. Miss Willard, who left Boston on March 5th, is now in California. In a couple of weeks she will sail for the Sandwich Islands, and will return some time in the summer to this country, when she intends to visit Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Montana, Utah and Manitoba.

The Pilot's Bride, a Schooner which Started on a whaling voyage from New London, Conn., in April, 1880, was lost in October, 1881, and her crew who returned to America last week give a romantic account of their experience. They state that the schooner was wrecked on a reef off Desolation Island, and went to pieces. The crew managed to get to the island in boats. There they remained for eleven months, suffering dreadful privations, and maintaining life with difficulty. They lived on the flesh of the sea-elephant, and as their boots and other articles of clothing wore out, supplied their place by ingenious contrivances, and such materials as could be found on the island. Desolation Island is nearly three hundred miles in circumference, and lies between Cape Colony, South Africa, and Australia. It is out of the way of ships, and the men feared they would never be rescued. The owners of the schooner, however, sent another vessel to search for her, which arrived at Desolation Island in September last, and took the men to Cape Town, whence they obtained passage to America. Men in this world are like the mariners on Desolation Island; their lives here are full of trial and difficulty, and they would have had no hope of reaching heaven at last, had not the Owner sent His own Son to seek and save them (John 3 : 16).

A Thief's Presentiment Led to the Saving of his life, and eventually to reformation of character, recently. His own account of the affair was given at a gospel meeting in New York, last week. He said: "I have served a term in State prison, and have been paddled, and deserved it. I made a good deal of money stealing, and spent it drinking. One night I set out with Mosher and Douglas for Bay Ridge to rob the Van Brunt house. We expected to get $30,000. At the corner of Stanton Street and the Bowery a feeling of reluctance came upon me, and I said I wouldn't go. Mosher remonstrated, and proposed that we take a drink, but I refused. I gave my tools to them and went home. The next morning when I read that Mosher and Douglas had been shot dead I saw that God had saved me." His narrow escape from death made a deep impression on his mind which was never effaced. He abandoned his sinful life, and having obtained honest employment he married and prospered. Both he and his wife are now leading Christian lives. It is evident that the unaccountable "feeling of reluctance" described by the thief was the voice of the Holy Spirit appealing to him. So other men are often called whose lives are less openly sinful, but whose souls are in peril as great as his. Well is it for them when they hearken instead of trying to shake off the "presentiment" (Prov. 1 : 23).

A Perilous Ride in a Hand Car was Undertaken by a party near Mahanoy City, Penn., on April 15th. Early in the morning a party of twenty persons, men and women, being desirous of travelling from Delano Station on the Lehigh Valley Railroad to Mahanoy City, persuaded a laborer on the line to accompany them on a hand truck which, as the road at that point is a heavy down grade, would run by its own gravity. Fears, however, were entertained by several of the party, who suggested that a coal car with a good brake should be attached to the little truck as a precautionary measure. This suggestion was acted upon, and the car attached. The party started and about one half of the distance had been traversed, when suddenly the brake chain on the truck, which was drawn tightly, snapped off, and before they could realize their situation, the truck was soon descending the heavy grade at a terrific rate. The wildest excitement prevailed among the party, the ladies becoming uncontrollable. The men were no less terrified, but one of them had sufficient presence of mind to think of the brake on the coal car, which he managed to reach. The truck had gained such headway that its application had only the effect of slackening the speed a little. By this time the Mahanoy City station was in sight, and when it was reached many of the party jumped and rolled off the truck, and were more or less bruised in the fall. All escaped serious injury except the laborer, who was thrown under the wheels and crushed to death. A spiritual experience of which this ride is a type is often witnessed. A career of sinful pleasure is generally down grade, and the brakes fail those who trust in them (Prov. 1 : 27).

The Vexations and Annoyances of Apothecaries are detailed with considerable humor by a reporter of a New York journal, who visited for the purpose those best acquainted with them. Among the incidents related by one of the doctors interviewed was the following: "The worst case of economy I ever saw was a woman who brought back four big blue-pills that she had left after her husband's illness, and wanted to trade them for borax to wash with. I didn't want to hurt her feelings, and I gave her some borax and took the pills and threw them out in the alley, because nobody would like it if I sold them second-hand pills. Even then I came near getting into trouble, as a couple of Polack boys picked up the pills and ate them, and their father was going to sue me for poisoning his children." The heedlessness of the druggist in throwing powerful medicines where they were liable to do harm was exceedingly blamable, but the heedlessness of Christians whose careless and inconsistent words and acts are often watched by young people, and their example in such matters followed, is far more injurious (Rom. 14 : 13).

A Shawl with a Strange History was Buried with the late Professor Cocker, of Michigan University. Shortly before his death Dr. Cocker called the attention of his pastor to a worn and faded shawl spread on his bed, and requested to have it wrapped around his body and buried with him. He had made it himself when a young man in England; had worn it in all his journeyings to and from over the Atlanic and Pacific Oceans; when residing in Australia; when he escaped from the Feejee Islanders as they were preparing to kill and roast him, and when he was shipwrecked. It accompanied him when he landed in the United States, and even clad the remains of his dead child when, penniless and disheartened, he first arrived in Adrian. It is not surprising that a garment with such associations had, though worn and faded, become precious to him, and his desire that his body should be enshrouded in it is easily understood. As the dying Christian looks forward to his appearance before God, his thoughts too are centred on a garment. But that is not one that he made himself, it is the robe of Christ's righteousness given to all who put their trust in Him (Isa. 61 : 10).

A Dissolute Physician's Suicide Solemnized a party of revellers in Nevada recently. A local journal states that a number of men were carousing in Candelaria, Nev., when a doctor named Martin interrupted the half-drunken revelry by assuming a grave tone, and telling his audience how he might become somebody if he could conquer his mania for drink, but how he had tried in vain. "Ah," he said, "I'll leave the world; but, boys, as a last favor, let me do so to the sound of music." His friends summoned some Italian musicians, and while they played, the doctor took morphine. His friends, who did not believe Martin was in earnest, gradually left the saloon, and the saloon keeper, seeing him so sound asleep, locked up the house and retired. In the morning the doctor was found dead. The man was evidently hopeless of conquering his mania, having doubtless made the attempt and failed. One can but wish that some earnest Christian had been at his side to point him to One who was able to deliver him. Then, instead of ending his life his dream of becoming "somebody" might have been fulfilled in the next world, if not in this (Matt. 1 : 21).

EARNEST EXPOSTULATION.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Or despisest thou the riches of his goodness and forbearance and longsuffering; not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance?"—Romans 2 : 4.

A Personal Appeal—The Candle Held at the Front Door—Sin Always on the Down Grade—Many Things Forgotten.—I. The Goodness of God—Temporal Mercies—Prosperity—Health—In the Focus of Gospel Light—With a Tender Conscience—Enjoyed Forbearance—And Longsuffering—Sin Aggravated by Goodness—II. The Sin Suspected—Despising God's Goodness—Through Forgetfulness—Heedlessness—Unbelief—III. Knowledge—The Call to Repentance—The Leading—The Way of Salvation.

THE apostle is intensely personal in his address. This verse is not spoken to us all in the mass, but to some one in particular. The apostle fixes his eyes upon a single person, and speaks to him as "Thee" and "Thou." "Despisest thou the riches of His goodness and forbearance and longsuffering; not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance?" It should ever be the intent of the preacher to convey his message to each hearer in his own separate individuality. It is always a very happy sign when a man begins to think of himself as an individual, and when the expostulations and invitations of the gospel are seen by him to be directed to himself personally.

One personal, intentional touch of the hem of Christ's garment conveys more blessing than all the pressure of the crowd that thronged about the Master. The laying of His healing hand upon had more virtue in it than all those heavenly addresses which fell from His lips upon minds that did not receive the truth for themselves. I do pray that we may come to personal dealings with the Lord each one for himself, and that the Spirit of God may convince each man and each woman, according as the case may stand before the living God. Oh, my hearer, thou art now to be lovingly spoken with: I speak not to you as unto many, but unto thee, as one by thyself.

Observe that the apostle singled out an individual who had condemned others for transgressions, in which he himself indulged. This man owned so much spiritual light that he knew right from wrong, and he diligently used his knowledge to judge others, condemning them for their transgressions. As for himself, he preferred the shade, where no fierce light might beat on his own conscience and disturb his unholy peace. His judgment was spared the pain of dealing with his home offences by being set to work upon the faults of others. He had a candle, but he did not place it on the table to light his own room; he held it out at the front door to inspect therewith his neighbors who passed by. Ho! my good friend, my sermon is for thee.

Paul looks this man in the face and says, "Therefore thou art inexcusable, O man, whoever thou art, that judgest; for wherein thou judgest another thou condemnest thyself; for thou that judgest doest the same things;" and then he pointedly says to him: "Thinkest thou this, O man, that judgest them which do such things, and doest the same, that thou shalt escape the judgment of God?" Well did the apostle aim that piercing arrow; it hits the centre of the target and strikes a folly common to mankind. The poet of the night-watches wrote:

"All men think all men mortal but themselves."

As truly might I say, "All men think all men guilty but themselves." The punishment which is due to sin the guilty reckon to be surely impending upon others, but they scarce believe that it can ever fall upon themselves.

Do men indeed believe that they alone shall go unpunished? No man will subscribe to that notion when it is written down in black and white, and yet the mass of men live as if this were true; I mean the mass of men who have sufficient light to condemn sin in others. They start back from the fact of their own personal guiltiness and condemnation, and go on in their ungodliness as if there were no great white throne for them, no last assize, no judge, no word of condemnation, and no hell of wrath. Alas, poor madmen, thus to dream! O Spirit of Truth, save them from this fatal infatuation.

Sin is always on

so that when a man proceeds a certain length he inevitably goes beyond it. The person addressed by the apostle first thought to escape judgment, and then he came to think lightly of the goodness, forbearance, and longsuffering of God. He thinks he shall escape in the future, and because of that he despises the present goodness and longsuffering of the Most High. Of course he does. If he does not believe in the terrors of the world to come for himself, he naturally reckons it to be a small thing to have been spared their immediate experience. Barren tree as he is, he does not believe that he will ever be cut down, and therefore he feels no gratitude to the dresser of the vineyard for pleading, "Let it alone yet another year, till I dig about it, and dung it." I wish, as God shall help me, to drive hard at the consciences of men upon this matter.

I. First, let me speak this morning to thee, O unregenerate, impenitent man, concerning the goodness of God which thou hast experienced. Thou hast known the goodness, and forbearance, and longsuffering of God. According to the text, "riches" of these have been spent upon unconverted, ungodly men, and upon thee as one of them. Let me speak with thee first, O man, and remind thee how favored thou hast been of God by being made a partaker of "the riches of His goodness."

In many cases this is true of temporal things. Men may be without the fear of God, and yet, for all that, God may be pleased to prosper their endeavors in business. They succeed almost beyond their expectation—I mean some of them; probably the description applies to thee. They rise from the lowest position, and accumulate about them the comforts and luxuries of life. Though they have no religion, they have wit, and prudence, and thrift, and so they compete with others, and God permits them to be

Moreover, He allows them to enjoy good health, vigor of mind, and strength of constitution; they are happy in the wife of their youth, and their children are about them. Theirs is an envied lot. Death seems for awhile forbidden to knock at their door, even though he has been ravaging the neighborhood; even sickness does not molest their household. I know that it is thus with many who do not love God, and have never yielded to the entreaties of His grace. They love not the hand which enriches them, they praise not the Lord who daily loadeth them with benefits.

Furthermore, this goodness of God has not only come to you in a temporal form, O impenitent man, but it has also visited you in a spiritual manner. Myriads of our fellow-men have never had an opportunity of knowing Christ. The missionary's foot has never trodden the cities wherein they dwell, and so they die in the dark. Multitudes are going downward, downward; but they do not know the upward road; their minds have never been enlightened by the teachings of God's word, and hence they sin with less grievousness of fault. You are placed in the very focus of Christian light, and yet you follow evil! Is this a small thing?

What is more, you have been favored with a tender conscience. When you do wrong you know it, and smart for it. What mean those wakeful nights after you have yielded to a temptation? What means that miserable feeling of shame? that fever of unrest? You find it hard to stifle the inward monitor, and difficult to resist the Spirit of God. Your road to perdition is made peculiarly hard; do you mean to follow it at all costs, and go over hedge and ditch to hell? You have not only been aroused by conscience, but the good Spirit has striven with you, and have been almost persuaded to be a Christian. You have scarcely had a stripe, or a frown, or an ill word from God; His ways have been all kindness, and gentleness, and longsuffering from the first day of your memory even until now. "Despisest thou the riches of His goodness?" O man, answer this, I implore thee.

The apostle then dwells upon the riches of "forbearance." Forbearance comes in when men having offended, that is due to them; when men, having been invited to mercy, have refused it, and yet God continues to stretch out His hands, and invite them to come to Him. Patient endurance of offences and insults has been manifested by God to many of you, who now hear these words of warning. The Lord knows to whom I speak and may He make you, also, know that I am speaking to you, even to you.

GOD WITHHOLDS THE PUNISHMENT

Some men have gone back to the very sin of which for awhile they repented: they have suffered for their folly, but have turned again to it with suicidal determination. They are desperately set on their own ruin, and nothing can save them. The burnt child has run to the fire again; the singed moth has plunged again into the flame of the candle; who can pity such self-inflicted miseries? They are given over to perdition, for they will not be warned. They have returned to the haunt of vice, though they seemed to have been snatched from the deep ditch of its filthiness. They have wantonly and wilfully returned to their cups, though the poison of former draughts is yet burning in their veins. Yet, despite this folly, God shows forbearance toward them. Did you ever think what is included in the riches of forbearance. There are quick tempered individuals who only need to be a little provoked, and hard words and blows come quick and furious; but, oh, the forbearance of God when He is provoked to His face by ungodly men! By men, I mean, who hear His word, and yet refuse it!

Our apostle adds to goodness and forbearance the riches of "longsuffering." We draw a distinction between forbearance and longsuffering. Forbearance has to do with the magnitude of sin; longsuffering with the multiplicity of it; forbearance has to do with present provocation; longsuffering relates to that provocation repeated, and continued for a length of time. Oh, how long doth God suffer the ill manners of men! Forty years long was He grieved with that generation whose carcasses fell in the wilderness. Has it come to forty years yet with you, dear hearer? Possibly it may have passed even that time, and a half century of provocation may have gone into eternity to bear witness against you. Yet for all that, here you are on praying ground and pleading terms with God; here you are where yet the Saviour reigns upon the throne of grace; here you are where mercy is to be had for the asking, where free grace and dying love ring out their charming bells of invitation to joy and peace! Oh, the riches of His goodness, and forbearance, and longsuffering. Threefold is the claim: will you not regard it? Can you continue to despise it?

I should like to set all this in a striking light if I could, and therefore I would remind you of who and who has exhibited this goodness, forbearance, and longsuffering to men. Remember how great He is. When men insult a great prince the offence is thought to be highly heinous. We cannot bear that a beloved ruler should be publicly insulted. And what think you of the sin which provokes God? which to His face defies Him? and in His very courts resists Him? Shall this always be forborne with? Is there not a limit to longsuffering? Goodness also adds another item to the provocation; for we naturally say, "Why should one so good be treated so cruelly?" Those words of Jesus were extremely touching when He pointed to His miracles, and asked, "For which of these things do you stone me?" When I think of God I may well say—for which of His deeds do you provoke Him? Man's sin must have been terribly offensive to God from day to day, and yet still He shows kindness, love, forbearance. This adds an excessive venom to man's disobedience. How can he grieve such goodness? How can divine goodness fail to resent such base ingratitude?

Think also of God's knowledge; for He knows all the transgressions of men. All this while, remember, the Lord is great in power. Some are patient because they are powerless; they bear and forbear because they cannot well help themselves; but it is not so with God. That wicked heart would have failed to beat if God had withdrawn His power, and that rebellious breath would have ceased also. Had it not been for longsuffering you unbelievers would long since have known what it is to fall into the hands of an angry God. Will you continue to grieve the God who so patiently bears with you?

Be it never forgotten that sin is to God much more intolerable than it is to us. He is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity. Things which we call little sins are great and grievous evils to Him; they do, as it were, touch the apple of His eye. "Oh, do not," He says, "do not this abominable thing that I hate!" His Spirit is grieved and vexed with every idle word and every sensual thought; and hence it is a wonder of wonders that a God so sensitive of sin, a God so able to avenge Himself of His adversaries, a God who knows the abundance of human evil, and marks it all, should nevertheless exhibit riches of goodness and forbearance and longsuffering; yet this is what you, my ungodly hearer, have been experiencing many a long year.

II. Come with me, friend, and let me speak to thee of the sin of which thou art suspected. Hear me, unconverted sinner; the sin of which thou art suspected is this—"Despisest thou the riches of His goodness and forbearance and longsuffering?" The Lord's goodness ought to be admired and to be adored, and dost thou despise it? Some despise God's goodness, forbearance, and longsuffering, because they never even gave a thought to it. God has given you life to keep you in being, and He has indulged you with His kindness, but it has not yet occurred to you that this patience is remarkable or worthy of

THE SMALLEST THANKS.

You have been a drunkard, have you? a swearer? a Sabbath-breaker? a lover of sinful pleasure? Perhaps not quite so; but still you have forgotten God altogether, and yet He has abounded in goodness to you; is not this a great wrong? Why, you have no such forbearance with others as God has had with you. You would not keep a dog if it never followed at your heel, but snarled at you. As for yourself, you are fearfully and wonderfully made, both as to your body and as to your soul, and yet you have been of no service to your Maker, nor even thought of being of service to Him. Still, He has spared you all these years, and it has never occurred to you that there has been any wonderful forbearance in it. Assuredly, O man, thou despisest the longsuffering of thy God!

Others have, perhaps, thought of it, but have never seriously meditated thereon. When we offend a man, if we are right-minded, we not only note the fact with regret, but we sit down and weigh the matter, and seek to rectify it; for we would not be unjust to any person, and if we felt that we had been acting unfairly it would press upon our minds until we could make amends. But are there not some of you who have never given half an hour's consideration to your relation to your God? He has spared you all this while, and yet it has never occurred to you to enter into your chamber and sit down and consider your conduct toward Him. It would seem to be too much trouble even to think of your Creator.

His longsuffering leads you to repentance, but you have not repented; in fact, you have not thought it worth your while to consider the question at all; you have thought it far more important to inquire, "What shall I eat and what shall I drink?"

have shut out the thought of God. Ah me, you will stand at His judgment bar before long—and then? Perhaps ere this week is finished you may have to answer, not to me, but unto Him that sits upon the throne; therefore I do implore you now, for the first time give this matter thought. Despise no longer the goodness and longsuffering of God.

Some even get to think that the warnings of love are so much wind, and that the threatenings of God will never be fulfilled. They have gone on for many years without being punished, and instead of drawing the conclusion that the longer the blow is in falling the heavier it will be when it does come, they imagine that because it is long delayed the judgment will never come at all; and so they sport and trifle between the jaws of death and hell. They hear warnings as if they were all moonshine, and fancy that this holy Book, with its threatenings, is but a bugbear to keep fools quiet. If thou thinkest so, sir, then indeed thou hast despised the goodness and forbearance and longsuffering of God.

Do you imagine that this forbearance will last forever? Do you dream that at least it will continue with you for many years? I know your secret thoughts; you see other men die suddenly, but your secret thought is that you will have long space and ample time; you hear of one struck down with paralysis, and another carried off by apoplexy, but you flatter yourselves that you will have plenty of leisure to think about these things. Oh, how can you be so secure? How can you thus tempt the Lord?

FALSE PROPHETS

in these evil days play into men's hands and hold out the hope that you may go into the next world wrong, and yet be set right in the end. This is a vile flattery of your wicked hearts; but yet remember that even according to their maunderings centuries may elapse before this fancied restoration may occur. A sensible man would not like to run the risk of even a year of agony. Half-an-hour of acute pain is dreaded by most people. Can it be that the very men who start back from the dentist's door, afraid of the pinch which extracts an aching tooth, will run the risk of years of misery? Take the future of the impenitent even on this footing, it is a thing to be dreaded, and by every means avoided. I say, these flattering prophets themselves, if rightly understood, give you little enough of hope; but what will come to you if the old doctrine proves to be true and you go away into everlasting fire in hell, as the Scripture puts it? Will you live an hour in jeopardy of such a doom? Will you so despise the longsuffering and forbearance of the Lord?

"Despisest thou the longsuffering of God?" Dare you do it? I tremble as I think of a man despising God's goodness. Is not this practical blasphemy? Darest thou do it? Oh, if thou hast done it hitherto, do it no more. Ere yon sun goes down again, say within thy heart, "I will be a despiser of God's goodness no longer; I will arise and go unto my Father, and I will say unto Him—Father, I have sinned. I will not rest until in the precious blood He has washed my sins away."

III. In closing this sermon I desire to remind thee, O ungodly man, of the knowledge of which thou art forgetful. Read my text: "Despisest thou the riches of His goodness and forbearance and longsuffering; not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance?" Dear hearer, I would remind you that God's patience with you is to repentance. "How?" say you. Why, first by giving you an opportunity to repent. These years, which are now coming to a considerable number with you, have been given you in order that you might turn to God. By the time you were twenty one you had sinned quite enough; perhaps you had even then begun to mislead other youths, and to instruct in evil those under your influence. Why did not God take you away at once? It might have been for the benefit of the world if He had done so; but yet you were spared till you were thirty. Did not each year of your lengthened life prove that the Lord was saying "I will spare him, for perhaps he will yet amend and think upon his God. I will give him more light, and increase his comforts; I will give him better teaching, better preaching; peradventure he will repent." Yet you have not done so. Have you lived to be forty, and are you where you were when you were twenty? Are you still out of Christ? Then you are worse than you were; for you have sinned more deeply and you have provoked the Lord more terribly. You have now had space enough.

WHAT MORE DO YOU NEED?

When the child has offended, you say, "Child, unless you beg pardon at once, I must punish you;" would you give a boy so many minutes to repent in as God has given you years? I think not. If a servant is continually robbing you, if he is careless, slothful, disobedient, you say to him, "I have passed over your faults several times, but one of these days I shall discharge you. I cannot always put up with this slovenliness, this blundering, this idleness; one of these times you will have to go." Have you not so spoken to your female servant, and thought it kind on your part to give her another chance? The Lord has said the same to you; yet here you are, a living but impenitent man; spared, but spared only to multiply your transgressions. This know, that His forbearance gives you an opportunity to repent; do not turn it into an occasion for hardening your heart.

But something more is here; for I want you to notice that the text does not say, "The goodness of God calleth thee to repentance," but "leadeth thee." This is a much stronger word. God calls to repentance by the gospel; God leads to repentance by His goodness. It is as though He plucked at your sleeve and said, "Come this way." His goodness lays its gentle hand on you, drawing you with cords of love and bands of a man. God's forbearance cries, "Why wilt thou hate Me? What wrong have I done thee? I have spared thee; I have spared thy wife and children to thee; I have raised thee up from the bed of sickness; I have loaded thy board; I have filled thy wardrobe; I have done thee a thousand good turns; wherefore dost thou disobey Me? Turn unto thy God and Father, and live in Christ Jesus."

If, on the other hand, you have not received rich temporal favors, yet the Lord still leads you to repentance by a rougher hand; as when the prodigal fain would have filled his belly with husks, but could not, and the pangs of hunger came upon him; those pains were a powerful message from the Father to lead him to the home where there was bread enough and to spare. "The goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance." Oh, that thou wouldest yield to its sweet leadings, and follow as a child follows the guidance of a nurse. Let thy crosses lead thee to the cross; let thy joys lead thee to find joy in Christ.

I close now, but I am sorry so to do, for I have not pleaded one half as I could have wished. Yet what more can I say? I will put it to yourselves.

IF YOU WERE IN GOD'S STEAD, could you bear to be treated as you have treated Him? If you were all goodness and tenderness, and had borne with a creature now for thirty or forty years, how would you bear to see that creature still stand out, and even draw an inference from your gentleness to encourage him in his rebellion? Would you not say, "Well, if my longsuffering makes him think little of sin, I will change my hand. If tenderness cannot win him, I must leave him; if even my love does not affect him, I will let him alone. He is given unto his evil ways—I will cease from him, and see what his end will be?" O Lord, say not so, say not so unto any one in this house, but of thy great mercy make this day to be as the beginning of life to many.

HERE IS THE WAY

of salvation: "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." You know how the Master bade us put it. "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature; he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." First, we are to preach faith, whereby we lay hold on Christ; then baptism, whereby we confess that faith, and own that we are dead and buried with Christ that we may live with Him in newness of life. Those are the two points He bids us set before you, and I do set them before you.

Weary, but not quite wearied out, O impenitent man, I plead with thee! Though thou hast so often been pleaded with in vain, once more I speak with thee in Christ's stead, and say—Repent of thy sin, look to thy Saviour, and confess thy faith in His own appointed way. I verily believe that if I had been pleading with some of you to save the life of a dog I should have prevailed with you a great while ago. And will you not care about the saving of your own souls? Oh, strange infatuation—that men will not consent to be themselves saved; but foolishly, madly, hold out against the mercy of God which leads them to repentance. God bless you, beloved, and may none of you despise His goodness, and forbearance, and longsuffering.

[Might not the distribution of this sermon be useful? If the Christian reader think so, will he favor the preacher by placing copies of it in the hands of persons who need just such appeals. The prayers of God's people are entreated that this discourse may bear fruit unto life eternal. C. H. S.]

GEORGE FIRMIN'S REFORMATION.

In a room plainly and neatly furnished a boy of fourteen years of age sat one Sunday evening in summer, with a book of photographs before him. He was a strong, sturdy lad, not intellectual, but his face and the shape of his head showed that he was quick, resolute, and good-tempered. Not a lad whose training would be easy, but one whom a sympathetic and adroit guardian would be able to guide and manage, providing he did not try to "drive" him.

The boy was evidently in trouble. As he looked at the photograph before him the tears were silently chasing each other down his cheeks, and now and again his breast heaved with a violent sob. The picture he was looking at was that of a lady, whose soft gray eyes looked lovingly at him from under long silky eyelashes. Ha! how many times had George Firmin seen those eyes so rest upon his face; how many times had his head been pillowed on that bosom where it would never rest again! It was the picture of his dear, dead mother, and as he looked at it the memory of the gentle, winning words she had spoken to him before she died came into his mind. "Love God, George," she had said, "and hate sin." He could almost hear her voice now, and he wondered if her gentle spirit could be near him.

"George," said a sharp, firm voice which jarred painfully on the boy's ears, "have you learned your catechism?"

"No, aunt," he said, without turning around to look at the lady who addressed him; for he did not wish her to see his tear-stained face. "No, aunt, but I shall know it soon;" and he furtively concealed the album and bent still lower over the book on the table.

He was a big boy to be learning the catechism, but Aunt Virginia would have insisted on his learning it had he been older than he was, if she had been responsible for his right training. Prim and stately, and strictly conscientious, the New England lady was trying to do her duty, as she understood it, by her nephew's orphaned boy. How Robert and that Southern child-wife he had married could have neglected their only son's education as they clearly had done, she could not understand. The boy was densely ignorant, and she feared, inclined to be obstinate. When she adopted him on the death of his parents, and took him North to her home in New Hampshire, she little knew how serious a task she had undertaken. But she had decided opinions on the subject of education, and having undertaken to bring up the orphan boy, she was not one to draw back and abandon her task. She had implicit faith in her system, and was satisfied that in time it must prevail. But, meanwhile, the struggle was a sore one both for herself and George.

"Go and wash your face, George," she said, walking majestically round to a point where she could see the face from which the boy had tried to wipe the tears away with his knuckles. Some such salutation George always expected from Aunt Virginia. His hair always needed combing, or his pants needed brushing, or his collar was soiled and must be changed, or his nails were not clean, or some other negligence was detected whenever Aunt Virginia looked at him.

His life seemed to him one perpetual harrass. There was not a day nor an hour when he could enjoy the delicious boyish freedom of his Southern home. No word of sympathy or encouragement ever met his ears; nothing but cold, stern reproof and correction. Yet he knew Aunt Virginia was doing it all for his good, and he wished he could be a better boy and not vex her so often with his careless habits. He often wondered whether, if Aunt Virginia had ever married and had boys of her own, she would have been so hard to them, or perhaps they would have been good boys who could keep themselves neat and clean.

It was with a downcast spirit that George descended to the best room in which his aunt and he always sat on Sundays after meeting. He hoped there was no cause for complaint left, now that he had made himself tidy, and he would try to learn his catechism.

"What book was that you hid away, George," said his aunt, "when I came in? I hope you were not reading a story book on the Lord's Day, instead of learning your catechism."

"No, aunt, it was not a story book, and I know some of the catechism, but not quite all. I shall soon know it now," he added timidly.

"Let me see the book you were reading," said Aunt Virginia suspiciously. George knew it was of no use to resist, and he handed it to her reluctantly. It opened to the page which George so often looked at now—the page on which his mother's picture was.

"This is your mother, is it not? I never saw her but once, but this is like her, I think."

"Yes, aunt," said the boy, turning so that he could keep his eyes on his treasure, lest in some way it should be spirited away from him.

It was a cold, critical, not an approving look that Aunt Virginia bent on the page. She looked at it in silence for a minute or two, and then said with that sharp, sudden manner of hers that always seemed to George like the click of a steel trap, "Did you love her, George?"

The tears welled up into the boy's eyes, as he said, "Oh, so much, but not so much as I should do if I could have her back again. She was very good to me." He could say no more; his desolation overpowered him, and he put his arm on the table, and leaning his head upon it, he wept bitterly.

"There," said Aunt Virginia, "do not cry any more. Go out into the garden now and let the catechism go for to-day." George obeyed in silence, too much surprised that he was not reproved, to say anything. And Aunt Virginia left alone with the picture before her sat and pondered.

Presently George entered the room again to say "Good-night," before retiring. "Come here, George," said his aunt, "do you know, where your mother is? She is in heaven now and you will see her again if you are a good boy. Kiss me now, and I will try to help you."

After that night a change come over the stern old lady. She had found the point in which George was vulnerable. He was not quite the hard, obstinate, headstrong boy she had thought him. Words of kindness and encouragement won from him a response that amazed her. His warm Southern temperament expanded under the genial treatment, and he became tractable and docile.

She commenced to love him, and the consciousness of her love unlocked the door of his heart that had remained firmly closed under reproof and correction. Though the boy never forget his mother, his aunt held the next place in his heart, and when, in after years, he closed her eyes in death, he knew that he had lost a wise and affectionate friend.

A VICIOUS ELEPHANT.

(See Illustration.)

On Thursday, April 5th, Pilot, the large elephant in the menagerie of Mr. P. T. Barnum, was killed by order of the managers of the collection, it having been found impossible to subdue his vicious temper, and it being considered dangerous to the keepers and the public to permit him to live.

One of the long catalogue of Pilot's misdeeds is depicted in the illustration on page 269. He was on exhibition in Madison Square Garden, New York, when one of his periodical fits of ill temper came over him. He was successful in concealing his ill humor until a keeper named Morgan passed in front of him, when he struck the man with his trunk, and then encircling him with it drew him close to his feet, and flinging him heavily to the ground attempted to trample on his victim with his huge feet. Happily Colonel Artingstall was within call, and the cries of those who witnessed the affair summoned him in time to save Morgan's life.

Pilot was a native of Ceylon, and was about thirty years of age. He was captured in 1873 and sold to an English collector who exhibited him for four years. But in 1877 he attacked his keeper in the same way as he attacked Morgan, and there being no one within call, Pilot trampled the life out of him. Pilot was then chained to the ground, and in this condition was purchased by Mr. Barnum and removed to America.

Pilot's last escapade, which cost him his life, was an attack on another elephant. On April 4th, Pilot, Albert, and Gypsy, the last a female elephant, were being led to the troughs in Madison Square Garden to drink. Suddenly and without the least warning, Pilot made a furious lunge at Albert, and gave him a blow which toppled him over on his side. As Albert rose again he was received by another blow, which again upset him, and by this time the entire troop of elephants were bellowing with excitement. Gypsy, in the mean time, had tried to force her way in between the two brutes, but was pushed gently aside by Pilot, and the two male elephants came together again with a crash. In the "butting" struggle which followed, three of the posts supporting the floor of the amphitheatre above were knocked down. The beams forming these posts were sixteen inches square, and they were firmly braced both above and below.

As soon as the fight began Mr. Newman, the trainer in charge, hurried to the spot, and by vigorously beating Pilot succeeded in driving him back to his stall, and chaining both his fore feet to the floor. While this was being done the elephant stood with his trunk and tail uplifted, and his huge ears spread wide open, but he made no effort to resist the chains. As Mr. Newman arose, however, after securing the brute, Pilot made a lunge at him with his head, and struck him in the mouth with his tusks, breaking one of the upper teeth and loosening the others, and knocking the trainer half senseless to the floor. Pilot made a second blow at him with his trunk, just touching his cheek, which left a bruise as the mark of the blow, and then seeing Newman's hat, which had dropped from his head as he fell, the elephant vented his rage on this, tearing it to shreds in his mouth in an instant, and then stamping upon it viciously. This outbreak sealed Pilot's fate, and he was shot by order of his owners.

Pilot Attacking the Keeper.

MR. DELANEY'S PRAYER OVERHEARD.

(See Illustration.)

Hartfield House was rented to a new tenant. An elderly lady was observed issuing from the gates and walking toward the village. There she inquired her way to the house of an Episcopal clergyman well known and respected by the inhabitants, and being directed she found the house and entered. That was Mrs. Delaney.

What her business was with the clergyman was soon learned. Presently the Rev. Thomas Southey, or the Dominie, as he was called in the village, was seen leaving his house with Mrs. Delaney. They went together to a house on the outskirts of the village where lived one Edward Cowley, a man who bore the reputation of being the laziest loafer in the village.

"Ah! Cowley I am glad to find you at home," said the clergyman. "Here is a lady who wants some one to work, and you are just the man, I believe, to suit her."

"It is not hard work," Mrs. Delaney said, in a soft, sweet voice. "My husband has come to live at Hartfield House, the place on the South road with a large garden. You know it, I suppose. He has been an invalid for some time and is unable to walk. We have an invalid's chair on wheels, and as Mr. Delaney cannot walk, we want some strong man to draw it around the garden for an hour or two every day."

Cowley thought that work would agree with him much better than digging or hoeing or stable work, which were the occupations he generally had to perform. He therefore simply asked, "Wot's the pay?" That was settled to his satisfaction, and the next day he reported himself for duty at Hartfield House.

Mr. Delaney, Cowley's new employer, was a clergyman whose hoary locks showed that he was approaching the age when strength is only "labor and sorrow." He had fought a good fight and was near the time of deliverance. His lower limbs were paralyzed, and it was therefore necessary to lift him in and out of his chair.

Cowley was impressed with this helplessness, and felt something akin to pity as he lifted the aged clergyman for the first time. That sentiment grew day by day as he became better acquainted with Mr. Delaney.

One day Cowley presented himself at the clergyman's house with evident indications of having only just slept off the effects of a heavy drinking bout. This was the first he had been guilty of since Mrs. Delaney engaged him, and he was evidently ashamed of it. When out in the garden Mr. Delaney having the man all alone asked him gently and kindly about the matter, and Cowley being treated kindly, told his story. Mr. Delaney listened attentively, and when he had finished pleaded with him earnestly to abandon his wicked habit, and ask God to give him a new heart.

The wheeled chair was at this time under the shadow of several large trees, and the sunlight flooded the luxuriant growths of the garden around. The balmy air of the summer morning was very refreshing, and Mr. Delaney said, "I should like to stay here a while quietly. Go you back to the house and have some dinner, and come back to me in half an hour."

Cowley had no appetite for dinner, and beside he was in no mood for conversation, so instead of going to the house he walked away a little distance, and then flung himself on a grassy bank where Mr. Delaney could not see him, and sat still. The clergyman was sitting quietly in his chair for a few minutes, and then Cowley heard him speaking. He listened. Mr. Delaney was praying. Yes, he was praying that God would give Cowley a new heart. The man had never heard such pleading before. He was amazed that this good old man whom he had known but a short time should be so in earnest for his salvation. Cowley was not concerned about his soul as this good man was concerned for him. It was a revelation to him. Presently Mr. Delaney ceased, and soon Cowley rose and went to the chair.

"I've been thinking over that 'ere advice o' yourn," he said, "and I'm going to do it. I believe it'll kill me, but I won't touch another drop."

"God be thanked," said Mr. Delaney. "Pray to Him, Cowley, He'll keep you. I am over seventy years old, and I never knew Him fail any one yet."

Cowley did pray, and before many days had passed Mr. Delaney was rejoicing that in the days of his feebleness, and when he believed his work for the Master was done, God had given him yet another soul.

PETER BLAKE'S VOYAGE.

A SERIAL STORY BY HESBA STRETTON.

A Wife's Anxiety.

The articles were signed early the next morning in Penrose's office. Peter was careful to inquire the name of the owner of the Dolphin, and was told that it was James Blackburn—a name quite strange to him, but it satisfied him that the ship was not the property of Penrose. Within the last few years Penrose had lost a large number of vessels, and prudent seamen fought shy of sailing in one of his boats.

Yet as the day wore on, busy as he and Victor were, he grew somewhat uneasy about the coming voyage. From one side of the bow-window overlooking the river he could see the lading of the Dolphin. Every hour she was sinking lower and lower in the water; yet still the cargo was being stowed away in every spare foot of room. If the vessel was sound and seaworthy, and if the weather was fair, the trip might be made with safety; but he could see plainly that no margin was being left for unforeseen casualties. It was quite clear, too, that there must be some cargo on deck; and he knew very well how greatly that would add to the difficulty of managing the ship.

He was a brave man; and he had a sincere, hearty trust in God. But he did not look to God to work a miracle in order to avert the consequences of man's negligence or covetousness. Perhaps he had been too hasty in signing articles; yet he had been satisfied at the time—satisfied by his own slight inspection of the Dolphin, and by the assurances of Captain Norcott and Fleck. Moreover, he had lately declined to go aboard two or three doubtful boats, and his funds were well-nigh exhausted. He knew that Bessie had only a little money in the purse before he had brought her the instalment of his wages, paid over to him as soon as he had signed his articles.

He could hardly bear to look round from the window from which he had seen the greedy overloading of the Dolphin, upon those dear to him in the home he was so soon to leave. His mother and wife were busy, almost too busy for sorrow. Bessie was washing, and his mother stitching away with swift fingers at the clothes he and Victor were to take with them. The baby lay on the hearth, kicking his heels against the floor and babbling soft little baby-sounds, which passed unnoticed in the general press of work. His little girl had been in his arms, clinging round his neck, while he pointed out to her the pretty ship he was going to sail down the river in.

He knew that all the comfort and happiness of these helpless women and children depended upon his life; and he was about to intrust his life to the heavily-laden ship, now sinking lower and lower in the water. But there was no help for it. If he ran back now, he would not only be branded as a coward, but he would be imprisoned for three months in the common jail, among a vile horde of criminals. He felt that he could never get over that. He knew what a rowdy crew in the forecastle of a vessel was; but he shrank none the less from the degradation and contamination of a company of convicts and criminals.

"What ails you, Peter; what makes you so low?" said Bessie, the tears starting to her eyes as she asked the question.

"Why, it's quitting thee, lass," he answered, trying hard to speak cheerfully; "thee, and mother, and the little young creatures. How'd you like me to be as gay as a lark just now?"

"It's nought else?" she asked again; "there's nought against the ship, is there?"

"Everybody says she's a good ship," he said; "Fleck told me he'd sailed in her twice, and he's willing to sail in her again, though he's careful of his neck, Fleck is. And Captain Norcott's a very cautious man; I never heard a word against our captain."

"Fleck's nobody to go by," said Bessie, sadly; "he'd be no loss to anybody. But the captain spoke well; and you're very cautious yourself, aren't you, Peter? I'm certain sure that if it was me that was going, and you that had to stay at home with the children, thinking all the while, 'Maybe Bessie's lying at the bottom of the sea this very minute,' you'd never, never let me go out in a ship that wasn't trusty."

"Bessie," said her husband, tenderly, "we know who takes care of thee and me."

"Yes," she sobbed, "yes, my dear; but I think sometimes, if God Almighty could be worn out and wearied, it's with the prayers we women pray to Him, to take care of our men at sea. There's days and days when the cry is never out of my heart, like as if I was a poor helpless baby, crying and moaning to Him. I know He loves us all, and cares for us all; and yet men are drowned at sea, and their wives never see them any more, and never hear their voices call to them; and they have to fight their way through the world all alone. You are sure she's a good ship?"

"She's a beauty," put in Victor, eagerly; "a regular beauty. She's the prettiest boat in the river at this minute, that's what she is. Don't you be afraid, Bessie; nor you, mother. There isn't half as much danger on board as there is down High Street; not a quarter. I'm more afraid for Nannie going along the street, than you need be for us. Why, it's certain that God is with every one of us."

Victor's face flushed deeply, and his eyes sparkled as he spoke. The last words were not uttered as if they were a mere form of speech. He did not even say them with that half mistrust of their truth with which Peter and Bessie had spoken of God's care. His voice faltered and fell a little; but he felt sure of what he was saying.

"Jesus Christ knows what it is," he went on, tremulously. "He knows what storms are, and how boats are tossed up and down, and how men are at their wits' end; and he's heard their cry, 'Lord, save us, or we perish.' It isn't as if Jesus had never come down into this world, and been a man like us. I daresay His mother was fearfully frightened the night there was that great storm at sea, and she didn't know how He could be saved. But He came home safe in the morning; and He'd see how terrified she'd been, and He'd comfort her and make much of her. It isn't as if He did not know exactly. I suppose He loved His mother, the same way Peter and we do; only ten thousand times better. I'm glad Jesus knows what it was to go away and leave her; ay, and come back again too."

"Victor speaks true," said the old mother, lifting up her brown, wrinkled hands; "the Lord Jesus, He knows all about it, and the good God sent Him to be made like us. I will make a little prayer to Him many, many times by night and by day."

There was nothing more said for a time. The last hours were slipping quickly away, and the moment for parting came too soon at last. Bessie and little Nannie clung weeping to Peter. The old mother looked pale and anxious; but she neither cried nor spoke much. Already she had lost her husband at sea; and she knew how impossible it was for her sons to guard against the same perils. She had lived among seafaring folk all her life, and was not afraid of the necessary dangers of a seafaring life; but there was always a secret dread in her heart that the vessel her sons sailed in was not seaworthy. That they might have intrusted their lives to some rotten old hull was what gave the greatest bitterness to seeing them sail from any English port.

"Is it a good ship?" were her last words to Peter, as she held his sunburnt face between both her hands, and gazed earnestly into his eyes.

"Ay, mother; don't be afraid," he answered, though his voice was nearly choked in speaking to her.

At the last moment two of the crew refused to sail in the Dolphin, on the score of her being overladen. The pilot was on board, and all was ready, but they steadily resisted every effort to get them to set a foot upon her. The river police were called to urge them to their duty or to take them into custody, but they declared loudly they would rather spend the next three months in the worst jail ashore than run the risk of sailing with such a cargo. Captain Norcott argued and stormed by turns, and such of the men as were not drunk overwhelmed them with abuse, excepting Peter Blake, who stood by in silence. By the desertion of these two, the dangers they feared to face were considerably increased for those who remained, as there was now no time to fill up their places, and the Dolphin would be undermanned.

"Captain," said Peter, as the two men were led away by the policemen, "I'd give all the world if you'd let Victor off."

"Hold your tongue, you coward," answered the captain passionately, "if any other soul goes it shall be to jail like those rascals yonder."

The Dolphin sailed slowly down the river, tugged by its little pilot-boat. It was growing dusk, and Peter and Victor could see the light already shining through the bow-window of their home. In a little while they saw too the heads of those who were looking through it at the passing vessel. There was Bessie, with the baby nestling up against her neck, and the dear old mother, holding Nannie, as if to keep her from falling through the open casement. They had lit the lamp that Victor and Peter might see them more clearly. "Thank God!" said Peter to himself, "they don't know what's been going on at the wharf."

But it could not be long before they heard the bad news. The gossip soon spread from one to another throughout Wapping that two sailors had gone to jail rather than sail in the Dolphin. Bessie's cousin, the sailmaker, came in to tell her the first thing in the morning.

"So Peter's off in the Dolphin," he said, significantly. "Well, well, they tell me she was only a few inches above water amidships, and that was in the river, where the water's as smooth as a pond. Dear! dear! to think that men with wives and children will run such risks! But he had always a fine spirit, had Peter, afore he married. He's been more timorous since, but his spirit is showing itself again now. How ever could you let him go in the Dolphin, Bessie?"

"Captain Norcott said it was a very good ship," answered Bessie, trying hard not to let herself be frightened. She knew the old sailmaker was a man who made the worst of everything, and took a pleasure in trouble, especially in the trouble of other people. A day was irksome to him if it did not bring the excitement of hearing of some calamity; and a terrible shipwreck with great loss of life was an event of the utmost interest to him.

"Captain!" he said, in a tone of contempt; "what's a captain's word worth? He wanted a first-rate seaman like your Peter, and he'd swear his head off that the Dolphin was the very best boat in the river."

"Victor's gone, too," said Bessie, trying to speak calmly.

"Victor! Well now, I am sorry," exclaimed the old man. "I shall miss him sore, singing his songs about the house. Madam, why did you let Victor go? Well, I shall never look to hear his voice again. You've heard that two of the crew are gone to jail rather than venture in her."

"No!" cried Bessie. "No. It can't be true. You're frightening me, and it's not kind of you. I'm that shaken I can't bear up against bad news."

"I'm only telling you what they've told me," said the sailmaker, slowly; "everybody is talking about it in High Street. They're all telling the same tale. Why! what's the woman going to do?"

Bessie had started from her rocking-chair as he spoke, and almost tossed the baby into the cradle. All the color had died out of her face, but she was not rendered passive or languid by the shock of dread. She tore down her shawl from the nail behind the door, and before the sailmaker could speak again she had fled from the house, as though by some mighty effort of will and energy she could bring the vessel back to its moorings.

There were plenty of men employed about High Street whom she knew well; for she had lived all her life in Wapping. She seized the arm of the first man she met, and held it with a convulsive strength.

"The Dolphin!" she gasped; "is it a good ship?"

"Ay! ay! good enough," answered the workman, kindly. "Peter's gone aboard her—hasn't he? Don't frighten thyself, Bessie. She's a fairly good ship, and he's a right good seaman."

"But there were two men," she sobbed, "wouldn't go—'ud rather go to jail—is it true?"

"Well, they say so," he answered, reluctantly; "there are always some cowards and fools. But Peter's neither coward nor fool, I reckon. Fleck's gone, and his wife's as content as can be."

"Fleck's wife's not like me," cried Bessie, "and Fleck's not like my Peter. Oh, if any harm comes to him, what shall I do?"

"What harm's to come to him?" asked the man, with a gruff kindness. "He's as safe there as here, and safer may be, if you reckon on the lifeboats. We men can't be shut up in safety-boxes, Bessie Blake. Men must work, and not be too nice about danger. But you keep your mind on the lifeboats, if any storm comes up; and the Dolphin is all right as long as this weather lasts."

PETER PREACHING TO THE GENTILES.

S. S. Lesson for May 6, Acts 10: 30-48. Golden Text, ver. 35. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Education and Labor Simultaneous—Peter had Much to Learn—Cornelius a Type—His Genuine Character—God Teaching Peter—Salvation not the Exclusive Privilege of the Jews—An Audience Gathered — Peter's Disclaimer —His Practical Question — What Cornelius Wanted to Hear—What God had Commanded —The Sermon Followed by Instant Decision—Astonishment of the Jews—Peter Recognized the Work—Diversities of Administration.

In all the course of that glorious work of grace which is described in the Acts of the Apostles, we see how the education of His worker is carried on by God at the same time as the work which He permits him to do. We have seen Peter as the great spokesman on the day of Pentecost, the discerner of Ananias's duplicity, the instrument of healing to a marvellous degree, and used of God also in the raising of the dead; yet this same and God had His own way of bringing him up to the lessons which, as yet, he knew not.

There was a centurion of Cæsarea, and therefore a Gentile, who was seeking after God. Already he feared God, with all his house, no doubt he was a very puritan in his life, liberal in almsgiving, conscientious in making everything a matter of prayer, and yet unsaved. There are such to be found now; men upright in their lives, having the greatest respect for God, most conscientious, men whose lives no man can blame, and who, nevertheless, are unsaved, who pray but receive no answers, their words and deeds irreproachable, and they still unsaved, unable to rejoice in sin forgiven. But one day while he was in prayer, quite unexpectedly to him, there came an answer to his prayer. Startled and afraid he cried, "What is it, Lord?" And the messenger of God told him how his prayers and alms were "come up for a memorial before God." But he was not saved through them, he must send men to Joppa to seek Peter, who should tell him words whereby he and all his house should be saved.

Cornelius was a real man; and such are always teachable. Some people are offended if any one suggests that they do not know all that is to be known, or experience all which is to be experienced; and they would rather he thought to be right than really be so. But Cornelius was real to the backbone. No sooner had he found out there was something for him to learn than he told two of his servants and one of his soldiers, of God's revelation to him, and he trusted them to be his messengers to Peter.

Meanwhile God was preparing Peter. He was in prayer, and became very hungry, and while they were making ready, God sent him a vision of a great sheet knit at the four corners, containing all kinds of four-footed beasts, wild beasts, creeping things, fowls of the air, etc., and a voice called to him, "Rise, Peter; kill, and eat."

PETER'S JEWISH CONSCIENCE

immediately refused. "Not so, Lord; for I have never eaten anything that is common or unclean. And the voice spake unto him again the second time, What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common." This was three times repeated, and Peter recognized that God had spoken, but could not at once discern His meaning. While thinking about it, the messengers from Cornelius came and inquired for him. And with their inquiry that voice from heaven which he knew so well; "the Spirit said unto him, Behold, three men seek thee. Arise therefore, and get thee down, and go with them, doubting nothing; for I have sent them." It did not take him long to discover that they were Gentiles, and sent to him by a Gentile seeking the salvation of his soul.

Up to this time Peter had looked upon salvation as the exclusive right of the Jew. In spite of the command of Jesus to go and disciple all nations, the apostles had remained at Jerusalem; they only went as far as Samaria, where they heard how God had been working there independently of them, and now God had to send a special revelation to Peter in order that he should understand the Scripture, "It is a light thing that Thou shouldest be My Servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the preserved of Israel; I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that Thou mayest be My salvation unto the ends of the earth." (Isa. 49: 6). But Peter, once fully persuaded that it was the will of God the Gentiles should be saved, went fearlessly forward; the barrier of prejudice was broken down, he was at the disposal of the Holy Ghost; he lodged the men from Cæsarea, and on the morrow went with them accompanied by some brethren from Joppa.

Meanwhile Cornelius had not been idle, he "had called together his kinsmen and near friends." Up to this time he had never known what it was to receive a message from God. Everything must give way to this. And so, regardless of any plans which they may have made, or of any business in which they were engaged, he gathered together all his relations and all his near friends. It is probable that Cornelius had spoken with them before this time, about his convictions that the God whom the Jews worshipped was the only true God; there may in this way have been a preparation beforehand for the visit of Peter. Oh, that men were more in earnest for the salvation of their friends!

When Peter met Cornelius, he immediately forbade any honor of himself, and then told out frankly the lesson which God had been teaching him, that he should not call any man common or unclean. "Therefore came I unto you without gainsaying, as soon as I was sent for: I ask therefore, ye have sent for me?" This was practical. Well would it be for every preacher and every congregation to face this question every time they meet. For what intent am I here to preach to this people? For what intent am I here to listen to this minister? There would be more direct preaching, and there would be less criticism of sermons. Peter, having told his experience, Cornelius began to tell his. Oh, how soon men get near one to another when they each have something to tell of what God has done for them. Cornelius ended in saying, "Now therefore are we all here present before God, to hear all things that are commanded thee of God." Men in such a position cannot fail to obtain blessing. The terrible powerlessness of most of the preaching in our day, comes from the preacher not knowing for what intent he is there to preach, not recognizing just what God would have him do, and also from the people being present before man to hear what he has to say, instead of before God to hear what He has commanded to be said. With such an audience as that in Cornelius's house, with such a preacher as Peter just full of his new lesson, no wonder the whole company was saved and filled with the Holy Ghost.

PETER'S FIRST WORDS

in preaching were to recognize that God is no respecter of persons, but in every nation he that feareth Him, and worketh righteousness is accepted with Him. This truth, new to Peter, was just that which the Gentiles wanted as a ground on which to go forward, for if the Jews were the only elect, then the seeking after God on their part was only so much lost time. Then Peter spoke of his Lord, "The word which God sent by Jesus Christ (He is Lord of all, both Jew and Gentile) . . . how God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost and with power, who went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil, for God was with him." This was his message —Jesus, Jesus anointed, Jesus blessing, Jesus healing, and then Jesus slain, Jesus risen, Jesus the Judge of quick and dead. But this was not all discourse, there was testimony also, "We are witnesses of all things which He did."

There was no prejudice in the minds of the hearers, they were open to receive all the instruction which could be given. There was no kicking against the truth, and the truth was there. But as Peter spoke of Jesus ordained of God to be the Judge of quick and dead, they, with the light of eternity just breaking in upon them, must have felt themselves in an awfully perilous position. It may be that some were even then raising up a prayer, and saying, "Is there then no way of escape? Must we be condemned and confounded? Did this Jesus assuage suffering on earth and yet make no provision for eternity?" But the preacher went on "To Him give all the prophets witness that through His name whosoever believeth on Him shall receive remission of sins." Here was just what they wanted. Would they believe and be saved? or would they be like thousands in our own day, and turn aside to consider about it? After that sermon there was on the part of every soul present, men, women, children, servants, soldiers. While Peter yet spake these words (these words about believing) the Holy Ghost fell on all them which heard the Word. They believed; they were baptized with the Holy Ghost.

The Jews who had not learned the same lesson as Peter, could not understand this. "They of the circumcision which believed were astonished, as many as came with Peter, because that on the Gentiles also was poured out the gift of the Holy Ghost." And yet they could not deny it, for "they heard them speak with tongues, and magnify God." There was no doubt as to the fact, the evidence was so plain, but to a Jewish mind it was all wrong, it ought not to have been. Then answered Peter the once strongly prejudiced Jew, "Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized, which have received the Holy Ghost as well as we? And he commanded them to be baptized in the name of the Lord."

PETER RECOGNIZED THE WORK of the Holy Ghost, he knew that no course of religious instruction would have done for this people that which the Holy Ghost had done instantaneously. Oh, for more of Holy Ghost work among us! In this history we see how completely prejudice had to give way, how fully pliable in the hands of the Spirit of God Peter was, in order to be so used. And then the Cæsareans were so receptive that there was no difficulty on their side, and thus God had His way fully, and the glorious work was done. Again we see the faith of Peter in taking with him the very men who would be likely to condemn his preaching to the Gentiles, because he counted on God to justify him. Any failure in faith on the part of the instrument whom God uses may hinder the work of the Spirit of God.

Again we see that the Holy Ghost is not always given in the same way. The disciples received Him on the day of Pentecost in the shape of a mighty rushing wind and cloven tongues of fire sitting upon each of them, the Samaritans received the Spirit by the laying on of hands, while the Cæsareans received Him simply through believing while the gospel was being preached to them. "Now there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit. And there are differences of administrations, but the same Lord. And there are diversities of operations, but it is the same God which worketh all in all" (1 Cor. 12: 4-6). But that which we have to remember is that "the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal." The most precious gift of the Holy Ghost is to the Church and for the Church not to the individual. Were there more men like Peter, given up to the Holy Ghost and to the work of God, there would be more conversions like those we have just read of in Cæsarea.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Coronation of the Czar of Russia is now definitely fixed to take place on May 27th. The festivities will be continued until June 8th. The cable brings intelligence of immense preparations. In the Kremlin, where the ceremony will take place, all the towers on the outer wall are surrounded by scaffolding, and even on all sides of the "Great Ivan," the highest point of the ancient castle, workmen can be seen high up in their hanging seats. The electric illumination has been completed, and every night a powerful light is displayed over the principal tower like a great star. The inner parts of the Kremlin are also still barricaded with scaffolding for the erection of three large stands, next to the church with the imperial sepulchres. The highest officials of the Empire, the Council of State, the Ministerial Committee, the Senate and the Holy Synod will take up their temporary residence at Moscow during the coronation. For the safety of the city a special guard will be formed, consisting of 50,000 citizens, who will be selected from each division. The total strength of the troops at Moscow during the coronation is now fixed at 55,000 men, with no fewer than 121 generals and 2417 staff officers. Numerous arrests of suspected Nihilists continue to be made.

Daniel Curley, the Second Member of the gang charged with the murder of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke, was tried and convicted in Dublin last week. He was sentenced to be hanged on May 18th. An attempt was made by the defence to prove an alibi, but it broke down hopelessly. Two of the witnesses gave contradictory evidence testifying that they saw the prisoner at the hour the murder was committed, in different places widely separated from each other. Carey, the town councillor, who has turned informer, was again the principal witness for the government. He admitted that he had himself been engaged in twenty attempts to take the life of Mr. Forster. He said that he would not have called Mr. Forster's "removal" a murder. He also said that the conspirators had arranged for the assassination on the 4th of May last of Lieutenant-Colonel Hillier, then Inspector General of the Royal Irish Constabulary, and Mr. Burke. Carey said he did not think that Mr. Burke deserved to be murdered, but he would not have cried at anything that happened to Mr. Forster. Curley stated in court that he belonged to the Fenian organization. The trial of Timothy Kelly, another of the prisoners charged with being concerned in the same murder, resulted in a disagreement of the jury. They stood eleven for guilty, and one for acquittal.

Another Secret Society has been Discovered in Ireland. It is called the Vigilants. The first clue to the existence of the conspiracy was obtained by the confession of a man named Tubridy, who has given full particulars in court of the murder of a man named Kennedy by assassins who were brought from a distance to perform the deed. Tubridy states that he belonged to a secret society, in which he was obliged by threats to continue. In January, 1882, the society was reorganized with the special object of killing landlords, agents and spies. The local leader was a man named MacInerney. He introduced to the members a stranger from Dublin who said he had travelled all through other countries, and formed societies. He stated that the Land League would supply the society with arms, and promised that the League would pay MacInerney the expenses incurred by men who were sent out of their own districts. He also said members might have to go to various parts of Ireland and even to England to shoot landlords and agents.

The Eight Dynamite Plotters Arrested in England underwent a preliminary examination in London, on April 19th. As is usual in all Irish trials, one of the number volunteered to make a confession and testify against his companions. Norman, the man first arrested, who stated that his real name was Lynch, made a detailed statement averring that he was employed by a club in New York to go to England and assist in the dynamite explosions. He received his passage money from Dr. Gallagher, of Greenpoint, L. I., who is one of the prisoners, and was informed that O'Donovan Rossa would pay him further sums. In London he met Gallagher by appointment, and walked with him past the scene of the recent explosion in the Government offices at Westminster. He asked, "Is that what we are going to do?" Gallagher replied, "Yes; and it won't be child's play, either." They passed half way over Westminster Bridge, when Gallagher, who had been viewing the Houses of Parliament, remarked: "They will make a great crash when they come down." Gallagher also pointed out other buildings that it was intended to destroy. Subsequently he was sent to Birmingham to procure the explosive materials, and on his return was arrested. He revealed the passwords of the society, and gave other important information. It is stated by English journals that the facts disclosed will enable the English Government to claim the extradition of O'Donovan Rossa, and that Mr. Parnell is implicated by some of the confessions. The statute under which the prisoners are arrainged permits the judge, in the event of conviction, to pronounce a sentence of penal servitude for life.

The Triple Alliance Continues to be the subject of conjecture in Europe. The provisions of the treaty are kept secret, but the correspondent of the London Times states that the agreement between Germany, Austria and Italy was reached in June last, at which time a triple note was drawn up guaranteeing the respective territories and maritime rights of the three countries against aggression. The agreement is to last for six years. It is evident, however, that these statements are not authoritative.

The Malagese Envoys have Arrived in England from America. A deputation composed of several members of Parliament and other prominent men waited on them on their landing, and congratulated them on the satisfactory result of their visit to the United States, and expressed the hope that it would lead to an entente between the United States and Madagascar. The deputation also wished the envoys success in their negotiations with France. The chief envoy, in reply, spoke in warm praise of the kindness which the envoys received in America. As an instance of the interest of the United States Government in the Welfare of Madagascar, he cited its intention to promote its agent in Madagascar to the rank of consul. Advices from Zanzibar state that the British war sloop Dragon has been ordered to Madagascar.

The French Movement on the Congo is viewed with hostility by several European countries. Portuguese journals state that the French have occupied Porta Negra, on the Congo, after some resistance on the part of the natives. In the Portuguese Chamber of Deputies a despatch from the Governor of Angola was read. It stated that the French occupied Porta Negra and Loango on the 28th of March. The natives protested against this action to the captain of the Portuguese cruiser, Bengo, who made a formal protest to the French authorities. It is expected that a conflict with the French will follow, and that Mr. Henry M. Stanley will require a ship and forces for his protection. The European correspondent of the Sun says: There is a strong feeling in support of Stanley in England, and the vigorous and aggressive policy of the French in south-western Africa is regarded with great hostility. It is evident that a serious conflict is imminent between De Brazza and Stanley, and it is probable that the latter will be reënforced at once. He is not in a position, at present, to dispute the territory with the French, whose forcible occupation of Ponta Negra shows clearly what their intentions are. The tone of the French papers is significant. They say that De Brazza is no longer a half-clad, penniless explorer, but the commander of a French man-of-war, with a regiment of trained troops and 20,000 stand of arms at his command, and able and anxious to requite Stanley's insolence. British interests on the coast are important and increasing, and Stanley has such a large commercial following that his progress is watched with great anxiety. An English man-of-war will probably be ordered to the Congo in a few days.

A Bill Prohibiting a Practice which has directly tended to the increase of drunkenness, has been introduced into the British House of Lords. It has long been the custom of certain firms, especially railroad contractors and employers, whose workmen are engaged at a distance from the headquarters of the firm, to arrange to pay the men at the nearest tavern. The men with their pockets well lined would then spend a considerable sum in rum instead of taking the money home to their families. No rule is more strictly observed by the ordinary British workingman than that which requires those who make use of a gin-palace to drink for "the good of the house." Lord Shaftesbury's intimate knowledge of the working-classes made him a warm supporter of the bill. Lord Bramwell, a judge, affirmed that on Saturday thrice as many offences were committed as on any other day in the week.

Mr. Francis Murphy, the American Temperance advocate, whose portrait and life appeared recently in this journal, is now laboring at Swansea in Great Britain. In a letter to a friend in New Orleans, Mr. Murphy intimates that he will visit that city upon his return to the United States. He says of the temperance "cause" abroad: "The work in England has gone on apace until the Queen has said 'well done.' Millions of the people have signed the pledge, reducing the revenue £2,500,000, and the Postmaster found it in the savings of the people in pure gold."

The Recent Earthquake at Cyprus was of a more serious and alarming character than the first reports made it appear. A gentleman who was on the spot at the time says it lasted about fifty or sixty seconds. At Limasol the houses swayed and rocked in the most appalling manner, and uncemented walls fell to the ground. An English regiment, which was on parade at Polemedia, was hurriedly dismissed, and ran from the parade-ground, headed by the sergeant-major, strong fears being entertained that the ground would open. A most ludicrous scene was enacted in the streets, people rushing about in nightshirts, or with great-coats hastily drawn over them. The mules and horses staggered about as though in fits, and altogether it was the severest shock which has been recorded for many years. This is only another of those terrestrial phenomena heralding the more alarming portents of the closing days of the dispensation.

Volume V. of the Christian Herald and Signs of our Times is now ready, bound in cloth, containing all the numbers for 1882 with complete index. Price $3 including postage. Ten per cent less to ministers and the trade.

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman (London), for April, may be obtained at the office of The Christian Herald, price six cents, postage paid.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of The Christian Herald, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

SIX NEWLY-ELECTED UNITED STATES SENATORS.

A GROUP OF U. S. SENATORS.

THE portraits on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week, for which we are indebted to the courtesy of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, are those of six of the United States Senators elected this year, and who will with the Forty-eighth Congress commence their six years' term of office. Of the six, only two are strangers to the Senate Chamber. Senator Colquitt, of Georgia, and Senator Bowen, of Colorado, will take their seats as Senators for the first time in December. The other four have been re-elected, and one of them more than once. Senator Anthony has now served four terms and is about to commence his fifth; Senators Coke, Hoar and Plumb have served one term each.

The freedom of press criticism which under our free institutions is carried to its utmost limit, has often led young people and even people whose years should have given them sufficient experience to have preserved them from the error, to think and speak less highly of our public men than they deserve. It is our habit to disparage men who occupy high places in the government; and to such an extent has this habit been indulged that foreigners who read our newspapers and visitors who mix in our society are apt to conclude from the animadversions launched against the administration and Congress that they are uniformly unprincipled, unscrupulous men who "fear not God, neither regard man." This is an evil because it is unjust to the men so criticised, and it tends to lower the national character in the eyes of other nations. In other lands it is the custom to criticise the measures introduced into the legislatures and to urge their adoption or rejection, as the case may be. The politicians who are responsible for their introduction are blamed or praised for bringing them forward, and they are held to have proved thereby their fitness or unfitness for the exalted position they occupy. To speak of them as swindlers, thieves and plunderers, as is often done here, is a practice known nowhere else. When condemnation is called for in other lands, it generally takes the form of a charge of incapacity, of weakness of mind, or of stupidity, and it would be deemed a monstrous outrage on decency to charge them with acting and voting from corrupt motives, or of wilfully setting their own private interest above the public good.

Unhappily for us, there has been in isolated cases cause for us so to suspect and to condemn. Men have occasionally succeeded in imposing on their fellow-citizens, and have hypocritically concealed their real character until secure of election, and have then acted in such a manner as would, could their conduct have been foreseen, have prevented their election. In other cases the elevated position in which they find themselves placed has turned a brain too weak for their position, and they have fallen through a moral weakness neither they nor those who elected them previously suspected. In other cases again, they, or those who were prominent in advocating their election, unwittingly pledged themselves to a line of conduct or to the advocacy of particular measures which, when elected, they would willingly have repudiated, when they find that the fulfilment of their pledges is antagonistic to the national interest. In that position they have been placed in an awkward dilemma, out of which they have seldom come with credit to themselves.

Such instances as these have led the public to look on all public men with suspicion, and to class all under one common condemnation. Yet in doing so we are often guilty of injustice. We ought carefully to avoid condemning the innocent with the guilty, and we ought also, in criticising the conduct of public men, to exercise Christian charity, and remembering the temptations that abound in political life to be careful while denouncing evil and wrong doing, not to judge mercilessly or uncharitably. It is also the Christian's duty to pray that God would direct us in the choice of men to conduct the business of this great country, and to beseech Him continually to guide and direct them, to give them the strength and wisdom they need, and to keep them from evil.

For the information of our readers in other countries it only remains to add that under our constitution all U. S. Senators are elected by the legislatures of the respective States. Each State, whether it be large or small, whether its population be numerous or few, is entitled to two seats in the Senate, and no more. New York with over five millions of population sends two Senators, and Nevada, with her sixty-two thousand citizens, has two Senators. The senatorial term is six years, and the elections are so arranged that one third of the Senate shall retire every alternate year. The salary of a Senator is five thousand dollars a year. The mileage allowed for each annual session is twenty cents per mile each way, and there is an additional allowance of $125 a year for stationery and newspapers. These remarks do not, of course, apply to State Senators, but only to the statesmen elected to the United States Senate.

SENATOR COLQUITT, Of Georgia.

Alfred Holt Colquitt, who has been elected to the United States Senate for the term beginning last March, was born in Walton County, Ga., April 20th, 1824. His grandfather, a native of Virginia, settled in Georgia in 1801. His father, Walter T. Colquitt, was a brilliant member of both branches of Congress. The Senator-elect was graduated at Princeton College in 1844, and in 1845, after studying law with his father, he was admitted to the bar at Columbus, Ga. He began to practise at Macon.

In 1847 he served with the army in Mexico as a major, acting at Buena Vista as an aid to General Taylor. He returned to his profession in 1848, and four years later he was elected to the Thirty-third Congress as a Democrat. He made a good impression in Congress, but he declined a renomination on account of the death of his wife. In 1856 and 1860 he was a delegate to the National Democratic Conventions, and in the latter year he was an elector on the Breckenridge and Lane ticket.

Under the institution of slavery, when he was himself a large slave-holder, he used to gather the negroes together and read and explain the Bible to them on Sabbath evenings; and his earliest interest in Sunday-school work, with which his name is now so prominently connected, was as a teacher of a colored class in the Sunday-school of the church where he held his membership.

The negroes loved him as their best friend, and when the war broke out, and he was called away to the battle-fields of Florida, he left his wife and children to their unaided protection, no white man being near them. And his confidence was abundantly justified; for one of the first letters that reached him by the uncertain postal communication of those four years of disorganization and war contained a little passage in words like these: "Godfrey carries on the meeting every evening as usual, and last night —— passed by the room and heard him praying for you. He said, 'O Lord God, bless our good master. Protect him in de war, and if it is in accordance wid dy will, quickly bring him back to his dear wife and de children.'"

After the emancipation, when the freedmen wished to have a larger number of churches of their own, instead of worshipping in the white churches as they had been generally in the custom of doing, the first church that was built for them was erected by Governor Colquitt.

He entered the Confederate Army early in the war as a captain in the 6th Georgia. He rose rapidly in rank, becoming a brigadier-general September 30th, 1862. As a brigadier he had command of the 6th, 19th, 23d, 27th and 28th Georgia regiments, the brigade being attached to Hill's division of Lee's Army of Northern Virginia. He took part in all the great campaigns in Virginia, performing signal services at Antietam and Sharpsburg. He was in command at the battle of Ocean Pond, or Olustee, Florida, and there he won the title of "Hero of Olustee" for his dash, coolness and fine generalship. During the engagement he rode a white horse, and was a marked figure throughout the battle. Returning to Virginia he commanded a division at Drewry's Bluff. In the campaigns aroung Petersburg he won his commission as a major-general, but in the confusion incident to the close of the war it never reached him.

Many incidents are remembered of General Colquitt's behavior during those awful and trying times, when men's characters were tested and their inner nature exposed. During the bombardment of Charleston by the Federal ships of war, James Island, in the harbor, was fortified by the Confederates for the defence of the city.

The exchange of fire was kept up for many days and nights, and the command of the island was held week about by General George P. Harrison, Jr., now of Alabama, General Hagood, now Governor of South Carolina, and General Colquitt. The strain of mind from the prolonged imminent danger and from the responsibility was terrible, and General Colquitt said one day, on being relieved by Harrison, "I would rather face all the forces of the enemy in the open field at once than stand my week of this." But he did his duty sternly.

It was also observed that he had the tenderness of Wellington, which has been often contrasted with the callousness of Napoleon, and that while brave in the face of battle himself, he was careful about his soldiers. On one occasion his brigade was filing past him in a manœuvre preliminary to making a dangerous charge, and the brave fellows, on the brink of a deadly engagement, raised their caps and saluted him with repeated cheers. The sight was too much for him who was to lead many of them to certain death, and a friend who was riding near saw great tears come up to his eyes and roll down his cheeks as the emotions of the moment convulsed his heart.

After the war General Colquitt was engaged for some time in the insurance business, but for a number of years he has been a leader of agricultural and religious progress in Georgia. For a long time he declined all political office, except a few that carried only honor with them.

In 1868 he was a delegate to the National Democratic Convention, and in 1870 he was on the same day made President of the Democratic State Convention and of the State Agricultural Society. He was a delegate to the Baltimore Convention in 1872, and four years later he was elected Governor of Georgia. His administration as Governor of the State has been a creditable one, and of benefit to the State. Toward the freedmen General Colquitt has always shown a kindly feeling, and he has often addressed them from the pulpit. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and holds very decided religious views. As a member of the Agricultural Society of his State, he was the first man who had the wish or courage to take publicly a determined stand against racing and gambling at the State fairs. In person, General Colquitt is a fine specimen of physical manhood, and is dignified in every movement. His face bears the stamp of kindness and good nature, but he is not wanting in positiveness, zeal and purpose.

On the 23d of July, 1856, Governor Colquitt was married to Sarah B. Tarver, widow of Mr. Frederick Tarver, his first wife's brother, and a planter and gentleman of wealth, formerly of Twiggs County, Ga. This lady has been a strong support to her husband, thoroughly identifying herself with his interests, using her exceptional energy for the promotion of his welfare, and presiding at the Executive Mansion, and dispensing its hospitality with genial grace. They have five handsome and well-trained children, all of whom, except the youngest, a boy of nine years, are members of the Church.

his mind, and they made him miserable with the thought of his own sins. Knowing where to seek a remedy, he now read the Bible, and came on the promise in John 5 : 24, 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth My word, and believeth on Him that sent Me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life.' This verse gave him what he needed, and he became a happy, zealous Christian."

Holding on by a Rag!—The Rev. G. L. Carstairs said : "It struck me on Saturday last that people don't really believe how far away they are from God. I was then speaking to a man who was far astray through drink. At one time he had attended an earnest Gospel ministry, and knew the Bible well. In reply to my urgent entreaties, he said, 'I have been in the lock-up, I don't know how often, and in every sense of the word I have been a thorough blackguard,' and so on. He continued speaking against himself, but in such a manner that it showed he did not think he was unable to pay God anything for his salvation, and that without the exercise of Divine mercy he was a lost sinner. To rouse him to the realization of his awful state, I said, 'Yes, and it seems to me that you are a blackguard still!' 'Yes, I am,' he assented with cool cheerfulness. Nothing moved him ; it was plain he thought he had something wherewith to pay his debts to God.' What do you think it was? Why, he said his prayers. He cursed his horse, his acquaintances, and got drunk all the same, but he held on to that rag to save him from the consuming frown of an angry God, and from sinking beneath the dark waves of everlasting doom—he said his prayers!"

THE ENDUEMENT OF POWER BEFORE THE SECOND ADVENT.

Anxious Condition of Christians—The Expected Sign—Success : Purity : Faith—The Doctrine of Quietists—Sloth and Indolence Rebuked—The Church Exhorted—The Cheer of Inspiration—The Armor and Might of True Disciples—The Bride Brought to the King—The Privilege of God's Sons and Daughters—Latter-day Splendor—The Satisfaction of Christ.

TRUE Christians are at the present moment in an anxious, bewildered condition—an uncertain sound is given by every trumpet that man raises to his lips ; and while expectation is at its height the most unsatisfying conjectures are current. All this while the voice of God booms over the waters of the word, and the prophetic horns combine in one volume of grandly solemn measure which is blessedly intelligible to "the wise virgins" (Matt. 25 : 6)—for "the wise shall understand." (Dan. 12 : 10.)

The children of the great King are looking for the glorious "sign of the Son of Man" (Matt. 24 : 27–30) to appear shortly in visible effulgence—even the direct illumination by the Holy Ghost of the faithful witnesses for Jesus "in heaven"—i.e., among His saints, the Church of Christ, who are now individually seated with Him in heavenly places, indwelt by His Spirit, enjoying sensible communion with the Most Holy. These are strong in the strength of the Lord, whose power is all-potent "in heaven and on earth." (Matt. 28 : 18.) They are "partakers of the Divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust." (2 Peter 1 : 4.) They securely rest in His love and participate in His fulness, who has promised to abide with them alway until the end of the age. (Matt. 28 : 20.)

SUCCESS : PURITY : FAITH.

Sanctified watchmen see the light arising on every hand, the morning breaking, which shall usher in the day of God. Heralds of the cross, who have received the anointing as co-workers with Christ, are blessed with marvellous success in His harvest field, even to the gathering of countless sheaves into His garner. Purity is not ashamed to avow her consecration of body, soul, and spirit to the Master's use. She has laid hold on the seamless mantle of Jesus, which His enemies failed to rend—so perfect was the flow of love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, patience that clothed our Redeemer.

Faith is bearing abundant fruit, the gifts of healing have been restored, and the edifice of Bethshan, the Bethesda of the nineteenth century, is occupied with prostrates at the feet of the great Physician, who spoke thus in connection with the outpouring of His Spirit that should incubate the events of which we are cognisant : "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that believeth on Me, the works that I do shall he do also, and greater works than these shall he do, because I go unto My Father." (John 14 : 12.) "Greater than these!" Here is a Divine incentive to follow on to know more and more of their risen Head, till they "reign in life by Him ;" and it behoves the King's sons who have "the secret of the Lord"—are "sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise," to go forth conquering and to conquer, since all things are theirs, and they are Christ's, and Christ is God's.

THE DOCTRINE OF QUIETISTS.

The doctrine preached by quietists, that persuades men to rest on their lees until the Lord shall come to restitute all things, and rule over their enemies with a rod of iron, besides fostering apathy and negligence, and evoking a spirit of domination, abhorrent to the mind of Christ, is utterly at variance with the teaching of Holy Writ. The rod of iron with which our King will govern the nations is the undeviating principle of gospel truth, fixed and beautiful, which cannot bend or bear the curve of any false system ; His sceptre of righteousness with which the clay must be broken, as described by the Psalmist (2 : 9), and earthliness shivered to atoms ; that emancipation from pride, anger, malice, and all uncharitableness may be complete, and the begotten of the Lord rise to newness of life, in perfect union with the Thrice Holy.

SLOTH AND INDOLENCE.

Instead of a lullaby for which there is no warrant in Scripture, the Church has her slumbers interrupted suddenly—consult the prophetic record. (Isaiah 52.) Her sloth and indolence are rebuked ; and God the Holy Ghost, with a voice that wakes the dead, shakes her from the lethargy and decrepitude into which she has fallen ; tells her to get up from the earth, where she has been grovelling ; to loose herself from the Babylonish chains, the lusts, and vanities that encircle her neck, and cause shame and confusion of face ; to flee out of Egypt, the area of bondage to the world, the flesh, and the devil, where, naked and despised, she has lain among idols, bowed down before the things of time and sense, and been exposed, like a fair slave in the open market, to the jeers and criticisms of beholders.

THE CHURCH EXHORTED.

The Spirit shows her right, through purchase, to holy "garments for glory and for beauty" (Ex. 28 : 2)—that await her wondering view—the righteousness of her risen Lord and her gracious Redeemer. He exhorts her with prepared feet to travel the gospel highway, carrying good tidings, publishing peace, taking upon herself the weariness and responsibilities of the watchman, lifting up her voice like him continually, bearing with clean hands the vessels of the Lord, whose name and fame she must celebrate in her life and conversation—her songs of praise issuing from lips touched with a live coal from off the altar, burning with love and compassion for perishing souls, that nations yet unborn may confess the miracle His blood hath wrought as they behold the graces of the glorious Bridegroom reflected in His Bride.

Listen to the cheer of inspiration : "Arise, shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee ; for, behold, the darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people." (Here is the midnight of Matt. 25 : 6.) The thick darkness of religious ambiguities, refined subtleties, scientific speculations, and false god-isms (which shall extinguish the lamps of certain unprepared and "foolish virgins," for the wisdom of this world is "foolishness with God") ; but the Lord shall arise upon them, and the Gentiles (i.e., the uncircumcised) "shall come to Thy light, and kings to the brightness of Thy rising." (Isaiah 60 : 1–3.)

ARMOR AND MIGHT.

So soon as the disciples of Jesus accept His precepts, heed His word, and watch with Him one hour (Matt. 26 : 40), they will become alive to His interests, and allow no traitor to betray their Lord—upheld by the Strength of Israel (Matt. 28 · 18–20) ; and, taking the whole counsel of God for their panoply, they will stand against the wiles of the Devil, and quench all the fiery darts of the wicked.

The blood-washed and sanctified throng who have been quickened to receive the fact that their implacable foe, though mortally wounded by the Captain of their salvation, has concealed himself in their very midst, and defiled the heavenlies with his presence—the Church, in resurrection might, will expose his hiding-place, tread the old serpent under her feet, and cast the reptile out of her assemblies. Then shall the shout of the Archangel, who leads the hosts of the Lord, inspire her song of victory : "Now is come salvation, and strength, and the kingdom of our God, and the power of His Christ, for the accuser of our brethren is cast down which accused them before our Lord day and night." (Rev. 12 : 7–10.)

THE BRIDE BROUGHT TO THE KING.

After this, the Bride, fragrant from her consecration, baptized with the Holy Ghost, obtaining favor in the sight of all them that look upon her (Esther 2 : 15)—the King's daughter, all glorious within, her clothing of wrought gold—shall be brought to the King in raiment of needlework ; the virgins, her companions, that follow her (those she has won by her pure walk in the testimonies of Jesus) shall be brought to thee ; with gladness and rejoicing shall they be brought ; they shall enter into the King's palace. (Psalm 45 : 13–15.)

The time is at hand when the Lamb's Wife, appropriating the promises of the Father, as yea and amen in His Son, will shine as a city that is set on an hill that cannot be hid.

Isaiah 62 : 1-3 is expounded, and expanded by the Word of the Lord : "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled" (Matt. 5 : 6) ; and shows how full salvation, even the enduement of power from on high, is the exalted privilege of the sons and daughters of the Lord God Almighty. The literal rendering of the quotation from the prophet runs thus : "For Zion's sake (i.e., from the dry and thirsty) will I not withhold peace ; and for Jerusalem's sake (i.e., the foundations of peace) will I not rest until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp burneth ; and the Gentiles (i.e., the uncircumcised) shall see thy righteousness, and all kings (i.e., the great ones of the earth) thy glory ; and thou shalt be called by a new name (Matt. 1 : 21), which the mouth of the Lord shall name ; thou shalt also be a crown of glory in the hand of the Lord, and a royal diadem in the hand of thy God."

In meditating upon these things we perceive that the generally accepted estimate of a commendable Christian life is thrown into shade by the LATTER-DAY SPLENDOR.

Transparency of motive—which is heaven-born, and walk and work illumined from above, will characterize the new creation, attract sinners from the error of their ways, and convince men that the unction of the Holy One rests upon His saints ; this the indubitable sign of the Son of Man (Matt. 24 : 30), the earnest of which was given to the beloved disciple. (John 1 : 31–34.)

When the Holy Ghost descends and remains upon His Church, all men will bear record that they are the sons of God. In that hour shall Jesus rejoice in spirit ; He shall see of the travail of His soul and shall be satisfied. (Luke 10 : 21 ; Isa. 53 : 11.)

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President's Health Appears to Have been fully re-established. He was reported last week to be in his usual robust condition. The reports telegraphed North during his visit in Georgia were officially contradicted, and it was stated that the serious nature of his attack had been exaggerated. Dr. Black, the surgeon of the Talapoosa, however, confirms the telegraphic reports, and says that the President when suffering on board that vessel was for two hours "a very ill man."

The Appointments of Dr. B. Randolph Keim, of Pennsylvania, to be chief examiner of the Civil Service Commission, and of W. W. White, of Atlanta, Ga., as clerk to the same commission, have been made by the President. The commissioners in recommending the former appointment to the President, express themselves in an apologetic tone not encouraging to the friends of Civil Service Reform. They say they would have been glad to fill the place with a man of experience and one whose qualifications were more widely known and appreciated; and made earnest efforts to find such a man who would accept the appointment, but failed. In recommending Dr. Keim, they say: "From the investigations that we made we have become satisfied that Mr. Keim will make a good Chief Examiner; he was highly recommended to us as a gentleman of excellent character and habits, of strict integrity and fair intellectual ability, and a man, moreover, who possesses a wide acquaintance with men and affairs, together with a knowledge of the methods of doing public business. It is not true in any sense that his selection was due to personal solicitation or to political influence—in the ordinary meaning of that term—from any quarter. He applied for the place, as several others did, and he filed written testimonials as to his character and capacity from prominent members of both political parties, notably Senators Bayard, Hawley, Pendleton, Anthony, Logan, Cameron, of Pennsylvania, and Windom, and Representatives Randall, S. S. Cox and others; but there was no political solicitation or influence brought to bear, and had it been it would have produced no effect." The duties of the Chief Examiner will be to act with the various examining boards, to secure accuracy, uniformity and justice in their proceedings. All the authority conferred by the act is vested in the commissioners themselves.

The Destructive Tornado which Swept Over the West and South-west on Sunday, April 23d, caused a loss of life and a destruction of property that are truly appalling. In Mississippi alone eighty-three persons were killed and three hundred wounded. In Iowa the cyclone tore up trees, overturned houses and wrecked a church. At Chattanooga, Tenn., the damage amounted to $10,000. On the following day the hurricane raged through Georgia inflicting damage to the extent of a million dollars, and causing much loss of life. At Georgetown, Miss., the Methodist congregation had an escape almost miraculous. The cyclone struck the church, and one of the side walls fell in on the worshippers. They fell on their knees, and the benches protected them from fatal injury. The storm made its first appearance in Idaho on the morning of April 20th. During the day it moved into Colorado, developing great energy, houses being unroofed and many miles of telegraph poles being blown down. Violent winds also prevailed in Texas, Kansas, Nebraska and Dakota. During the 21st the storm remained almost stationary, changing its centre only from Colorado to western Nebraska. On Sunday morning the storm centre moved into Kansas, and during the day moved south-eastward over the Southern States. A relief committee has been formed, and bedding and provisions distributed to families rendered destitute by the storm. Late reports received at the close of last week report many more deaths among the wounded. The scalp injuries predominate, and are generally fatal.

A Spasmodic Effort to Enforce the Law against liquor saloons in which business is done on Sundays, and against notorious gambling houses, has been made in New York. The fact that only a few old-fashioned and damaged articles were seized in the gambling houses, that none of the proprietors were arrested, and that every one who desired to obtain liquor on Sunday could find a side door open, will render obvious to the public the degree of sincerity there was in the movement. Mr. Robert Graham and his friends have aroused the conscience of the community, but the Police Commissioners are mistaken, if they expect that they will satisfy it by half-hearted measures of the kind hitherto adopted.

The Irish Convention which Held its Sittings in Philadelphia last week, disappointed the best friends of Ireland as much as it did the dynamite section. The former hoped to have learned that the League authoritatively and unequivocally repudiated the doings of the skirmishers, denounced the use of explosives and condemned assassination. O'Donovan Rossa and his friends would have preferred that the convention expressed its approval of extreme measures. The convention did neither. Neither in its proceedings, nor in the despatch Mr. Parnell sent to it, was there a word of reproof or of repudiation of the foul crimes which have startled the whole world. This is a matter for regret. The silence on this question, when a few words of condemnation, uttered in such a place and at such a time, might have been the means of checking crime, cannot fail to alienate American sympathy. It was evident, and the fact is so regarded throughout the country, that the Irishman was right, who said the convention had practically said to all the members of the Irish race in America, "Thus far shalt thou go—in your war on England" and had ended there, omitting to add the words "and no farther." The convention pledged itself to legitimate methods, but, apparently, any member who chooses to use illegitimate methods of war is at liberty to do so, on his own responsibility. As another Irish-American observed, "Any Irishman who hates England was a good enough Irishman for the convention." Americans when asked to contribute to the funds of the League are not likely to forget this attitude of the convention.

The Fourth Reunion of the Christian Commission, the Sanitary Commission, and the Chaplains of the Federal and Confederate Armies, will be held at Ocean Grove, N. J., commencing on Sunday, July 22d, and continuing three days. Mr. George H. Stuart, President of the United States Commission, in issuing the call for the reunion, explains the object and intention of the reunion. The meeting will undoubtedly be one of great interest in all its bearings, and, as much more time is to be devoted to the exercises of the occasion than at any former meeting, it will be more important in its influence.

The Tewkesbury Almshouse Investigation commenced on account of the charges made by Governor Butler, of Massachusetts, has revealed atrocities which would have been incredible had they not been sworn to by reliable witnesses. They testified that at the State almshouse at Tewkesbury, the infants were half starved, were drugged with morphine to stupefy them and prevent their crying, and that they were shamefully neglected and ill-treated. Of seventy-three infants in the institution at the commencement of the year only one remained alive at the close. Evidence was also given that the adult female inmates were grossly ill treated, and certain witnesses testified that they had seen on the persons of the women large bruises, the result of blows and kicks. Another abuse was that of the sale of dead bodies for purposes of dissection. It was stated that this traffic was concealed by holding mock funerals, and that empty coffins, and coffins filled with sand, were frequently buried, while the bodies supposed to be in them were lying on the dissecting table, and the ten or twelve dollars for which they were sold reposed in official pockets. In proof of this allegation several coffins were exhumed, and were found to be empty or filled with earth and rubbish. It was also alleged that it was the custom to take all children, except small babies, from their parents when received, and one Canadian woman was punished for crying after her child. She was put into a cell for three days, and after that in the insane hospital.

Prohibition in Business has been Adopted by a prominent firm in Kansas. The following notice has been posted in the workrooms: To our workmen: Whereas, Having suffered great trouble and annoyance in consequence of some of our emloyés injuring themselves, by the use of alcoholic liquors, thereby causing distress and suffering in their families, and defrauding their wives and children of the comforts of home, we hereby give notice that any of our emloyés who are seen in or hanging around drinking saloons or gambling houses, whether during working hours or at any other time, or are known to use alcoholic liquors or other intoxicating beverages in any form or degree, shall be immediately discharged by us without notice.

A New York Cashier whose Dissipated Habits have on several occasions led the firm who employ him to consider the advisability of discharging him, has recently professed his faith in Christ, and has become a total abstainer. His surpassing business abilities and his extraordinary capacity for work, as well as his remarkable accuracy, secured for him the respect of his employers, who were inexpressibly grieved at the prospect of discharging him; but his frequent outbreaks rendered the act a necessity. They are grateful that his reformation has relieved them of the unpleasant duty, and are convinced that his amendment is permanent. The cashier ascribes his conversion to the blessing of God on an article he read in a copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD providentially lent to him.

An Unworn Wedding Suit was Found after more than half a century, a few days ago in Ohio. On the death of a wealthy citizen of that State recently, a search was made for his will which could not be found among his papers. In searching through the house a box was found that appeared to contain something that had been highly prized by the man who was dead. Its contents were taken out, and among them was the long-sought will. It was placed between the folds of a wedding suit which had never been worn. The suit had lain there for fifty-nine years. At that time the Ohioan was twenty-one years old, and the day for his marriage being fixed, his mother gave him a roll of home-made woolen cloth, spun by her own hands and woven by a neighbor, wherewith to have a wedding suit made. Before the day arrived, however, the expectant bride was taken ill and became demented. The bridegroom laid his wedding suit away, and no one saw it again until he died an octogenarian, and his executors found it carefully treasured up. If the disappointed bridegroom became a true Christian he is now wearing a robe which, like that he never wore, was spun by the loving Giver—the robe of Christ's righteousness which all must wear who sit down at the marriage supper of the Lamb (Rev. 19 : 8).

Six Snakes, Apparently Dead, Suddenly Recovered vitality last week to the amazement of the engineer at Central Park, New York. The snakes, one python, two cobras, and three black-snakes—arrived in the city after a long ocean voyage, addressed to a dealer in this city. Their attendants on board the vessel were incompetent, and instead of placing blankets in their cage to keep them warm, simply sprinkled a handful of hay under them. The floor of the cage became wet, and the serpents froze. They were lifted from the cage like walking-canes. They were sent to the superintendent at Central Park. He believing them to be dead told the engineer to place them in the engine-room to thaw them out, so that he might procure their skins to stuff. The engineer stood them up in a warm corner, and thought no more of them. Shortly after they disappeared, and investigation disclosed the fact that they had quietly crawled away. They were found a short distance off, preparing to attack the engineer's dog, and were secured with some difficulty. Serpents have often been regarded as a living type of sin and Satan, and this incident reveals a characteristic which renders the type strikingly perfect. Besetting sins frequently remain dormant in the winter of adversity, and we think they are dead, but in the warmth of prosperity they revive and attack us with renewed energy (Deut. 32 :15-18).

A Discontented Traveller's Experience in Texas is described in the Youth's Companion. It is stated that a visitor to that State having business in a certain town arrived on his way there at a place where two roads met. Not knowing which was the better, he asked direction of one of the citizens who slowly said, "Well, stranger, you'll have to judge for yourself. If you go thar," pointing to the right, "you'll wish you'd gone thar," pointing to the left; "and if you go thar," reversing his gestures, "you'll wish you'd gone thar." The traveller finding there was so little difference turned to the right, and walked to the tavern, which seemed destitute of all the comforts and most of the necessities of life. He entered and remained for the night, but the food was so bad he could not eat it, and the bed was infested with vermin which prevented his sleeping. As he tossed about sleepless, he said, "I wish that I had gone to the other house!" Not long after this, the gentleman had occasion to go over the same road. Again at dark he came to the cross-roads, but did not hesitate to go in the direction contrary to that he had chosen before. The tavern he found on that road had all the discomforts of the other, and in addition he found that great gray rats made his bed-room a gymnasium, and scampered over his bed all night long. In the midst of his torment, the gentleman burst out laughing. "The old man spoke truly, when he said, 'If you go there, you'll wish you'd gone there; and if you go there, you'll wish that you'd gone there.'" The traveller on the journey of life is not placed in that dilemma. He knows on infallible authority what he may expect on the broad and on the narrow way, and there has never been a man who, choosing the latter, has at the end of his journey wished he had taken the other (Matt. 7 : 13, 14).

An Atrocious Act of Cruelty has been Perpetrated by a boy in Texas. It appears that at Brick House Gully, nine miles from Houston, resided a colored boy named Adams. He was under the impression that a plot was being concocted against him by a party of white boys, and grew mad with fear and rage. Finding a boy named Nelson alone on April 25th, and suspecting that Nelson was the leader of the plot against himself, he seized him and tied a rope around his waist. He then mounted a horse, tied the other end of the rope to the pommel of the saddle, and galloped off across the prairie, dragging Nelson at the horse's heels until the poor lad was dead. The negro was captured at Houston while attempting to escape by the railroad. The fiendish act of cruelty shocks every reader, but there are many youths and men engaged recklessly in a course even more ruthless. There are hundreds of victims of vice on our streets to-day, whose first step on the downward road was taken at the instigation of professed friends, who did them a fouler wrong than that of which the Texas boy was guilty (Luke 17 : 1, 2).

A Citizen of Mississippi Saved his Wife and child in the recent tornado, in a manner singularly suggestive. The moment he saw the danger coming, he called his wife and little boy into the yard and made them lie flat on the ground and grasp some small shrubs which stood within reach: "I put one arm about my wife," he says, "while with the other I clasped a small tree, and made my son lie close up to me, and then I said to them, 'Hold on, hold on! It is for life!' and then the wind came. There was a whirl and a roar. I was shaken, and heard the crash of my falling house. An instant and it was over. I still held my wife in my arms, but she was insensible, and my boy was still nestling close up to me, but bruised and bleeding." All three escaped without serious injury, thanks to the husband's presence of mind and the prompt obedience of his wife and child. There are other storms in life from which we are anxious to shield those we love. When they approach, this citizen's example should not be forgotten. Not trusting in his own strength, he clung to a tree. So may we, while clasping the dear ones, cling to Him who is mighty to save (Isa. 25 : 4).

An Unconscious Sermon in a Fish Market was once preached by an eminent preacher. Among the reminiscences of Dr. Lyman Beecher, recently published, is an interesting incident. The great preacher was seen one Monday morning leaving his house with a basket in his hand which he was carrying to the fish-market, and in which he intended to carry home a fish for the family table. Unknown to him a young man of undecided religious principles was following and watching him. The minister soon came to the fish-market. Here Dr. Beecher picked up a fine-looking fish, and asked the fisherman if it was fresh and sweet. "Certainly," replied the man, "for I caught it myself yesterday," which was the Sabbath. Dr. Beecher at once dropped the fish, saying, "Then I don't want it," and went on without another word. We are not informed whether the preacher obtained his fish, but when the young man who was following him that morning, related his experience some time afterward, on his admission to the Christian Church, he stated that Dr. Beecher's consistency evinced in the fish-market had been the turning point in his career. It convinced him of the power of religion in life, had induced him to attend the ministry of the man who had won his respect, and under that ministry he was converted (2 Cor. 1 : 12).

YOUNG MEN IN CHRIST.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"I write unto you, young men, because ye have overcome the wicked one. . . . I have written unto you, young men, because ye are strong, and the word of God abideth in you, and ye have overcome the wicked one."—1 John 2 : 13, 14.

Not Literally Young Men—A Stage of Spiritual Growth—The Militia of the Church—I. They Possess Strength—Imparted to Them—Not Physically—Strength of Faith—Strong to Endure—Strong to Labor—Strong to Resist—II. They Need Strength—Will Certainly be Attacked—The Uses of Temptation—III. Their Proof of Strength — Past Victory — Finally Broken with Satan—The Vanquished Foe—IV. Their Source of Strength—The Church on Enchanted Ground—Miracle-Workers Abroad—False Christs Coming—The Approaching Hurricane—The Army the Church Needs.

WHEN I preached a short time ago upon John's message to the "little children," I explained why it was that he first said, "I write," and then, "I have written." If what I shall have to say at this time, fairly flowing from the text, shall come to you as Christ's word from His favored disciple John you will attach the more importance to it, and it will do your hearts the more good. Lifting his head from that dear bosom which gave him unexampled rest, he whispers, "I write unto you, young men." Looking down from that favored place which he now occupies so near to the throne of the Lamb, he looks over the battlements of heaven upon us, and cries, "I have written unto you, young men."

NOT BODILY AGE.

In the Christian Church there is an order of Christians who have grown so much that they can no longer be called "babes in grace," but yet they are not so far matured that they can be exactly called "fathers." These, who form the middle-class of the spiritual-minded, are styled "young men." Understand that the apostle is not writing here to any according to their bodily age; he is using human age as a metaphor and figure for representing growth in the spiritual life. Age, according to the flesh, often differs much from the condition of the spirit; many old men are still no more than "babes"; some children in years are even now "young men" in grace, while not a few young men are "fathers" in the church while young in years. God has endowed certain of His servants with great grace, and made them mature in their youth; such were Joseph, Samuel, David, Josiah, and Timothy. It is not age according to the family register that we are now to speak about, but age according to the Lamb's book of life.

These young men are not babes. They have been in Christ too long for that; they are no longer novices, to whom the Lord's house is strange. They have been born unto God probably now for years; the things which they hoped for at first they have to a large extent realized; they know now what once they could not understand. They have discernment, having had their senses exercised by reason of use, so that they are not so liable to be misled as they were in their infancy. And while they have been longer in the way, so also have they now grown stronger in the way. They are wiser now than they used to be. When they were children they knew enough to save them, for they knew the Father, and that was blessed knowledge; but now they know far more of the Word of God which abideth in them through their earnest, prayerful, believing reception of it. They have been under the blessed teaching of the Spirit of God, and from Him they have received an unction, so that they know all things. In knowledge they are no more children, but men in Christ Jesus. Thus they are distinguished from the first class, which comprehends the babes in Christ.

They are not yet fathers because they are not yet so established, confirmed, and settled as the fathers are, who know what they believe, and know it with a certainty of full assurance which nothing can shake. They have not yet had the experience of fathers, and consequently have not all their prudence and foresight; they are richer in zeal than in judgment. Do not suppose that when we say they are not to be called "fathers," that they are not, therefore, very valuable to the community; for in some senses they are quite equal to the fathers, and in one or two respects they may even be superior to them. The fathers are for contemplation, they study deep and see far, and so they "have known Him that is from the beginning"; but a measure of their energy for action may have gone through stress of years.

These young men are born to fight; they are they have to contend for her faith, and to extend the Redeemer's kingdom. They should do so, for they are strong. This is their lot, and the Lord help them to fulfil their calling. These must for years to come be our active spirits; they are our strength and our hope. The fathers must soon go off the stage; their maturity in grace shows that they are ready for glory, and it is not God's way to keep His shocks of corn in the field when once they are fully ripe for the garner—perfect men shall be gathered up with the perfect, and shall enter into their proper sphere. The fathers, therefore, must soon be gone; and when they are gone, to whom are we to look for a succession but to these young men?

I. The first thing that John notes about these young men is

THEY POSSESS STRENGTH:

"I have written unto you, young men, because ye are strong."

These Christians of the middle class are emphatically strong. This does not imply that any measure of spiritual strength was in them by nature; for the Apostle Paul clearly puts it otherwise concerning our natural state saying, "When we were yet without strength, Christ died for the ungodly"; so that by nature we are without strength to do anything that is good and right. We are strong as a wild bull, to dash headlong into everything that is evil; strong as a lion to fight against all that is good and Godlike; but for all spiritual things and holy things we are utterly infirm and incapable; yea, we are as dead men until God the Holy Spirit deals with us.

Neither does the apostle here at all allude to the strength of the body in young men, for in a spiritual sense this is rather their weakness than their strength. The man who is strong in the flesh is too often for that very reason strongly tempted to sins of the flesh; and hence the apostle bids his young friend "flee youthful lusts." Whenever you read the life of Samson you may thank God you had not Samson's thews and sinews; or else it is more than probable that you would have had Samson's passions, and they might have mastered you as they mastered him.

The time of life in which a young man is found is full of perils; and so is the spiritual condition of which it is the type. The young man might almost wish that it were with him as with the older man in whom the forces of the flesh have declined, for though age brings with it many infirmities it also has its gain in the abatement of the passions. So you see the young man cannot reckon upon vigor of the flesh as contributing toward real "strength;" he has rather to ask for more strength from on high lest the animal vigor that is within him should drag down his spirit.

These young men in grace are strong, first of all, in faith, according to that exhortation, "Be strong! fear not!" They have known the Lord now for some time, and they have enjoyed that perfect peace which comes of forgiven sin: they have marked the work of the Spirit within themselves, and they know that it is no delusion, but a divine change; and now they not only believe in Christ, but they know that they believe in Him. They know whom they have believed, and they are persuaded that He is able to keep that which they have committed to Him. That faith which was once a healing touch has now become a satisfying embrace. Oh, what a mercy it is to be strong in this fashion. Let him that is strong take heed that he glory only in the Lord who is his righteousness and strength; but in Him and His strength he may indeed make his boast and defy the armies of the aliens. Oh, that all Christians were so much advanced as to enter the enlisted battalion of the Lord's young men.

This strength makes a man

STRONG TO ENDURE.

He is a sufferer, but mark how patient he is! He is a loser in business, and he has a hard task to earn his daily bread, but he never complains, he has learned in every state to be content. He is persecuted, but he is not distressed thereby; men revile him, but he is not moved from the even tenor of his way. He grows careless alike of flattery and calumny; so long as he can please God he cares not to displease men. Blessed is that man who is so strong that he never complains of his trials, never whimpers and frets because he is made to share in the humiliations and griefs of his covenant head. He expected to bear the cross when he became a follower of the Crucified, and he is not now made weary and faint when it presses upon him.

This strength shows itself, next, in laboring for Christ. The young man in Christ is a great worker. He has so much strength that he cannot sit still; he would be ashamed to leave the burden and heat of the day to be borne by others. He is up and at it according to his calling and ability. He has asked his Lord as a favor to give him something to do. His prayer has been, "Show me what thou wouldst have me to do," and having received an answer he is found in the vineyard trenching the soil, removing the weeds, pruning the vines, and attending to such labors as the seasons demand. These are the men that work our reformations; these are the men who conduct our missions: these are the men who launch out into the deep for Christ. They make the vanguard of the host of God, and largely compose the main body of her forces.

So, also, are these young men

attack. They are assaulted, but they carry with them the shield of faith wherewith they quench the fiery darts of the enemy. They resist temptation, and are unharmed in the midst of peril. Do you want a specimen? Look at Joseph! Where ten thousand would have fallen he stands in snow-white purity. Joseph as contrasted with David is an instance of how a young man may bring greater glory to God than an older man when assailed by a kindred temptation. Joseph is but young, and the temptation forces itself upon him while he is in the path of duty. He is alone with his temptress, and no one need know of the sin if it be committed; on the other hand, if he refuses, shame, and possibly death may await him through the calumny of his offended mistress; yet he bravely resists the assault, and overcomes the wicked one. He is a bright contrast to the older man, a father in Israel, who went out of his way to compass an evil deed, and committed crime in order to fulfil his foul desire. From this case we learn that neither years, nor knowledge, nor experience can preserve any one of us from sin; but old and young must be kept by the power of God, or they will be overthrown by the tempter.

Furthermore, these young men are not only strong for resistance, but they are strong for attack. They carry the war into the enemy's territory. If there is anything to be done, they are like Jonathan and his armor-bearer, eager for the fray; these are very zealous for the Lord of hosts, and are prompt to undertake toil and travail for Jesus' sake.

So have I shown you what these young men are; they are strong—strong to believe, strong to suffer, strong to do, strong to resist, strong to attack. May companies of these go in and out among us to fight the Lord's battles, for to this end hath the Lord girded them with strength.

II. Secondly, let us notice that he implies that for he says, "Ye are strong, and ye have overcome the wicked one." Between the lines of the text I read the fact, that young men who are strong must expect to be attacked. If thou art weak thou shalt have no trial happen to thee but such as is common to men; but if thou be strong, rest thou assured that trials many and heavy are awaiting thee. Every sinew in the arm of faith will have to be tested.

Why does Satan attack this class of men most? I reckon, first, because Satan is not always sure that the babes in grace are in grace, and therefore he does not always attack beginners; but when they are sufficiently developed to make him see who and what they are, then he arouses his wrath. Those who have clean escaped from him he will weary and worry to the utmost of his power. A friend writes to me to inquire whether Satan knows our thoughts. Of course he does not, as God does. Satan pretty shrewdly guesses at them from our actions and our words, and perhaps even from manifestations upon our countenances; but it is the Lord alone who knows the thoughts of men immediately and by themselves.

SATAN IS AN OLD HAND

at studying human nature; he has been near six thousand years watching and tempting men and women, and therefore he is full of cunning; but yet he is not omniscient, and therefore it may be that he thinks such and such a person is so little in grace that perhaps he is not in grace at all; so he lets him alone; but as soon as ever it is certain that the man is of the royal seed, then the devil is at him. My brethren, you are strong to overthrow his kingdom, and therefore you need not marvel that he desires to overthrow you.

I think it is right that young men should endure hardness, for else they might become proud. It is hard to hide pride from men. Full of strength, full of courage, full of patience, full of zeal, such men are ready enough to believe the wicked one when he whispers that they are perfect; and therefore trial is sent to keep them out of that grievous snare of the evil one. The devil is used by God as a householder might employ a black, smutty scullion to clean his pots and kettles. The devil tempts the saint, and thus the saint sees his inward depravity, and is no longer able to boast. The devil thinks he is going to destroy the man of God, but God is making the temptation work for the believer's eternal good. Far better to have Beelzebub the god of flies, pestering you, than to become fly-blown with notions of your own excellence.

Besides, it prepares them for future usefulness, and here I venture to intrude the testimony of my own experience. I often wondered, when I first came to Christ, why I had such a hard time of it when I was coming to the Lord, and why I was so long and so wearied in finding a Saviour. After that, I wondered why I experienced so many spiritual conflicts while others were in peace. Ah, brethren, I did not know that I was destined to preach to this great congregation. I did not understand in those days that I should have to minister to hundreds, and even thousands, of distressed spirits, storm-tossed, and ready to perish. But it is so now with me that when the afflicted mention their experience I can, as a rule, reply, and so I can help them, as one who has felt the same. It is meet, therefore, that the young men should bear the yoke in their youth, and that while they are strong they should gain experience, not so much for themselves as for others, that in after days when they come to be fathers they may be able to help the little ones of the family. Take your tribulation kindly, brother; yea, take it gratefully; thank your King that He puts you in commission where the thick of the battle centres around you.

"I HAVE BEEN THERE";

As you love the Lord, I charge you grow in grace and be strong, for we have need of you just now. Oh, my brethren, take hold on sword and buckler; watch ye, and stand fast! May the Lord teach your hands to war and your fingers to fight. In these evil days may you be as a phalanx to protect our Israel. The Canaanites, the Hivites and the Jebusites are upon us just now; war is in all our borders; now, therefore, let each valiant man stand about the King's chariot, each man with his sword upon his thigh, because of fear in the night.

III. Thirdly, the text reminds us of their

they have overcome the wicked one. Then they must be strong; for a man who can overcome the wicked one is no mean man of war—write him down among the first three. Wicked ones abound; but there is one crafty being who deserves the name of the wicked one; he is the arch leader of rebellion, the first of sinners, the chief of sinners, the tempter of sinners. He is the wicked one who heads assaults against the pilgrims to Zion. If any man has ever stood foot to foot with him he will never forget it; it is a fight that once fought will leave its scars, even though the victory be won.

In what sense have these young men overcome the wicked one? Well, first, in the fact that they have broken right away from his power. Once Satan never troubled them at all. Why should he? They were good friends together. Now he tempts them and worries them, and assaults them because they have left his service, engaged themselves to a new master, and become the enemies of him who was once their god.

Moreover, these young men have overcome the wicked one, not only in breaking away from his power and in driving him entirely out of possession so that he is no longer master, but they have overcome him in the very fact of their opposition to him. When a man resists Satan, he is victorious over Satan in that very resistance. Satan's empire consists in the yielding of our will to his will; but when our will revolts against him, then already we have in a measure overcome him. Albeit that sometimes we are much better at willing than we are at doing, as the Apostle Paul was; for he said, "To will is present with me; but how to perform that which is good I find not"; yet, still, the hearty will to be clean from sin is a victory over sin; and as that will grows stronger and more determined to resist the temptations of the evil one, in that degree we have overcome sin and Satan.

But, O brothers and sisters, besides that, some of us who are young men in Christ have won many a victory over Satan. Have we not been tempted, fearfully tempted? But the mighty grace of God has come to the rescue, and we have not yielded. Cannot you look back, not with Pharisaic boasting, but with gracious exultation, over many an evil habit which once had the mastery over you, but which is master of you no longer? It was a hard conflict. How you bit your lip sometimes, and feared that you must yield! In certain moments your steps had almost gone, your feet had well-nigh slipped; but here you are conqueror yet! Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.

Once more, in Christ Jesus we have entirely overcome the wicked one already; for the enemy we have to contend with is a vanquished foe—our Lord and Master met him and destroyed him. He is now destitute of his boasted battle-axe, that terrible weapon which has made the bravest men to quail when they have seen it in his hand. "What weapon is that?" say you. That weapon is death. Our Lord overthrew him that had the power of death, that is, the devil, and therefore Satan has not the power of death any longer. The keys of death and of hell are at the girdle of Christ. Ah, fiend, we who believe in Jesus shall defeat thee, for our Lord defeated thee! That bruise upon thy head cannot be hidden! Thy crown is dashed in pieces! The Lord has sore wounded thee, O dragon, and never can thy deadly wound be healed! We have at thee with dauntless courage; for we believe the promise of our Lord, that He will bruise Satan under our feet shortly.

IV. Now I close with my fourth point, which is, their

SOURCE OF STRENGTH.

You have seen their strength and their need of it, and their proof of it; now for the fountain of it. "The word of God abideth in you." I labor under the opinion that there never was a time in which the people of God had greater need to understand this passage than now. We have entered upon that part of the pilgrim path which is described by Bunyan as the Enchanted Ground; the church and the world appear to be alike bewitched with folly. Half the people of God hardly know their head from their heels at this time. They are gaping after wonders, running after a sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal, and waiting for yet more astounding inventions. Everything seems to be in a whirligig; a tornado has set in, and the storm is everywhere.

Christians used to believe in Christ as their Leader, and the Bible as their rule; but some of them are pleased with lords and rules such as He never knew! Believe me, there will soon come new Messiahs. Men are already we shall soon have false Christs; and "Lo! here" and "Lo! there" will be heard on all sides. Anchors are up, winds are out, and the whole fleet is getting into confusion. Men in whose sanity and stability I once believed are being carried away with one fancy or another, and I am driven to cry, "What next? and what next?" We are only at the beginning of an era of mingled unbelief and fanaticism. Now we shall know who are God's elect and who are not; for there are spirits abroad at this hour that would, if it were possible, deceive even the very elect; and those who are not deceived are, nevertheless, sorely put to it. Here is the patience of the saints; let him look to himself who is not rooted and grounded in Christ, for

THE HURRICANE IS COMING.

The signs of the times indicate a carnival of delusions; men have ceased to be guided by the Word, and claim to be themselves prophets. Now we shall see what we shall see. Blessed is the sheep that knows his Shepherd, and will not listen to the voice of strangers. But here is the way to be kept steadfast—"The word of God abideth in you."

"The word of God"—that is to say, we are to believe in the doctrines of God's word, and these will make us strong. What vigor they infuse into a man! Get the Word well into you, and you will overcome the wicked one. The promises of God's word, too, what power they give a man. I see people put respirators on in foggy weather; they do not make them look very lovely, but I dare say they are useful. I recommend the best respirator for the pestilential atmosphere of this present evil world when I bid you fit a promise to your lips. Then mind the precepts, for a precept is often a sharp weapon against Satan. Remember how the Lord Jesus Christ struck Satan a killing blow by quoting a precept, "It is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and Him only shalt thou serve."

Now notice that John not only mentions "the word of God," but the word of God "in you." The inspired word must be received into a willing mind. How? The Book which lies there is to be pleaded here, in the inmost heart, by the work of the Holy Ghost upon the mind. All of this letter has to be translated into spirit and life. "The word of God abideth in you"—that is, first to know it, next to remember it and treasure it up in your heart. It is, next, to have the word in your affections, to love it so that it is as honey or the droppings of the honeycomb to you. When this is the case you must and shall overcome the wicked one. A man instructed in the Scriptures is like an armed knight, who when he goes among the throng inflicts many a wound, but suffers none, for he is locked up in steel.

This is the sort of army that we need in the church of God—men that are strong by feeding on God's word. Aspire to it, my brethren and sisters, and when you have reached it, then aspire unto the third degree that you may become fathers in Israel? Up to this measure, at any rate, let us endeavor to advance, and

ADVANCE AT ONCE.

Are there any here who are not young men in Christ Jesus because they are not in Christ Jesus at all? I cannot speak with you this morning, for my time is gone; but I am distressed for you. To be out of Christ is such an awful thing that a man had better be out of existence. Without God, without Christ—then you are without joy in life or hope in death. Not even a babe in the divine family! Then know this, that God shall judge those that are without, and when He cometh how swift and overwhelming will that judgment be! Inasmuch as you would not have Christ in this day, Christ will not have you in that day. Stay not out of Christ any longer! Seek His face and live, for "he that believeth in Him hath everlasting life." May you be enabled to believe in Him at this moment, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

JOHN BROWN,

Queen Victoria's Gillie.

IT has been already mentioned in this journal that Queen Victoria has recently suffered a bereavement which has caused her poignant sorrow. This is the death of John Brown, her favorite personal attendant. This week we give, with the portrait of Brown, which appears on page 284, some details of his life.

John Brown was born on December 27th, 1826. He was the son of a small farmer whose land lay near the Queen's Scotch residence at Balmoral. John spent his early years on his father's farm working in the fields and in the stables, but in 1849 he succeeded in obtaining employment in the royal stables at Balmoral. There his intelligence and activity were observed by Prince Albert, who became favorably impressed with him. After that his promotion was rapid.

The Queen in her book, "Leaves from the Journal of our Life in the Highlands," thus sketches his career: "He commenced as gillie in 1849, and was selected by Albert and me to go with my carriage. In 1851 he entered our service permanently, and began in that year leading my pony, and advanced step by step by his good conduct and intelligence. His attention, care, and faithfulness cannot be exceeded; and the state of my health, which of late years has been sorely tried and weakened, renders such qualifications most valuable, and, indeed, most needful in a constant attendant upon all occasions. He has since most deservedly been promoted to be an upper servant, and my permanent personal attendant. He has all the independence and elevated feelings peculiar to the Highland race, and is singularly straightforward, simple-minded, kind-hearted, and disinterested; always ready to oblige, and of a discretion rarely to be met with. His father was a small farmer, who lived at the Bush on the opposite side to Balmoral. He is the second of nine brothers, three of whom have died, two are in Australia and New Zealand, two are living in the neighborhood of Balmoral, and the youngest (Archibald) is valet to our son Leopold, and is an excellent young man."

After Prince Albert's death the Queen felt the need of a more constant attendance than before, in her walks and carriage drives. Her reliance on Prince Albert's judgment was great during his lifetime, but it increased after his death. When, therefore, she was considering the selection of a man to attend her, go on confidential errands for her, and undertake commissions of a like character, the recollection of the Prince's confidence in Brown decided her to appoint him. From that time forward Queen Victoria's carriage was rarely seen in London, or in the neighborhood of her Scotch retreat at Balmoral, or her southern residence in the Isle of Wight, or in Windsor Park without the familiar figure of the burly Scotchman on the front seat. In her walks, too, in the parks both in England and Scotland John Brown attended her. It has been of late years an event of almost daily occurrence for the Queen, accompanied by her devoted daughter, the Princess Beatrice, to take a long stroll in a retired part of the grounds around the place where she resided for the time being, and whenever she did so John Brown was sure to be seen following at a respectful distance. (A sketch of one of these walks is on page 285.)

Until a few days before his death Brown was in close attendance upon her Majesty, and it was not till Monday, March 25th, that the serious nature of the malady by which he was affected became apparent, and necessitated his remaining within his room.

The last mission he performed on behalf of the Queen was an inquiry at The Fishery, in reference to the attack upon Lady Florence Dixie. He drove from the Castle in an open vehicle, with the object of making, on her Majesty's behalf, full inquiry into the circumstances of the case. He afterward performed his usual duties at the Castle, and on Saturday, March 24th, was in the town of Windsor, apparently in fair health, although the cold which he had contracted on visiting The Fishery was apparent.

On the following Tuesday the disease took an unfavorable turn, and the patient was seen in the evening by Sir William Jenner, one of her Majesty's physicians, who pronounced his malady a malignant form of erysipelas. Medical assistance was, however, unavailing; all hopes of saving Mr. Brown's life were abandoned, and he expired at a quarter past eleven o'clock the same night.

The Queen visited the remains of her faithful servant on the afternoon of March 28th. The same evening the body was enclosed within a shell. The deceased, who was an attached member of the Presbyterian Church, was interred, by his own expressed wish, in Craithie Churchyard, where his father lies buried.

THE RUIN OF JOHN HARDCASTLE.

(See Illustration.)

THE sea was as smooth as a river; so still and unruffled that the stars were reflected in its surface like tiny glistening gems, and sparkled as the moon, which had just risen, sent a silver shimmer of light across the wide waste of water, and touched the sand of the beach with its soft, mysterious glow. Two men were lazily rowing a boat within a short distance of the land, enjoying the calm stillness of the evening. They were near their destination, a little hotel much frequented by visitors from a fashionable seaside resort about ten miles away. There they intended to stay and sleep and pull back early in the morning.

"How beautifully serene everything is here," said the elder of the two, a builder named John Hardcastle, who was snatching a brief respite from business, and seeking rest and recuperation by the sea. "One forgets, on such an evening as this, that not far away there are busy streets, and men toiling and perspiring in the struggle of life."

"Yes," said the younger man, Harry Bennett, a careless, easy-going fellow with no particular occupation, and with just enough money inherited from his father to maintain him in luxurious ease. "I suppose hard-working fellows like you enjoy such a scene. As for me, it seems dull and lifeless. It bores me; but then everything does bore me."

"I cannot conceive of you as a hard-worker," said Hardcastle. "You are such a luxurious fellow. If you tried it you would give it up quickly, for you would have no incentive to brace you up to overcome difficulties. Now I have a wife and a family of little children, and when I meet with an obstacle or something disagreeable, I see on the other side of it my children's bread and butter, and do not mind a little struggling nor a few knocks in trying to get it for them. Men like you with no one depending on them and anxious only to amuse themselves are of very little use in the world—from a business point of view"—Hardcastle added, apologetically.

"Well, here we are," said Bennett. "Now a good pull, and then we'll drag the boat up out of reach of the tide." That was done, and the two men sat down on a rock to get their breath again after the exertion. Then Bennett took up the conversation interrupted by the beaching of the boat. He said:

"You spoke just now disparagingly of men like me, and I don't know but you may be right, but there are times in which I think we have the advantage of you. Now I came down from the city this morning, and I saw some men there who were in a good deal of trouble. A bank has burst, and I fancy it means ruin to some folks who will have to go under. I think some of them, if they are unencumbered bachelors, will be glad that they have neither wife nor children to suffer with them."

"What bank is it?" asked Hardcastle. "I make a point when I leave business to leave it altogether, and I never open a newspaper all the while I am away. So I have heard nothing of this bank failure, but I am sorry for the sufferers all the same, though I don't know them."

"It's Rufford's Bank," said Bennett, rising as he spoke, and yawning and stretching himself as if he were bored even by the conversation. But he was startled by the sound of a deep groan, and turning around saw his companion with his head in his hands and his body writhing as if in pain. "What's the matter, old fellow," he asked. "Are you sick?"

"That bank, Harry, is the matter; every cent I have is there, and I paid in twenty thousand dollars the very day I came down here. Harry, I'm ruined."

"That is bad," said Harry, "those rascals who manage these failures ought to be severely punished; for they wreck the lives of good men, and cause innocent women and children to suffer. But come, now, let us go up to the hotel and get a good night's rest. Things may not look so gloomy in the morning."

Hardcastle rose almost mechanically and accompanied his friend to the hotel. But he had no expectation of a good night's rest. The proceeds of a life of hard, unremitting toil were swept away, and his wife and children, of whom he was so fond, were penniless. There would be no sleep for him that night. For long hours he paced his room, tortured with restless, unavailing regret.

The next morning Hardcastle was travelling as fast as an express train could take him to his home. His news was soon told. But from his wife he heard no reproaches, no lamentation, no childish repining such as some women utter over their husband's misfortunes. A sweet, womanly pity filled her eyes, and she said, "My poor, brave husband, how you must be suffering! Let us pray to God for His guidance in our trouble."

"I did not thank Him for prosperity, Helen;

it seems mean to go to Him now we are in trouble."

Helen had not said that, but when she first learned of the calamity it had come upon her as the fulfilment of a dread that had long weighed on her soul. God was not in her husband's thoughts. Now it might be that in his trial he might be led to Him. If so, welcome poverty, welcome privation and hardship. His salvation would be well gained by the loss of fortune. But of all this she said nothing, knowing well that at such a season, a sermon would be ill-timed.

The husband and wife then bent their knees in prayer to Him in whose hand are all our concerns, and Helen prayed very earnestly that spiritual good might come to both, out of worldly ill. She remained on her knees by her husband's side in silent supplication after she had finished pleading aloud, and was not a little surprised to hear her husband's voice, for the first time in her life, raised in prayer. "I acknowlege Thee," he said, "that Thou art the Lord. I confess with shame that I have forgotten Thee. Have pity on me now, I beseech Thee, and in mercy forgive my sins, and in poverty and in obscurity let me serve Thee."

For more than two hours the two had been so engaged in conversation and prayer, and when at last they left their room and descended to the cosey parlor, in which so many happy hours had been spent, but which now they must prepare to leave, Hardcastle was full of chastened hope, and the bitterness of his trial was past.

As they entered, they heard the sound of a strange voice talking to their children, and the husband at once recognized Bennett's voice. "Ha! Hardcastle," he said, as their entrance was perceived, "you see I have followed you. This husband of yours, madam," he said, turning to Helen, "was delivering a sage lecture to me before he heard of his losses, on the advantage a married man has over a single one, and I thought I would come over and see how it stood the test. I need not ask, though; his face tells the story. It has lost all the despair it bore last night. But, seriously, I have other business with you, Hardcastle, beside that. I am not such a brute as to intrude at such a time without good cause. You know what I am, an idle, careless dog, wasting my life, and as you told me last night, not much good in the world. But I have some money, and as you have brains, I thought we might work well together. Now, if you will have me for a partner I am ready to go with you, and we will see whether you can make me of some use in the world."

Hardcastle was too much affected to speak, but he wrung his friend's hand, and for the first time for many a year his eyes filled with tears.

Bennett affected to be in haste to avoid noticing his emotion, and said he must go away and get some clothes to wear instead of his yachting costume, which in his hurry to follow his friend he had neglected to change; and he would come in again shortly to hear what husband and wife thought of his proposal, after considering it.

When he was gone, Hardcastle and his wife returned to their room, and there poured out their hearts in thankfulness to God, who had heard their prayer before it was uttered, and had made a way of escape for them. There, too, Hardcastle registered a vow in God's strength which he was enabled to keep, that for the remainder of his life "he would acknowledge God in all his ways and look to Him to direct his steps."

PETER BLAKE'S VOYAGE.

A SERIAL STORY BY HESBA STRETTON.

The Captain Warned.

BESSIE returned home somewhat comforted. There were always cowards that flinch at the last moment, she thought; and she felt proud that her husband was no coward. It had been his name for having a high spirit that had first won her love; and she knew in her inmost heart that if she once suspected him of being a coward, both respect and love would die away. Yet she felt terribly lonely and desolate as she entered her home again. The morning sun was breaking redly through the mist, and she saw the masts of many vessels looming through it; but the Dolphin was far away by this time. Nannie was seated at the window, with her quiet calm little face turned toward the river.

"Mother," she said, in her childish voice, as Bessie stood over her, gazing sadly down upon the treacherous waters, "Uncle Victor told me God holds the sea in His great strong hand, like me holding this tiny, tiny drop of water."

She had made a hollow of her small soft hand, and as she opened it Bessie saw a drop of water lying in the little dimple.

"And, mother," she went on, "if there came a great big storm, and the wind blew hard, God could shut up His hand, and take care of father's ship, like me taking care of this tiny drop of water."

"Ay; he could," cried Bessie, hiding her tearful face on the child's curly head.

"That's my little sea," said Nannie, "and I won't let any big storm come to it. Uncle Victor said God will take care of him and father."

"But maybe God will take them to heaven," sobbed Bessie.

"Won't they be happy there?" asked the child. "Isn't God there? And Jesus—isn't He in heaven?"

"But we sha'n't be there," answered Bessie; "you and me. We shall have to wait here a long, long while, and never have them home again."

"But we'll go there, too," said Nannie. "Uncle Victor says Jesus loves us so, He wants us to go and live with Him; and we'll all go some day, mother."

"If we could only go together," said Bessie, with a sigh. But she felt comforted. Her little girl's happy, peaceful face seemed to soothe her strangely. Even the sight of the small folded hands, holding the drop of water so carefully, calmed her troubled spirit. Yes; it was true. Peter and Victor were safe in the hollow of God's hand. She could not sing yet; but over and over again Bessie whispered to herself, when her eye fell upon Nannie, sitting quietly in the sunny window:

"This, this is the God we adore,
Our faithful, unchangeable Friend;
Whose love is as great as His power,
And neither knows measure nor end."

So the wife and mother comforted herself, and as the children prattled and in their simple way discussed the situation in the light of the religious teaching they had received, her heart gradually strengthened itself in God. It was, however, an anxious trust. She knew only too well that there were men so wicked that they made a business of shipwrecks. There were shipowners who bought vessels worn and rotten with long service, and painted them to look like new vessels. They then put on board of them large cases said to contain valuables, but really full of worthless material. The ship thus laden was insured for fifty times its value, and sent on its voyage, the owner hoping it would sink and he would make a large sum by the insurance. He cared nothing if captain and crew all lost their lives. She little knew, though at that time Peter did, that the Dolphin was just such a vessel. This was how he discovered the fact:

The Dolphin ran down the river; while the crew, such as were sober, were busy putting things somewhat shipshape before entering the Channel. Upon the whole it was a fairly good and steady crew. Peter Blake welcomed with much satisfaction two or three men who had the character of being thoroughly able seamen.

Fleck was there; a sly, foxy-looking man, whose word was trusted by none of them, but who was an active, clever sailor. It was, above all, his presence that had made Peter willing to sail in the Dolphin. He knew Fleck would serve on board no ship that he thought unseaworthy; and Peter felt that he could rely upon his judgment as to the Dolphin's sea qualities as well as he could upon his own. Fleck had sailed twice before in her, and knew her better than his house at home. Upon the whole Peter felt calmer now the die was cast, and there was no possibility of retreat.

The Dolphin was certainly heavily laden, and the crew was short of two hands. But Captain Norcott was a first-rate skipper; and as soon as they were round the North Foreland the light north-east wind would carry the vessel down the Channel like a bird. Peter felt that he could justly write a line home, to post at Gravesend, full of comfort and encouragement. Victor put in a few words, written in the highest spirits. Everything was first-rate to him; no better ship than the Dolphin had ever sailed down the Thames; and no hero had ever lived to be compared with her captain. He gave a loud, long, ringing cheer to the little steam-tug, as it fell away from them; and the men on board it answered him, but there seemed a lack of heartiness in their hurrah.

"Blake," said Fleck, as they stood for a moment or two leaning over the gunwale, and looking after the steam-tug, "Blake," and he lowered his voice mysteriously, "she's not the Dolphin."

"Not the Dolphin," he repeated; "what do you mean, man?"

"Not the old Dolphin as I sailed in before," Fleck continued. "I've been hauling her over in my mind's eye, and she's not my old Dolphin. She's another craft altogether. Aye, aye! the other Dolphin was a ship, of course she was, same as this; I'm none such a blunderhead as that. But these ain't the rigging and the sails—no, nor the masts of my Dolphin. I'm most in a maze. Is she the Dolphin? I ask my own mind over and over again; and something inside of me says, No, Fleck, she's not your Dolphin."

"Are you sure of it, Fleck?" asked Peter. It was not possible to doubt him altogether. There was terror in his small, red eyes, and his face wore an anxious look. He was telling no lie now.

"Sure enough," he answered; "I'll swear it isn't the Dolphin. If I could have got off in yonder boat, I'd have served my three months in jail with a thankful heart, Peter Blake. What made me willing to come aboard her was thinking it was the old Dolphin; the best boat Penrose had. I'd never have trusted myself to any other boat of his."

"But this isn't Penrose's," said Peter.

Fleck put his tongue into his cheek, and, in spite of his own anxieties, looked cunningly and contemptuously at Peter.

"Why, man alive! of course she's Penrose's," he replied. "Where did we sign articles? At Penrose's. Who paid your advance? Penrose. Not Penrose's! Whose is she, then?"

"The owner's name's Blackburn," he said, with a painful contraction of his heart. He seemed to see again, flashing across his mind for an instant, the bow-window, at home, with all his dear ones watching the ship sail by. Yet if Fleck was right, the Dolphin was only one of Penrose's floating coffins.

"Blackburn's naught save a bankrupt brother-in-law of Penrose's," said Fleck, half laughing. "There's only One above as can take us safe to Algiers, and bring us home again; and it'll be sore against Penrose's wishes if He does."

"Does our captain know?" asked Peter, fiercely.

"Maybe ay, maybe no," answered Fleck; "but the mate knows all about it, I swear. He could tell where we are bound for. Not Algiers, but Davy Jones's locker, I reckon."

He went away muttering the last words, for all hands were wanted; and Peter had to dismiss the painful thoughts crowding into his brain to attend to the working of the ship. It was when he was at last in his hammock that he had time to turn over what Fleck had said. How much he ought to believe, he hardly knew; but it was plain Fleck himself felt caught in a trap. Was it possible that the original Dolphin could have been lost at sea, and some old hulk bought and rigged out to take her place? It was quite possible. Quite possible it was, too, that Penrose, finding it more and more difficult to meet with crews willing to man his vessels, should have put in, as a nominal owner, his brother-in-law, whose name had not yet gathered any ill-fame.

Peter Blake had a brave heart, and his spirit was high; no man had ever accused him of cowardice. But as he thought of his position and of the risk he ran, with the almost certain death that lay before him, his spirit quailed. He was not sure that he had done all he ought to have done before signing articles. True, Captain Norcott had urged and over-persuaded him. True, Fleck, the coward, had agreed to be one of the crew. True, his funds were very low, and had he remained on shore, serious money difficulties were staring him in the face. But the thought of Bessie and little Nan, of his mother and the baby, brought the tears smarting and stinging under his eyelids. He had been guilty of real cruelty to them; and how terribly they would suffer for his over-rash courage and contempt of danger!

If he had been aboard a good ship, well laden, and with a suitable crew, there was no peril of seas he dared not confront. But how could he look up to God and ask him to work a miracle that Penrose's old hulk of a vessel, with its heavy cargo, might reach the appointed haven, spite of wind and weather? He was a reasonable man, and he knew that God's blessing is granted to man's best efforts; not given to avert from man the consequences of his own folly and crime.

"God forgive me!" he cried, "and God have pity on them at home!"

Peter Blake did not know it, but Captain Norcott was scarcely less troubled than himself. He had remonstrated in vain against the overlading of the Dolphin; and he had been so twitted for growing timorous in his old age, that he had retreated from the wharf in indignant silence, leaving Penrose and the ship's broker to load her as they pleased. When he came on board at the last moment, he knew that he and his crew were about to run a very narrow chance for their lives. If all the men had deserted, instead of two, he would not have been surprised.

But before he had been in the ship twenty-four hours he had made two discoveries which heightened his misgivings. He found that the owner was no other than Penrose's brother-in-law; and that the first mate, placed on board by them, was a near relative of Blackburn. There was, moreover, something about this man which irritated and jarred upon him. He was in supreme command himself; but he doubted whether in any hour of peril his mate would second him, or would not try rather to evade his orders.

There would be very little rest for him on this voyage. Only the most absolutely necessary repose must he take. If any man could take the Dolphin safely to Algiers, he would do it; but nothing on earth should induce him to command any vessel of Penrose's again. He almost wondered why Penrose should have offered him the post, and on terms so good as to make him careless of whose the ship was. But it would speak well for Penrose that he had sent her out to sea under a good and well-known captain, who could not be suspected of conspiracy with him. He felt himself to have been a simple cat's-paw in Penrose's grasp.

One thing he resolved upon. He would save his men. One thing he regretted. He wished he had let Victor go at the last moment, when Blake had asked him. He was almost as fond of Victor as if he had been his own son. A lad that was as bright as a bird, and as lithe and active as a monkey. His singing kept up the spirits of the men, and his happy buoyant confidence seemed like sunshine among them. But Captain Norcott wished earnestly that he had not brought him. There was a more bitter reproval to him in the boy's merry smile than in the dark and frowning faces of his crew.

Thank God it was fair weather! The sea was calm, and the wind soft and low; the only fault was that it was too calm. The Dolphin seemed to be rocked to sleep on the smooth, milky waters; and her sails flapped lazily in the almost still air. But they were making their way down the Channel. The fatal Goodwin Sands and the Dungeness Lighthouse lay behind them; Beachy Head had loomed out for a little while through the autumn mists, and the Isle of Wight was passed. If this weather held out, the voyage might be made without loss of life or vessel; but it would be a very slow one.

Peter Blake watched anxiously for a chance of speaking with the captain unobserved. But the mate seemed here, there, and everywhere, always in the way; an alert and untiring spy, never to be caught off his guard. Every man on board believed him to be a secret scout for Penrose. But Peter's chance came at last. The mate had turned in, and was safely asleep in his berth below; while the captain was in his little cabin on deck. Peter knocked at the door, and entering, closed it carefully behind him. Small as the cabin was, it had been crowded with some cases of fire-arms, which had been put on board as part of the cargo at the last minute.

"Captain," said Peter, "Fleck swears that this isn't the real Dolphin that he's sailed in twice before; and all the crew credit him. You've only to go round about her, and look her over well, and you'll see she's an older ship than she has the appearance of. In my opinion, she's naught else save a painted old Jezebel.

"What then, Blake?" asked Captain Norcott sadly.

"Why, sir," he answered, "you've known me a many years, and you can take my word now. I've not breathed a syllable to my shipmates; but I come to you, and I say run her into the nearest port, and save our lives and your own. She's Penrose's boat; and he's lost too many for us to trust him. The weather's changing, captain, you know. The stars twinkled too much last night; and there have been wind-dogs amid the clouds. There was a high dawn this morning, and the sky was red and lowering. Just look up, and you'll see scud-clouds driving across the sky at this minute. I haven't spoke a word, sir; but, O captain, run in for the shore, for the nearest port, before it is too late."

Captain Norcott seemed lost in thought, and made no answer, while Peter went on with deeper earnestness:

"Think of all the women and children belonging to us men!" he said. "There'd be a bare chance for us, and nothing more, if the Dolphin foundered, for she'd go to pieces like a child's plaything. We're no better off than rats caught in a trap, you and us, sir. The ship's meant to be cast away, and the mate's here to make sure of it. Look here, sir; these fire-arms, what are they? They are no more fire-arms than they are the Queen's crown jewels. It's salt; nothing but salt. The lid of one of them started a little when they were lying on deck, and I saw it; ay, and tasted it. What does that mean, captain?"

"It means roguery, if it's true," exclaimed the captain, with passionate vehemence. "Those cases are insured for $7500, and Penrose begged me to have them safe in my own cabin here. I'll look into them, Blake."

The lid of the topmost case was prized open in a few seconds, and Captain Norcott saw with his own eyes that there was only salt within it, instead of the valuable fire-arms he believed it to contain. He stood staring at it for a minute or two; and then sat down, covering his face with both hands.

Here was a terrible perplexity. What was he to do? What could it be his duty to do? Was he justified in pursuing the voyage in the face of a coming storm, and with such evidence before him that the owner of the Dolphin was guilty of foul play? Or must he put into port, and run himself into the difficulty and trouble of bringing exposure, ruin, and disgrace on the head of his employer? Penrose richly deserved it; but would he not, by some means or other, shift the blame from himself, and make a scapegoat of some innocent person? He knew such men could often evade the law; and that not seldom those who did their utmost to bring evil practices to light were the chief sufferers for their moral courage. It would need a great amount of moral courage to fight a man like Penrose. Was he strong enough himself for the task?

THE SPREAD OF THE GOSPEL.

S. S. Lesson for May 13, Acts 11 : 19-30. Golden Text, 1 Cor. 2 : 2. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Characteristic Exclusiveness—Peter Arraigned—His Statement and Appeal—The Shame of the Modern Church—Progress of the Work—Lay Preachers Called—True Conversion—Its Two Essentials—A Great Evangelistic Work—A Messenger Sent to Report—Barnabas-Evangelists Needed Now—Barnabas Obtains Paul's Assistance—The Christ Men—The Famine Predicted—Relief from Antioch.

It was as difficult for the church at Jerusalem as it had been for Peter himself, to understand that God had wider thoughts of salvation than for the Jewish race alone. Man's heart is very narrow, even when he is converted to God; and he wants to bring God into his narrowness, and cause the Holy Ghost to work in his own groove. Thus sects of parties believe in a work of God among themselves, but are apt to doubt it among other Christians, and to think something must be wrong with them because

THEY FOLLOW NOT WITH US.

Before our Lord's crucifixion we find them absolutely forbidding a man to cast out devils because he followed not with them (Luke 9 : 29, 50). And even after they were filled with the Holy Ghost, there seems to have been a need for them to learn on this point.

On Peter's return to Jerusalem, the apostles and brethren called him in question, saying, "Thou wentest in to men uncircumcised, and didst eat with them." Peter "rehearsed the matter from the beginning," told of the way in which he had been taught by God through the vision at Joppa, and then the wondrous results which had followed at Cæsarea. In those days, the first thought in hearing some new truth, some unexpected account of the work of the Holy Ghost, was not one of suspicion, as it too often is now.

PETER'S APPEAL

to them met with a ready response; he said, "Forasmuch, then, as God gave them the like gift as He did unto us, who believed on the Lord Jesus Christ, what was I that I could withstand God? When they heard these things they held their peace, and glorified God, saying, Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life." Why is it that in the present day testimonies to God's grace, to His teaching, to His speaking to us, and His healing power are received with so little confidence? Alas! the reason is very patent. There is so much of counterfeit, so much of naming the name of Christ without departing from iniquity, that people are on their guard. This is the crying in our day. People have found that it answers their purpose to be religious to a certain extent, they can better impose upon the credulous, they can put people off their guard. The mustard seed, the external church is grown into a great tree, and most surely "the birds of the air," the emissaries of the wicked one, do build their nests in its branches; external Christianity is increasingly confusion and Babylon. It is strengthening to turn from the present awful state of things, where evil is the rule, and real holiness of life the exception, to the history of the early church, where evil did creep in, but as the exception to the general state of things.

God was carrying forward His work, for "the Word of God is not bound" (2 Tim. 2 : 9), and His purposes are already being carried forward, notwithstanding all the evil and confusion which is abroad. Up to this point the apostles had not understood that the Gentiles were to be saved. Although Jesus had told them to disciple all nations, and to preach the gospel "to every creature," they would confine His meaning to the Jews alone, and He had to stir up lay preachers to do the work which His chosen ones were leaving undone. At the time of the persecution about Stephen, the disciples were "all scattered abroad throughout the regions of Judea and Samaria except the apostles." Now we read, "They which were scattered abroad upon the persecution which arose about Stephen, travelled as far as Phœnice, and Cyprus, and Antioch, preaching the word to none but the Jews only. And some of them were men of Cyprus and Cyrene, which, when they were come to Antioch, spake unto the Grecians, preaching the Lord Jesus." Very probably they, not having been brought up in Jerusalem were not half so high-church as were the residents in Jerusalem. It seems strange that Peter, a Galilean by birth, should have become so stiff a Jew, perhaps the priests who had recently become converted had had some influence upon him.

When these Cyprians and Cyrenian Jews preached to the Greeks, "the hand of the Lord was with them; and a great number believed and turned unto the Lord." This is the history of every awakening which is brought about by God. First the hand of the Lord is with the instruments, be they ministers or the simplest workers for God, the hand of the Lord with them is the power by which they work, and when it is so, a great number do believe and turn to the Lord.

BELIEVE AND TURN,

this is true conversion; some believe and think themselves to be converted, but there has been in them no distinct turning to the Lord away from themselves, from sin, and the world; and thus the head is converted without the heart and the life. Again, there are some who do their very utmost to turn to the Lord, who are scrupulous about every little thing, but for want of a faith which accepts Jesus gladly and joyously, there is not a true conversion; the thoughts centre on self still, their confidence is in what they can do and be, not in what Jesus is and what He has done.

The church at Jerusalem, which seems to have been somewhat resting on her oars, heard of this blessed work of God, and "they sent forth Barnabas, that he should go as far as Antioch." It was God's ordering that this loving, gentle man should be

THE MESSENGER.

Had it been James, he might have discouraged these young Gentile converts; but Barnabas, the son of consolation, the man who made things right between Saul of Tarsus and the church at Jerusalem, was the very man to go there. "Who when he came, and had seen the grace of God, was glad." He saw not the instruments used, not the extension of the work itself, but he saw the hand of God and the grace of God; this he recognized above all else. He was glad his religion was full of the joy of the Lord, and this blessed work of God's Spirit was new life to him. He held some holiness meetings among them, for we read, "He exhorted them all, that with purpose of heart they would cleave unto the Lord."

Without doubt the tone of the work was much deepened through this visit of Barnabas, the converts could look up to him, he was like a father among them, "For he was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost and of faith; and much people was added unto the Lord." When we think how powerless is often the visit of a Christian worker, how small are the results which follow it, how almost imperceptible is often the measure in which the converts are deepened in their spiritual life, we are led to the conclusion that Barnabas must have been a man such as we do not often meet with. Yet why should this be? Why should not we also be filled with the Holy Ghost and faith, and shed around us the power and blessing of our God? He is willing to do for us what He did for Barnabas. We may well believe that those who were converted during the visit of Barnabas were converts resembling him, and that from that time forward the infant church at Antioch received a great impetus forward.

Then departed Barnabas to Tarsus, for to seek Saul. There was perhaps a great affinity between the logical, intellectual, strong charactered Saul and the gentle, loving Barnabas. The latter seems to have known Saul's whereabouts, perhaps some communication had passed between them while Saul was in Arabia. "When he had found him he brought him into Antioch. And it came to pass that a whole year they assembled themselves with the church and taught much people." This was no flying visit like that of Peter and John to Samaria. Probably they saw the need there was of Bible instruction. Many in Antioch traded with other cities, and if they were deeply versed in the Word of God, they might be much more helpful to inquirers after truth in other places. It may be that Paul preached here many of the truths which were afterward embodied in his epistles, and thereby, not only the church at Antioch was benefited but the entire world where the gospel has been preached.

It was at Antioch that the disciples first took their Lord's name, i.e.—Christ-man or Christ-woman was then and there first brought into use. Would to God this name had never been degraded and dishonored; would to God we had never given occasion for it to be said there is such a thing as an untrue Christian, a selfish Christian, an impure Christian, a dishonest Christian, a worldly Christian, a self-indulgent Christian, a bad-tempered Christian, a greedy Christian, an unkind Christian, a hard Christian, a discontented Christian, a grumbling Christian, an inconsistent Christian!

CHRISTIAN,

In those days came prophets from Jerusalem to Antioch. There seem to have been in those days some "prophets" who foretold things to come, and some "prophets" who simply preached the gospel. "He that prophesieth speaketh unto men to edification, and exhortation and comfort." "Ye may all prophesy one by one, that all may learn, and all may be comforted. And the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets" (1 Cor. 14 : 3, 31, 32). "And there stood up one of them, named Agabus (evidently one who foretold things to come, Acts 21 : 10) and signified by the Spirit that there should be great dearth throughout all the world; which came to pass in the days of Claudius Cæsar. Then the disciples, every man according to his ability, determined to send relief unto the brethren which dwelt in Judea." The famine was coming upon them as well. But they had received spiritual blessing through the Jerusalem brethren, and these brethren had sold all their possessions and given them away. Thus the Antiochans felt a strong claim upon them, and responded to it.

Oh, how unlike the spirit of the world which would say, If the famine is going to reach me here, then I must keep all I have against it comes, I cannot afford to look after others, they must look to themselves. These brethren acted in the spirit of Christ, and they chose Paul and Barnabas as their messengers to bring their present to Jerusalem. If this was the occasion of Saul's going up to Jerusalem mentioned in chap. 9 : 26, it would seem that his stay in Arabia was not of considerable length. The Lord raise up in our day men like Barnabas and Paul that His work may be more true and thorough, and that a holier, more scriptural standard of religious life may be known and lived among us.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Renewed Excitement has been Produced in England by the discovery of another nitro-glycerine manufactory at Northampton. A house in a quiet suburb of Northampton was rented some time ago by a man who, from his appearance, was judged to be an American. He covered the windows inside with canvas, and gave out that his occupation was that of a photographer. He lately received a box by rail, and was known to be busy. He eventually despatched two suspicious looking boxes, and decamped. The house was broken into by the police. There was no furniture in any of the rooms, but many oil stains were discovered on the floors. At the preliminary examination of the dynamite plotters in London, a druggist of Birmingham testified that Whitehead, who was arrested in that city, had bought at his store 160 pounds of nitric acid, 300 pounds of sulphuric acid, and fifty pounds of glycerine. Bernard Gallagher, the brother of the Greenpoint doctor, has offered to give evidence against his fellow-prisoners, and revealed several points in the plot to the authorities. The government have not at present accepted his offer, Lynch's evidence being considered sufficient to secure conviction.

Another of the Men Charged with Participating in the Phœnix Park murders has been convicted and sentenced to death. Michael Fagan was arraigned last week on the charge of murdering Mr. Burke. The witnesses were the same as in the previous cases, and again men were brought by the defence who swore to an alibi. The jury brought in a verdict of guilty, and the prisoner was sentenced to be hanged on May 28th. An important witness in the murder cases has been obtained in a man named Devine, who was arrested for complicity in the case of the murder of Detective Cox, and has turned informer. Devine swore that he was a Fenian. He mentioned several Fenians, among whom was Sullivan, an auctioneer, of Dolier Street, who was imprisoned as a suspect. A man named Boland, of Manchester, he said, condemned Poole to death, and ordered the prisoner Kingston to carry out the sentence. Devine swore that the society of which the prisoners were members had decided upon the murder of Detective Cox and Judge Lawson. The society had also sentenced Mr. Jenkinson, director of the Irish Criminal Investigation Department, and Mr. Mallon, chief of the detectives, to death. It had plotted to destroy, by dynamite, the house in which Crown witnesses were lodged, and had murdered the informers Kenny and Bailey. Devine also stated that an Irish Member of Parliament was a member of the Assassination Society. Eight arrests have already been made in consequence of Devine's disclosures.

Mr. Gladstone Warmly Advocated the Affirmation Bill, which is introduced to permit Mr. Bradlaugh and other infidels to enter the House of Commons without taking the oath, in a speech delivered in the House on April 26th. It is stated that his speech was a masterpiece of eloquence, and extorted a tribute of enthusiastic admiration from his bitterest opponents. He boldly admitted that the identification of the Ministry and the Liberal party with the cause personified by Mr. Bradlaugh had seriously prejudiced both the Ministry and the party with the country, but declared that the sacrifice of the broad principle of civil equality, regardless of religious conviction, would be prejudicial to religion itself not less than to political liberty. The Conservative party have determined to oppose the bill in all its stages, and many earnest Christian people are praying for their success.

The French Government Persists in its Meddlesome policy in the far East and in Madagascar. It has asked the Legislature to vote an appropriation of 5,000,000 francs (about $1,000,000) for the expedition to Tonquin. The government declares that it does not contemplate an aggressive or a warlike enterprise, but merely an expedition of a limited scope sufficient to support the claims of France in that country. The expedition will consist of one ironclad, six torpedo-boats, two gunboats, and three transports for the conveyance of 1500 troops and is ready to sail. These additional troops will make the force in Tonquin 3000 men. It is considered certain that the ultimatum of Captain Kergaradec, French Envoy to Annam, will be rejected by the Annam government. On April 24th, the French papers published an authorized paragraph which declares that, whatever treaties the Malagassy envoys may make with other countries, France will not allow anything to be done prejudicing her rights in Madagascar.

The Position of the False Prophet is to be assailed by a combined force of British and Egyptian troops. The special correspondent of the New York Herald reports that on March 9th the entire expedition was ready at Khartoum to march against the enemy as soon as the necessary artillery arrived. This was expected daily. The El Mahdi is said to have replenished his treasury by the capture of Obeid, at which place the merchants trading with the interior had deposited a million and a half of dollars for security. This sum he confiscated, and subsequently another million was found buried near the city. Travellers who pass near his camp are plundered of all they possess, and a party of Austrian missionaries, six men and nine women, have been ill-treated and heavily ironed to compel them to renounce Christianity and become Mahommedans. The Austrian consul at Khartoum has interfered in their behalf, but without success.

The Condition of Affairs in Jerusalem is Cited by a recent visitor as an evidence of the decay of the Ottoman Empire. Hundreds of new houses, he says, have been erected here during the last few years, and many more are in process of erection; the population has doubled and is still increasing; every Christian and every Moslem nation under heaven takes the deepest interest in the place, and sends its wisest and best to worship at its shrines; the Jews with anxious and fearful hearts are trying to re-establish themselves in the land of their ancient glories, but the government which holds and rules the country can hardly be said to have made a single step in the direction of improvement, of a juster administration of laws, of intelligent care for the welfare of the peoples under its dominion. All the good that is done, all the progress that is made, is the work of the stranger; no one indeed dares to embark in any considerable undertaking, either for his own benefit or the benefit of others, unless he enjoys the protection of some European Consul who will defend his rights and stand by him when the intrigues and oppression of government officials threaten his ruin. The Mohammedans are themselves quite conscious of this, and lament such a condition of things as deeply as the Christians.

Large Numbers of Destitute Irish Immigrants continue to arrive in this country and in Canada. The expenses of these families is paid by the British Government in part, if not entirely. Lord Carlingford stated recently in the House of Lords that the government were favorably entertaining an offer from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and land companies interested in the opening of the Canadian Northwest. The proposal of these companies is to settle 5000 families, numbering in the aggregate 25,000 persons, on government lands under the Homestead laws, which give to each family 160 acres free. The promoters of the scheme would become security for $5,000,000, to be advanced, interest free, by Great Britain for ten years, to be devoted to loans sufficient to start each family, or they would become security for $10,000,000, with which they would relieve the crowded districts of Ireland of 50,000 persons. The entire population of the country in 1881 was 5,159,839, in 1845 it was 8,295,061. Some light is thrown on the causes that stimulate the extensive emigration by a speech of Lord Lansdowne, in which he stated that there are in Ireland 250,000 tenants who, even if they owned the land they till, and paid no rent, could not extract from it sufficient produce to support them. It is evident that the solution of the Irish problem will not be found in emigration, as every Irishman who lands here seems to have his hatred of England stimulated and envenomed by American air.

A Resolution in Favor of Local Prohibition was passed in the British House of Commons on April 27th. An American correspondent resident in England cables to his journal that the resolution accurately reflects the growing strength of the temperance movement among people of all classes. It merely, however, records, an opinion and has no legislative force. The rapidly increasing number of profitable coffee palaces marks one extreme, and the advocacy of the movement by powerful members of the aristocracy marks the other. At a meeting on Saturday, April 21st, at Stafford House, the Duchess of Sutherland donned a blue ribbon among much enthusiasm. She is one of the leaders of the Court and fashionable society.

The Concluding Services of the Moody and Sankey mission in Liverpool appear to have been among the most successful as well as the most interesting of their visit to England. At one of the meetings, Mr. Moody said that he had gone to bed almost every night through the week scarcely able to sleep, his arm so ached from the handshakings which he had received after each service, these greetings being the grateful expression of hundreds who assured him of the good they had received by his former ministrations. A godly man testified that, though his son, with an oath, vowed he would never go to hear those two hypocrites when they were in England in 1875, he was induced by curiosity to go to Victoria Hall. There he was converted, and is now a medical officer of repute and piety at a hospital in a neighboring county.

A Revival is Reported from Switzerland. A letter from a Christian residing there says "There has been a religious awakening in the Canton de Berne, owing to the indefatigable labors of the missionary, Mons. Schrenck, whose efforts are crowned with marvellous success. M. Schrenck has lately felt the need of a more satisfactory conclusion to his meetings, and to meet this need, his preaching is now always followed by after-meetings and private conversations. He has worked alone, without help from the pastors, and in independent buildings, not places of worship. As a result, the newly awakened may probably be counted by hundreds. Other evangelists have received a new stimulus, the influence has passed like a breath of life over the greater number of our meetings. One, for forty years a member of the Societé Evangélique, says he has never seen anything to compare with it."

Volume V. of the Christian Herald and Signs of our Times is now ready, bound in cloth containing all the numbers for 1882 with complete index. Price $3 including postage. Ten per cent less to ministers and the trade.

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman (London), for April, may be obtained at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, price six cents, postage paid.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of a the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

THE mission to which Mr. Wilson (whose portrait appears this week on our front page) has devoted himself is the outcome, under the providence of God, of American enterprise. In March, 1875, the intrepid explorer, Mr. H. M. Stanley, the discoverer of Livingstone, was at Uganda, in Central Africa, and while there was impressed with the intelligence of the people and the courtesy and wisdom of their ruler, King Mtesa. Stanley wrote a letter which, after several narrow escapes of being lost, reached England, and was published in the English newspapers in November of that year. In this letter Stanley spoke with enthusiasm of the promising field for missionary labor which Uganda afforded, and made an earnest appeal to the Christian churches to evangelize this place; giving at the same time a list of articles required as outfit, and stating the probable expense of such an expedition.

Within a few days of the publication of Mr. Stanley's letter, donations were offered toward meeting the expense of a mission in Mtesa's country. The Church Missionary Society accepted the responsibility as a call from God, and asked for volunteers to go out to the Victoria Lake to establish two stations, one in Karagwe, the other in Uganda.

THE VOLUNTEER PARTY.

A well-equipped party, under the direction of Lieutenant G. Shergold Smith, R. N., proceeded to Africa in the spring of 1876. In May, 1877, four men, Dr. Smith, Lieutenant Smith, Rev. C. T. Wilson, and Mr. O'Neill were on the southern shores of the Victoria Nyanza. There Dr. Smith died, but Lieutenant Smith and Rev. C. T. Wilson crossed the Lake, and were cordially received by Mtesa on July 2d. Subsequently Mr. O'Neill and Lieutenant Smith were killed by the natives of Ukerewe, a large island in the Lake, and Mr. Wilson was thus left alone. He was afterward joined by Mr. Mackay, and in the mean while a party by the Nile route had been sent to his aid. This consisted of the Rev. G. Litchfield, Mr. C. W. Pearson, Mr. R. W. Felkin, medical missionary, and Mr. J. W. Hall. The latter was taken ill, and obliged to return home, but the other three reached Uganda safely in February, 1879. A few months later the Rev. C. T. Wilson and Mr. Felkin were sent by King Mtesa to Europe to conduct three ambassadors, whom he desired to send to England, to see Queen Victoria.

DR. LIVINGSTONE'S SUCCESSES.

As will be perceived, this mission is an effort to accomplish the desire and purpose of Dr. Livingstone. That great missionary explorer left no man qualified to follow his steps. His work divided at his death into two channels. Of these Stanley is conducting one; Mr. Wilson and his colleagues are laboring in the other. Thus the inspiration of Livingstone's life does not die with him. The continual cry of his heart to be permitted to finish his work for Christ and the perishing Africans was answered, though not in the way he anticipated.

The thrill that went through the civilized world when the death of David Livingstone and all its touching circumstances became known, did more for Africa than he could have done had he completed his task as he desired. From the worn-out figure kneeling at the bedside in the hut in Ilala, an electric spark seemed to fly, quickening hearts on every side. The statesman felt it; it put new vigor into the despatches he wrote, and the measures he devised with regard to the brutalizing slave trade. The merchant felt it, and began to plan in earnest how to traverse the Dark Continent with roads and railways, and open it to commerce from shore to centre. The explorer felt it, and started with high purpose on new schemes of unknown danger. The missionary felt it—felt it a reproof of past languor and unbelief, and found himself lifted up to a higher level of faith and devotion. No parliament of philanthropy was held; but the verdict was as unanimous and as hearty as if the Christian world had met and in the strength of the Almighty had passed the resolution—"Livingstone's work shall not die—

AFRICA SHALL LIVE."

Mr. Wilson and his coadjutors of the Church Missionary Society have nobly done their part toward the realization of the grand object aimed at; and it is mainly from the record of their doings, as published in "Uganda and the Egyptian Soudan," that we obtain materials for the following narrative.

It was on the morning of June 24th, 1876, that the mail steamer Putialla, which carried the missionary party, entered the dark blue waters of the Indian Ocean. In a short time the narrow channel into the harbor of Zanzibar was threaded, and just as the glowing sun sank behind the far-off purple hills of Africa, the flag was run up to the mast-head, two guns fired as a salute, and the anchor went with a rattling plunge into the dancing billows. A crowd of small boats soon gathered round the steamer, waiting for passengers; then a man-o'-war's boat, pulled by sturdy blue-jackets, went bounding across the harbor, and reaching the vessel, demanded the expected mail-bag.

ARRIVAL AT ZANZIBAR.

As Mr. Wilson and his companions were watching the lively scene, a man informed them that "de mission boat was comed," and looking over the ship's side, they saw one of the boats belonging to the Highland Lassie, the little mission steamer of the Church Missionary Society, and after a brief delay they entered it, and rowing across the water, reached the Mission House, situated in the suburb of Gulioni, and which had formerly been the residence of Dr. Livingstone.

The island of Zanzibar, which is growing in importance year by year as its trade increases, comprises an area of about 400,000 acres, and its population in 1871 was estimated at 150,000, the chief town being Zanzibar, containing 80,000 inhabitants. The population is composed of representatives of a considerable number of nationalities—Arabs, Hindus, Banyans, Persians, Negroes, Malagasies, Europeans and Americans, who are attracted there by the facilities the island possesses for communication and trade with the interior of Africa.

THE ARABS AND THEIR TRADE.

The most important class are the Arabs, to whom the island belongs, and many of them are large landed proprietors, possessing extensive plantations, and great numbers of slaves. They are also the principal traders with the interior of the continent and considerable numbers of them leave Zanzibar every year for the mainland, with large caravans and a numerous retinue, and settling down at Unyanyembe, Ujiji, or other trade centres of the interior, buy ivory and slaves, which they gradually collect at headquarters, returning after a lapse of time to dispose of their merchandise, and to lay in a fresh stock of goods with which to renew their trading.

FOUR HOURS IN AN ARAB DHOW.

The instructions Mr. Wilson and his friends received before leaving England were to establish a station at a place called Mpwapwa, on the western side of the Usagara Mountains, and leaving one of the party to take charge of the post, the others were to proceed to the Victoria Lake, with the view of taking up stations in the countries of Karagwe and Uganda. On July 22d all the necessary preparations on the island of Zanzibar were completed, and, as shown in the left-hand panel of the upper section of our frontispiece, Mr. Wilson took his place on board an Arab dhow which was bound for Bagamoyo, and which lay anchored off the Custom House. The following is Mr. Wilson's description:

"The dhow was a small, clumsy craft, with a small poop at the stern, on which a motley group of passengers, Arabs, Hindus, Banyans, Negroes, Half-breeds, and a solitary European (myself) were huddled; the hold was covered with a sloping thatched roof, and a small platform or deck, in the bows, accommodated the two or three sailors who worked the huge calico sail. The timbers of this singular-looking craft were not in the best possible condition, and leaked considerably, giving constant employment to two men in bailing out the water. Just as we were about to start, a venerable-looking Hindu, with a magnificent white beard, brought a woman and three little children on board, and requested me to look after them as far as Bagamoyo, which, of course, I consented to do. At length the order to hoist sail was given, the sailors noisily responded, and we were at last fairly on our way toward the continent of Africa."

GETTING READY FOR A LONG MARCH.

After a run of thirty miles, accomplished in a little less than four hours, Bagamoyo was reached. In the centre of this straggling little town Mr. Wilson found Lieutenant Smith, who had preceded him, busily engaged in hiring porters. A week of constant toil followed, packing and repacking loads, breaking-in refractory donkeys, hiring porters, teaching the servants to pitch tents, paying and receiving visits, and getting all ready for the long march into the interior, and finally writing letters for the monthly mail which was about to leave for Europe. On July 28th, however, the last load was packed, and the party set off for the first camp, only three miles distant, where they were delayed till August 14th. At length the arrangements being complete Mr. Wilson gave the order to move on, bidding a long farewell to civilization, and taking a last look at the ocean. On September 18th Mpwapwa was reached.

Mpwapwa is a district lying on the westerly slopes of the Usagara Mountains, and on the edge of the forest region which separates that country from the plateau of Ugogo. The people are of a mixed race, or rather representatives of a number of tribes. Their chief delicacy for the table is a species of field-mouse, and the little boys were seen frequently by Mr. Wilson coming home in the evening "with numbers of them strung like fish on a stick."

A DISAPPOINTED LEOPARD.

Leopards were found to be somewhat numerous in the locality. One evening, while some of the party were talking together in one of the tents, one of these predatory and voracious monsters approached a tembé, or small clay native hut, about fifty yards off, and getting its paw through a hole in the wall, seized a goat by the throat, and was attempting to drag it out, when the approach of some men frightened it off.

After this, of course, every one in the tents was on the qui vive for leopards, and one of Mr. Wilson's donkeys, which had broken out of camp one fine night, and was indulging in the luxury of a roll in the sandy soil, nearly lost his life at the hands of one of the occupants of a tent, who, in the uncertain light, mistook the quadruped for a leopard. He missed his mark, however, and the astonished donkey, springing to his feet, revealed his true character.

On October 7th, three of the caravans, into which the party was divided, set off for the far west, under the leadership of Mr. Wilson and Mr. O'Neill. The march was a most difficult and tedious one. The entire country through which they passed was more or less covered with forests, the open spaces being few and far between. Elephants, buffaloes, rhinoceroses, and giraffes were numerous, with various species of antelopes, and, at night, lions, leopards, and hyenas used to prowl round the camp.

stronger than they? The martyrs could not convert the world; can we do more than than they? The Church for eighteen hundred years could not convert the world; can we do it? They have preached the Gospel of Christ, so can we. They have gone to earth's remotest bounds, so can we. They have saved "some," so can we They have wept as so few believed their report, so can we. They have finished their course with joy, and the ministry which they have received to testify of the Gospel of the grace of God; we can do the same. Can we reasonably hope to do more?

"It would take to all eternity to bring the millennium, at the rate that modern revivals progress," said the venerable Dr. Lyman Beecher, before a ministerial convention, held close by old Plymouth Rock. And what hope is there that they will progress more rapidly? Is it in the Word of God? Glad would we be to find it there. Sadly we read that "Evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived."

Has God a mightier Saviour—a more powerful Spirit? Has He another gospel which will save the world? Where is it? Is there any way to the kingdom other than that which leads through much tribulation? Is there another way to the crown besides the way of the cross? Can we reign with Him unless we first suffer for His sake?

No doubt the world might be converted if men desired to know the Lord. And so had all who heard, received with gladness the Word of God, the world might have been converted within twenty years from the day of Pentecost. If each Christian had brought a single soul to God with each successive year, the calm splendors of the millennial era might have shone upon the declining years of the apostles of Jesus Christ. But, instead of this, ages of darkness came on. The world did not repent, but

THE CHURCH APOSTATIZED.

The darkness did not become light, but much of the light became darkness; and to this hour, as in the apostles' time, the whole world lieth in the wicked one.

If the Gospel were to convert the world, we should have seen tokens of it ere this. But where are such auguries to be found? Shall we look to missionaries, who sometimes labor for years before one sinner yields to the claims of the Gospel? Shall we look to the dense darkness of the heathen world? Shall we look at the formalism of the professed Church? Shall we look at the wide extension of infidelity? Shall we look at the abounding of iniquity and the waxing cold of love? Shall we look at a world where eighteen hundred years of toil and tears have not brought one-twentieth part of mankind even to a profession of true Christianity; and when not more than one-fifth claim for themselves the dubious title of Christian nations? Shall we look over a world in which we cannot find one nation of Christians, nor one tribe of Christians, nor one city of Christians, nor one town of Christians, nor one village of Christians, nor one hamlet of Christians, save here and there, where a questionable faith has led a few, with hypocrites even then among them, to withdraw themselves from the world, and cherish the untried virtues of a secluded life? Surely, after eighteen hundred years of experiment with a system designed to convert the world, men might point to some country, to some province, to some nation, and say, "Behold the commencement of a converted world."

WHERE SHALL WE LOOK

to find the tokens of the speedy dawning of the hoped-for day of peace? Shall we look at Christendom, where for every missionary sent forth to convert the heathen, a thousand soldiers are trained and supported that they may cut each other's throats? Shall we look at the dense masses of godless, hopeless toilers, who journey on in darkness to perdition, in the chief cities of boasted Christian lands? Shall we look at those nations which claim to be mentally and morally in advance of all the inhabitants of the globe, but who spend more money for strong drink than they do for bread, and whose yearly expenditure for all religious and secular instruction, and for all purposes of Christian charity, would not pay for the cost of intoxicating drinks consumed by them in a single month?

Shall we look to the centres of Christian civilization, where squalor crowds on splendor, and where Lazarus still lies, licked by dogs, hard by the rich man's gate; where in the midst of lavished wealth and wasted treasure, thousands of helpless women make their dire election between hunger and shame, starvation and sin? Shall we explore the great cities of Christendom, where, surrounded by sky-piercing steeples and sweetly chiming bells, poor motherless, friendless outcasts wander wet and weary through the midnight hours, scorned by Simon the Pharisee and his proud wife and silk-robed daughters; finding no way to draw near to Him who calls the heavy laden to come and rest; no place in the rich man's house to bathe His feet with penitential tears; no path open but the downward way; no gate ajar but the broad gate that leadeth to destruction?

Shall we visit the gorgeous temples erected to Him, who, more homeless than the foxes and the birds, was cradled in a wayside manger, and was buried in a stranger's tomb—but the price of whose blood bought a potter's field where strangers might be buried?—we shall find by the smell of mint, and anise, and cummin, that the tithes are promptly paid by the proud Pharisee whose "God-I-thank-thee," echoes through the sounding aisles; but shall we not also find Fraud and Greed sitting side by side in the chief seats of the synagogue, and unclean reptiles swarming like frogs of Egypt, while the tables of the money-changers still stand right side up, and no scourge of small cords drives the buyers and the sellers from the sacred place?

Shall we look to China, along whose borders a few mission stations twinkle like tapers in the midst of a darkness wide reaching and almost impenetrable? While we rejoice at the salvation of some in the far-off land of Sinim, let us not forget that every passing day witnesses the horrible death of not less than one thousand Chinamen, diseased, debauched, degraded, murdered, by the use of that opium which is raised and sold by the British Government, and that while the British and Foreign Bible Society reports an income of one million of dollars per year for the diffusion of the Word of God, the Christian government of Great Britain derives an annual income of forty-five millions of dollars from the opium trade.

Shall we look at the far-off islands of the Southern Seas, where heathenism has been banished by the light of Gospel truth, and barbarism has given place to an enlightened civilization? We shall find that those races which lived in health and strength in spite of barbarism and cannibalism, are now slowly dying out, from unreportable diseases and vices, unknown in their barbarous condition, but which have been brought to their shores by sailors from Christian lands, and which, spreading like the gangrene of hell, are eating out the sources of the national life.

Where shall we go to find the evidence of this glad era of which is proclaimed as so sure to come and so near at hand? It is easy on platforms and at anniversaries to speak of the spread of the Gospel and the diffusion of the Word of God, and in this we do rejoice and will rejoice with joy unspeakable; but while many are exhibiting to delighted assemblies these gracious tokens of divine favor and blessing, who keeps an account of the statistics of the work of the Prince of Darkness, the god of this world? A company of Christian people assemble and congratulate themselves upon the rescue of a dozen or a hundred men from ruin, in some great city; suppose, on the other hand, all the dealers in strong drink, and the panderers to vice and crime, should gather themselves together and count up the victims ensnared, the hearts broken, the homes desolated, the lives blighted and the souls ruined by their vile craft; suppose their

were issued, in which they gave the number of drunkards made during the year, the number induced to take the first glass, the number of murders and suicides due to their terrible traffic, the souls enticed from paths of innocence and peace, and led in ways of darkness and of death; suppose that such a report could be laid upon our tables or suppose it should meet us as we read our morning papers; suppose along with it were placed the statistics of wealth lavished by Christians on vanities and follies, set over against the amount doled out for purposes of Christian endeavor; would not such an exhibition as this speedily cause us to hide our faces in the very dust, and instead of boasting of the work accomplished, cry out to God for mercy and for help.

We have no doubts nor misgivings regarding the importance nor the success of Christian efforts, nor would we for one moment discourage those ardent souls who, with their sickles in their hands, are entering this widespread harvest field. But facts are facts, and it is well for the Christian soldier to know that he is summoned to service more stern than sham fights and dress parades; that the warfare of the Church is a mighty struggle, with overwhelming odds against her; and that only the Captain of Salvation can give victory to His saints. It is useless to shut our eyes to sins and dangers which exist on every hand. Let those who enter into this work of converting the world with all their souls, and it will not be strange if with others who have tried the experiment, they conclude that the world is a wrecked vessel, doomed to go down, and it is their business to launch the Gospel life-boat and rescue all they can.

But if the world is not converted,

WILL NOT THE GOSPEL THEN PROVE A FAILURE?

That depends upon what is to be expected of it. If the life-boat was intended to keep the ship from sinking, then it proves a failure if it only saves the crew. If the Gospel was to effect the eternal salvation of all mankind, then failing to accomplish that work is a failure of the Gospel. If the Gospel was to convert the world, it will prove a failure if that is not done. But if the Gospel was preached, "to take out of the Gentiles a people for His name," then it is not a failure. If it was given that God might in infinite mercy and love, "save some," then it is not a failure. If it was given that every repentant sinner might have eternal life, and that every good soldier might receive a crown of glory, then it is not a failure. If it was given that an innumerable company might be redeemed "out of every kindred, and tongue, and nation, and people," then it is not a failure. If it was given that the vales and hills of paradise restored, might teem with a holy throng who shall be "equal unto the angels, the children of God, being the children of the resurrection," then it is not a failure.

And was not this its object, rather than the exaltation of a worldly church to the splendors of earthly prosperity, while beneath the theatre of their easy triumph there slumber the ashes of prophets and the dust of apostles? Are we to hold jubilee a thousand years, while the martyr's unceasing cry, "How long, O Lord?" goes up to God? Are we to have our songs of triumph, while "the whole creation groaneth for deliverance, and while that longed-for day of the redemption of our body is postponed? Nay, verily, the hope of the body is one hope; the hope of the completeness and perfection of the Church which Christ has redeemed. It reaches beyond the splendors of temporal prosperity; it looks beyond death's shadowy vale; and the Church only finds its home and rest, with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of our God, and in the presence of our King.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Government Statement of the Reduction of the public debt shows financial progress without a parallel in the history of any nation on earth. It is thus summarized in the financial column of the New York Times: Since the 30th of June, last year, the public debt of the United States has been reduced $114,834,575, or, in round numbers, by $115,000,000, being an average of $11,500,000 per month, and at the rate of $138,000,000 per year. The highest point for the interest-bearing debt of the United States was in August, 1865, when it stood $2,381,530,295. The reduction since made is $1,023,715,412. The annual interest charge in 1865 was $150,977,697. At the close of the fiscal year 1882 it was but $57,360,110, and it is now some $4,000,000 less. The lowest rate of interest paid in 1865 was 5 per cent, the highest was 7.3 per cent; the average was a little over 6 per cent; the lowest rate at present is 3 per cent, the highest is 3½ per cent.

The Civil Service Commissioners have Prepared the rules which they propose to adopt for the regulation of their proceedings under the new law. They have been submitted to the President, and have been considered by him and the Cabinet at two special meetings and approved. Beside the Washington offices, the sphere of the commission embraces eleven Custom Houses and twenty-three post offices. Candidates for admission to the service will, under the rules, be examined in open competitive examination, in penmanship, copying, and letter-writing; the fundamental rules of arithmetic, fractions, and percentage; interest, discount, and the elements of book-keeping and accounts; on all of which a minimum rank of 65 per cent is required. The subjects of the elements of the English language, and of the geography, history, and government of the United States are included, but on these only 50 per cent is required as a minimum, and for the lower offices examinations will be limited to penmanship, copying, and orthography, and the fundamental rules of arithmetic, with a grade of 65 per cent at least. Special examinations may be held for appointment to offices requiring peculiar qualifications. The commission is to certify to the respective appointing officers the three persons standing highest in examinations among those eligible to the place to be filled and from these the appointment is to be made. If the appointing officer requests it, the certification will be made from those of one sex; otherwise sex is to be disregarded. Appointments are to be made first for a probationary term of six months, and detailed provision is made for securing satisfactory evidence of the conduct of the appointee during this term; if it confirm his fitness he will be absolutely appointed; if not, he will be regarded at the close of the probation as out of the service.

The Defects in the Excise Laws of New York were discussed at a mass meeting in Steinway Hall on May 4th, when the committee appointed at the previous meeting held in the same place on February 26th, presented its report. It was decided that a new excise law should be drafted, and a copy sent to the newspapers and members of the legislature, and its adoption advocated in a series of public meetings. The meeting expressed its opinion on the question of the responsibility for the present deplorable state of the city, by passing the following resolution: That as the undue preponderance of liquor-sellers in the Board of Aldermen is detrimental to the community, lowers the morale of the Excise Commissioners, and is a bar to good and pure government, we hereby pledge ourselves to support a change in their method of election or a withdrawal of their confirming power. We pledge to Mayor Edson our support in any further and fuller attempt he may make to nominate Excise Commissioners for character and fitness rather than political partisanship, and also our support to the Police Commissioners, District-Attorney and Recorder in continuing their recent vigorous action to enforce the Excise law in this city.

The New Sunday Observance Law Passed by the Legislature of New York State, is an attempt to take a middle course between the demands of those who desire a complete secularization of the Lord's day, and those who advocate its Christian observance. It allows the sale of all kinds of food up to ten o'clock on Sunday and the sale throughout the day of drugs, medicines, newspapers, fruit and confectionery everywhere, and tobacco and cigars in places where liquors are not sold. The prohibition of Sunday sale of liquor is important and welcome if it be executed, but why newspapers, fruit, confectionery, tobacco and cigars may be sold as if they belonged to the same category as medicines, is a problem only a New York Legislator is qualified to solve.

The Prohibitionists of New Jersey have called a State Convention to assemble at Trenton on May 22d. Each ward and township will be entitled to send two delegates, and in addition thereto, every church and temperance organization will be allowed to send one delegate.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey arrived in New York on Sunday last. Mr. Sankey attended Mr. Sawyer's meeting in Cooper Union in the evening, and gave a brief account of the success of the mission in Great Britain. Mr. Moody was too much fatigued to attend the meeting. The evangelists will rest at their respective homes during the summer, and hope to cross the Atlantic again in October to commence evangelistic labor in London. They are accompanied to this country by Mr. W. Hind Smith, of the London Y. M. C. A.

The Death of Rev. Josiah Henson, the Colored preacher, occurred on Saturday, May 5th. He is said to have been the person from whom Mrs. Stowe sketched the character of "Uncle Tom" in her well-known novel. Mr. Henson was in his ninety-fourth year when he died, having been born in Charles County, Maryland, in 1789. In his young days he had the confidence of his owner, who repeatedly sent him North on business, taking his promise to return. When he was thirty-nine years of age money was given him by the Methodist Church, to which he belonged, to purchase his freedom. Believing himself to have been cheated in the negotiation with his owner, he made his escape with his wife and four children to Canada, where he has since resided. He died at Dresden, Ont.

A Petition from a Workhouse, which Deserves more attention than it is likely to receive, has been presented. A local journal says: "A petition from inmates of the Allegheny County (Pa.) Workhouse, requesting the suppression of the liquor traffic because it has been the cause of the petitioners' downfall and would prevent their reformation if they were released from confinement, is one of the latest oddites of the anti-liquor movement." It does not appear in what way "the oddity" comes in. It is not very odd that people who have been ruined, and know what ruined them, should desire the suppression of the evil.

Dr. Ray Palmer, the Venerable Author of the hymn "My faith looks up to Thee," which for fifty years has been sung throughout the English-speaking world, has recovered from the illness which it was feared would end his life of service. Dr. S. Irenæus Prime, his intimate friend, publishes a letter recently received from him, in which he says: "For a whole month after I was taken ill I was forbidden to read or hear reading, to write, to talk or even to think much about anything interesting. Hard fate for a man who has for years all the while been in haste at his work, as if some other thing were pressing to be done. But my attack was nevertheless a comparatively slight one; and the last two weeks I have attended church and presided at my weekly prayer-meeting. The dear Lord has been very tender with me, and has made the sense of His presence and love very delightful through what otherwise would have been weary days."

How a Family was Transformed as the Result of one prayer, was told in a letter to the Sunday-school of the Fourteenth Street Presbyterian Church in New York, by a missionary of the American Sunday-school Union. Spending the night in a family of eight persons, he asked if he should offer prayer, but was rudely refused; the father seemed to feel insulted by the proposal, but going up into a loft to sleep, he knelt down and prayed with a son who shared his bed. Three months after, as the missionary was again passing that way, the father came out and asked him to come in and spend the night with them, and himself led in prayer; and there seemed to be an entire change in the family.

Two Sums of Money were Received last Week at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to defray the cost of sending the paper to colored ministers in the South. A subscriber at Millersville, Pa., sends ten dollars, and another, who has recently received an increase of income, and who desires to make, in this form, a thank-offering to God, sends two dollars. Twelve more colored ministers will, through the kindness of our two friends, receive THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for a year, and we pray that its perusal may be blessed of God to their use in His service. Friends in the South still continue sending us names of colored ministers to whom the paper would be useful, but who cannot afford to pay for a subscription. More than two hundred of these names have been received besides those which the fund at our disposal enables us to supply. A list is kept of them in the order in which they arrived, and should there be further contributions for the purpose, the names will be transferred to the subscription list, in that order. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD staff have been much cheered during the last few weeks by the unusually large number of testimonies received from readers, who owe to God's blessing on the perusal of recent issues of the paper their conversion, or assistance in the Christian life. We thank our friends for sending them, and at some future time we will, with their permission, publish some of the most remarkable cases.

A Singular Discovery of Buried Money is reported from Vermont. A plowman on the farm of Mr. M. T. Mott, a few days ago plowed up three pieces of ancient silver coin. These he carried in his pocket and showed to Mr. Mott and a few others. The news soon spread, and the next morning as early as five o'clock A.M. parties from the town were on their way with eager steps toward the field, with spades, shovels, hoes, etc., on their backs, to search for the hidden coin. Mr. Mott, in the mean time, had decided to reserve the mine for his own benefit and to stop the prospecting, but before he arrived upon the ground about thirty had got there and were busy at work, and had already found several pieces. He at once summarily ejected the seekers, and forbade them digging any more on his ground. About forty pieces have been found, all silver but one, which is gold. The pieces of silver vary in size from a ten-cent piece to a silver dollar. They are all Spanish coins, and the dates are from 1726 to 1779. A similar excitement would have been produced anywhere by the news that there was buried money in a particular spot. Men are everywhere ready to exert themselves in such a search. Yet the discovery by one man of happiness and joy in God, more valuable than gold, seldom moves his friends to seek in the same way the same blessing (Prov. 2 : 3-5).

A Miner's Extraordinary Escape from the Indians is described in a Western journal. It states that John Lyons, a well-known citizen of Arizona Territory, while at work in the shaft of his mine near Tres Alamos, had just put in a blast and lighted the fuse, when, on reaching the top of the shaft, he beheld four mounted Apaches rapidly approaching. Their horrible yells and hostile gestures revealed their murderous intent, and Mr. Lyons was for an instant paralyzed with terror. His first impulse was to hurl himself into the shaft and be blown to atoms by the explosion of the blast rather than perish miserably at the hands of the remorseless foe. These reflections occupied only a moment's time, but the Apaches were almost upon him. Suddenly the blast at the bottom of the shaft exploded with terrific effect, throwing a shower of rock and débris high in the air, which was followed by a dense volume of smoke rolling up from the shaft. The Indians checked their horses appalled by the unexpected and to them mysterious eruption, then with a yell of terror wheeled around and galloped off in the direction whence they came. But for the coincidence of the blast igniting at that particular moment, the man would, doubtless, have been tortured to death in the true Apache style. In the Christian life there come times when destruction seems inevitable, as it seemed to the miner, but those who trust in God experience deliverance as unexpected as his (Psa. 62 : 5-8).

A Reporter's Kind Word Issued in the Reform of a criminal in Michigan, according to the man's own story. A Detroit journal states that a man called at its office recently, and inquired for "the criminal reporter." On being brought together, the visitor said he had called to thank the reporter for being the means of his reformation. He said : "I want to talk with you. I've come a good deal over a thousand miles to see you. When I was convicted over in the Recorder's Court in the old City Hall, you wrote about me in the paper the next morning, 'Myles doesn't look like a criminal, but his identification was complete. It is his first offence, and he will regret it for five years at least.' I read that the next morning as I was being taken to Jackson, and those words, 'Myles doesn't look like a criminal,' made a deep impression upon me, probably for the reason that I had not heard a kind word for a long time before. I cut those words out and pasted them up in my cell. I have come here to-day to thank you for writing them. They helped me to become an honest man. 'Regret it'! You never wrote a truer word in your life. How I did suffer in that prison! When my time was out, I went to Chicago, and from there to St. Louis. I got work in a wholesale grocery store, and I worked hard. The boss took a fancy to me, and five years ago he sent me up into Nevada to look after a cattle ranch he and his brother own up in there. That suited me, and I became a herder, and now I am superintendent of the ranch, and get $300 a month. Good-by, old fellow! You did me a good turn, and I'll never forget it." It is too much the custom to speak hard words of criminals. This is one of many instances in which a sympathetic word has touched a heart that severity would never have softened. The duty of kindness is enjoined especially upon Christians (2 Peter 1 : 7).

A Pastor's Confession of Sin, made Recently at a conference of Christian people, conveyed a gentle reproof to his people. It is stated by a Richmond, Va., journal that as a number of Christian people were confessing their faults one to another, and asking for prayer, the pastor arose, and with deep emotion, said : "Brethren, I wish you to pray for me. Often I sin in being too anxious and burdened as to what will become of my family when I die, as my salary forbids my making any provision for the future." There are many pastors, similarly circumstanced, whom Satan assails in their hours of darkness with these doubts dishonoring to God's faithfulness. The churches to which they minister often forget how small an effort of their own would be required to lighten their pastors' burden (1 Cor. 9 : 11).

The Voice of the Aurora Borealis has been heard by an explorer now at Fort Rae. A Boston journal publishes an interview with Captain Dawson, commander of the British circumpolar expedition now at Fort Rae, in the course of which the captain, who is a most careful observer of natural phenomena, described the voice of the aurora. He said that while his party was travelling northward from Winnipeg, an aurora was observed—evidently very near—which was accompanied by a distinct swishing noise like that of a sharp squall in a ship's rigging, or that made by a whip in passing through the air. He is led to believe that the sound is heard occasionally, though rarely, but that it would be more frequently noticed were it not that the aurora is generally at too great a height. It is probable that the rarity of the atmosphere in those northern regions, and the solemn stillness of the uninhabited land, also aided in enabling the explorer to hear sounds he could not have heard elsewhere. So eminent Christians, in time of severe affliction or in the near approach of death, have felt that the world's voice was hushed, and the sounds of heaven seemed to strike their ears (Job 4 : 13-17).

Adrift on a Raft in a Raging Torrent, was the critical situation of a young man in West Virginia, last week. Two youths in that State had to cross the Cheat River to reach their homes. They were on the north side of the river, and decided, rather than to walk two or three miles up or down the bank, to secure a skiff or boat, that they would construct a raft. The raft was soon made and launched, but it proved unmanageable in the rapids. One of them jumped from the raft and swam ashore, but the other, who could not swim, clung to the raft, which went down the river at lightning speed. Down the rapids went the raft, shooting along with frightful velocity and carrying its rider to what seemed certain death. For seven miles the young man travelled in this perilous way. In some places the raft would shoot under water and then leap over rocks and glide again over the rapids at break-neck speed. At length a man on the bank saw the raft, and succeeded in flinging a rope to the youth. Drenched and almost exhausted from this terrible ordeal, the young man made one more effort, succeeded in pulling his raft, by means of the rope, into still water, and was finally saved. It is in such a headlong course that impenitent sinners are travelling. Unhappily they do not always realize their danger, or they would seize the Gospel rope when it is flung to them, and be eternally saved (Heb. 2 : 3).

OTHER SHEEP AND ONE FLOCK.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And other sheep I have, which are not of this fold : them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice ; and they shall be one fold, and one shepherd (or more correctly, one flock, one shepherd)."—JOHN 10 : 16.

Two Notable Statements—The Comfort They Give—I. Christ had a People under the Worst Circumstances—The Terrible Time of the First Advent—Without Vital Godliness—Marked by Will Worship—Fierce Atheism—II. Christ's Sheep that We do not Know—Already Redeemed—May be Wandering—Or Stolen—A Divine Search-Warrant—III. The Lord Must Bring Them—How He Brings Them—The Incentive to Preaching — Assurred Success—IV. Unity Guaranteed—Individual Unity—How They are Known.

THIS verse is guarded before and behind by two notable statements. Before it we hear the Master say, "I lay down My life for the sheep," and immediately after it we meet with another grand sentence, "I lay down My life, that I might take it again." The first statement, "I lay down My life for the sheep" is the sheet anchor of our confidence when storms assail the vessel of the Church. The Lord Jesus has by His death proved His love to His people ; and His determination to save them is made clear by His laying down His life for them ; therefore doubt and fear should be banished and the very name of despair should be unknown among the Israel of God. We both patiently hope and quietly wait to see the salvation of God, and the performance of all His designs of love ; for that death upon the cross is a cause which will surely produce its effect. Christ did not die at a peradventure. The supposition of a Saviour disappointed in the results of His blood-shedding is not to be tolerated for a moment. So far we are cheered by the vanguard which marches in advance of our text.

But as if the poor, timid people of God would, nevertheless, at times fancy that the purpose of Christ would not be achieved, behold in the rear another sentence, "I lay down My life that I might take it again." He that died, and so redeemed His people by price, lives that He may Himself personally see that they are also redeemed by power. In the risen life of Jesus assurance is made doubly sure ; now are we sure that His design must be carried out, nothing can hinder it. We dare not dream that the Son of God can be disappointed of the object for which He died, and for which He lives again. If

JESUS DIED FOR A PURPOSE

He will accomplish it ; if Jesus rose for a purpose, He will accomplish it ; if Jesus lives forever for a purpose, He will accomplish it. To me this conclusion seems to be past question ; and if it be so, it puts the destiny of the sheep beyond all hazard.

If any of you have been cast down by reason of present difficulties, let these two grand texts sound their silver trumpets in your ears. If you have been looking forth from the windows, and the outlook has seemed to be exceeding dark, take courage, I pray you, from what your Lord has done ; His death and resurrection are prophetic of good things to come. You dare not think that Christ will miss the end of His death ; you dare not think that He will miss the purpose of His glory-life ; why, then, are you cast down ? His will shall be done on earth as it is in heaven, as surely as He came from heaven to earth, and has returned from earth to heaven. Wherefore comfort one another with these words of your Lord, "I lay down My life for the sheep ;" "I lay down My life, that I might take it again."

I. There are four things in the text itself which deserve your attention, for they are full of consolation to our minds troubled by the evils of these perilous times. The first is this—our Lord Jesus Christ had a people

UNDER THE WORST CIRCUMSTANCES.

When He speaks of "other sheep," it is implied that He had certain sheep at the time ; and when He says "other sheep have I which are not of this fold," it is manifest that even then the Good Shepherd had a fold. The times were grievously dark and evil, but a few true hearts clustered about the Saviour, and by His divine power were protected as in a "fold." It has been supposed that our Lord here alludes to the Jews as "this fold;" but the Jews, as such, were never Christ's fold. He could not have meant to call the Jews around Him His fold, for a little further on He exclaims, "Ye believe not, because ye are not of My sheep, as I said unto you." His fold was that little handful of disciples whom by His personal ministry He had gathered, and who stood folded, as it were, about their Good Shepherd. They might be sneered at as a little company, but He saith to His enemies who are standing outside the fold foaming with wrath, "Other sheep I have that are not of this little fold; these you cannot see, but I have them none the less for that; these I must in due time lead, and then there shall be one flock and one Shepherd."

See, then, that the Lord Jesus had a people in the worst times. Doubtless these days are exceedingly dangerous, and I have certain brethren round me who never allow me to forget it, for they play well in the minor key, and dwell most judiciously upon the necessary topic of the general declension of the Church and the growing depravity of the world. I would not stop them from their faithful warnings, although I can assure them that, with slight variations, I have heard the same tune for years. Be this as it may, it is clear that the days of our Lord Jesus Christ were emphatically terrible times. No age can be worse than that age which literally crucified the Son of God, crying, "Away with Him! Away with Him!" Whether the present days are better than those I will not determine, but they cannot be worse. The day of our Lord's first advent was the culmination and of sin; and yet the Good Shepherd had a fold among men in the midnight of history.

There was a sad lack of vital godliness in those days. A few godly ones watched for the coming of the Messiah; but they were very few, such as good old Simeon and Anna. A small remnant sighed and cried for the abounding sin of the nation; but the salt was almost gone; Israel was becoming like Sodom and Gomorrah. The choice band of mourners in Zion had not quite died out, but their number was so few that a child might write them. Speaking generally, when the Saviour came to His own, His own received Him not. As for the religious teachers, their mouth was become an open sepulchre, and the poison of asps was under their tongues; and yet the Lord had a people in Judea even then. On earth there was still a fold for sheep whom He had chosen who knew the Shepherd's voice and gathered to His call and followed Him faithfully.

It was a time when will-worship abounded. Men had given up worshipping God according to the Scriptures, and they worshipped according to their own fancies. Then you might hear the trumpet in every corner of the street, for Pharisees were distributing their alms. To eat with unwashen hands was thought to be a crime, but to devour widow's houses was a thing which to the most self-righteous Pharisee caused no qualm of conscience. The land was filled with will-worship, and that is one great and growing hindrance nowadays; but for all that Christ had a fold of His own, and in it were those who knew His voice, and these, following at His heel, were enabled to go in and out and find pasture.

It was a day when there was the most fierce opposition to the real truth of God. Our Lord Jesus could hardly open His mouth but they took up stones to stone Him The rage of men against Christ was then boiling at its greatest heat, till at last they took Him and nailed Him to the cross because they could not endure that He should live among them. And yet He had His own in those dreadful times; even then He had His chosen company for whom He laid down His life. Wherefore, beloved, I gather that though at this time there is a sad decline in vital godliness, and though will-worship sweeps over the land with its tumultuous waves, and though opposition to the pure truth of Christ is more fierce than ever; nevertheless even at this present time there is a remnant according to the election of grace. Wherefore, my brethren, in confidence possess ye your souls.

Now, it is to be noticed that this little company of Christ's people He calls a "fold." Afterward they were to be a "flock," but while His bodily presence was with them they were pre-eminently a "fold." They were few in number, all of one race, mostly in one place, and so compact that they could fitly be said to be a fold. Yet you see one thing is notable here, that when Jesus had thus shut them all in, He would not allow them to become exclusive and glide into a state of selfish satisfaction. No, He opens wide the door of the sheepfold and cries to them, "Other sheep I have." Thus He checks a tendency so common in the Church to be forgetful of those outside the fold, and to make one's own personal salvation the sum and substance of religion. I do not think it wrong to sing—

> "We are a garden wall'd around,
> Chosen, and made peculiar ground;
> A little spot, enclosed by grace
> Out of the world's wide wilderness."

On the contrary, I judge that the verse is true, and sweet, and ought to be sung; but then there are other truths besides this one. To us also the Shepherd opens the door of the enclosed garden and says, "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose" The fold is our abode, but it is not our sole sphere of action; for we are to go forth of it into all the world seeking our brethren. Seeing that our Lord has other sheep which are not of this fold, and these are to be found by Him through His faithful people, let us arouse ourselves to the holy enterprise.

> "Oh, come, let us go and find them
> In the paths of death they roam;
> At the close of the day 'twill be sweet to say,
> 'I have brought some lost one home.'"

I read of

who had to carry on a college when funds were running short. One of them complained that they had no helpers, and could not hope to succeed; but another who had more faith said to his brother, "Do you ask what we can do? Do you say that we are so few? I do not see that we are few; for we are a thousand at the least." "A thousand of us!" said the other, "how is that?" "Why," replied the first, "I am a cipher, and you are a cipher, and our brother is a cipher; so we have three noughts to begin with. Then I am sure the Lord Jesus is ONE; put Him down before the three ciphers and we have a thousand directly." Was not this bravely spoken?

What power we have when we do but set the great ONE in the front. You are nothing, brother; you are nothing, sister; I am nothing; we are all nothing when we are put together without our Lord; but, oh, if He stands in front of us then we are thousands; and again is it true on earth as in heaven, the chariots of the Lord are twenty thousand, even thousands of thousands, the Lord is among them as in the holy place. Wherefore, my friends, be ye not cast down at any time, but say unto yourselves, We are not even now come to so dark a night as once fell on this world. We are not at this painful moment in such a desperate condition as the Church of Christ was in His own day. Wherefore, my fellow-believers, be ye strong and of good courage!

II. But now, secondly, it is clear, for the text teaches it in so many words, that our Lord hath other

SHEEP NOT YET KNOWN TO US.

He says, "Other sheep I have." I want you to notice that strong expression, "Other sheep I have"—not "I shall have," but "I have other sheep." Many of these sheep were not even in the thoughts of the apostles. I do not suppose the apostles at that time even dreamed that their Lord Jesus had sheep in Rome. No, their most liberal notion was that the Hebrew nation might be converted, and the scattered of the seed of Abraham gathered together in one. Our Shepherd-King has greater thoughts than the most large-hearted of His servants. He delights to enlarge the area of our love. "Other sheep have I." You do not know them, but the Shepherd does. Unknown to ministers, unknown to the warmest-hearted Christians, there are many in the world whom Jesus claims for His own through the covenant of grace.

Who are these? Well, these "other sheep" were, first, His chosen; for He has a people whom He has chosen out of the world, and ordained unto eternal life. "Ye have not chosen Me," said He, "but I have chosen you" —there is a people upon whom His sovereignty has fixed its loving choice from before the foundation of the world. And of these elect ones He says, "I have them."

What was their state? They were a people without shepherd, without fold, without pasture, lost on the mountains, wandering in the woods, lying down to die, ready to be devoured by the wolf; yet Jesus says, "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold." They were sheep that had wandered exceeding far, even into the most shameful iniquity, and yet He says, "I have them." Bad as this world is to-day, it must have been far worse in the cruel Roman age as to open vices and unmentionable abominations; and yet these wanderers were the sheep of Christ, and in due time they were delivered from their sins, and fetched away from all the superstition and idolatry and filthiness into which they had wandered.

This is a part of our authority for going out to find the lost sheep; for we brethren have a right to go anywhere to ask after our Master's sheep. I have no business to go hunting after other people's sheep; but if they are my Master's sheep who shall stop me over hill or dale inquiring, "Have you seen my Master's sheep?" If any say, "You do intrude in this land," let the answer be, "We are which have strayed here!" "Excuse our pushing further than politeness might allow, we are in haste to find a lost sheep." This is your excuse for going into a house where you are not wanted, to try and leave your tract and speak a word for Christ; say, "I think my Master has one of His sheep here, and I am come after it." You have received a search-warrant from the King of kings, and therefore you have a right to enter and search after your Lord's stolen property. If men belonged to the devil we would not rob the enemy himself; but they do not belong to him; he neither made them nor bought them, and therefore we seize them in the King's name whenever we can lay hands on them.

I doubt not but what there are some here this morning who neither know nor love the Saviour as yet, who nevertheless belong to the Redeemer, and He will yet bring them to Himself and to His flock. Therefore it is that we preach with confidence. I do not come into this pulpit hoping that peradventure somebody will of his own free will return to Christ; that may be so or not, but my hope lies in another quarter; I hope that my Master will lay hold of some of them and say, "You are mine, and you shall be mine; I claim you for Myself." When the good Shepherd overtakes His lost sheep He has not much to say to it. According to the parable He says nothing, but He lays hold of it, lays it on His shoulders and carries it home, and that is what I want the Lord to do this morning with some of you whose will is all the other way, whose wishes and desires are all contrary to Him.

III. Our third head contains in it much delight.

OUR LORD MUST BRING

or lead those other sheep. "Them also I must bring"—read it, and it will be more accurate, "them also I must lead:" Christ must be at the head of these other sheep, and they must follow His lead—"them also I must lead, and they shall hear My voice." Those who belong to Christ secretly must be openly led to follow Him.

First, it is Christ that has to do it, even as He has done it hitherto. The text says, "Them also I must bring," and this language implies that those who have already come He has brought. All that were in the fold Christ had brought there, and all that are to be in the fold He must lead there. All of us who are saved have been saved by the mighty power of God in Christ Jesus. Is it not so? Is there any one among us that came to Jesus without Jesus first coming to him? Surely, no. Without exception we all admit that it was His love that sought us out and brought us to be the sheep of His pasture. Now, as the Lord Jesus has done this for us He must do it for others; for they will never come except He fetch them.

Furthermore, He tells us

HOW HE MUST DO IT.

He says, "They shall hear My voice." So that our Lord is going to save people still by the Gospel. I do not look for any other means of converting men beyond the simple preaching of the Gospel and the opening of men's ears to hear it—"They shall hear My voice." The old methods are to be followed to the end of the chapter. Our standing orders are, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." We are not commissioned to do anything else but continue to preach the Gospel, the selfsame Gospel which saved us and which was delivered to us at the beginning. We know of no alterations, enlargements, or amendments to the Gospel. We obey and follow one voice, not many voices. One Gospel of salvation is to be proclaimed everywhere, and no other work is in our commission.

Then it is added, "They shall hear My voice." It is promised that they shall first lend an attentive ear and then that they shall yield a willing heart to the voice of divine love, and follow Jesus where He leads. "What then," saith one; "suppose I speak in Christ's name, and they will not hear?" Do not suppose what cannot be! The Scripture says of the chosen sheep, "they shall hear My voice." The rest remain in their blindness, but the redeemed will hear and see. Do not again say, "Suppose they will not!" You must not suppose anything that is contrary to what Jesus promises when He says, "They shall hear My voice."

We have heard it said that "If Christ must have His people,

WHAT IS THE GOOD OF PREACHING?"

What would be the good of preaching if it were otherwise? Why, dear sir, this fact is one great reason why we preach. That which you suppose to be a motive for inaction is the strongest motive for energetic movement. Because the Lord has a people that must be saved we feel an imperious necessity laid upon us to join with Him in bringing this people to Himself. They must come, and we must fetch them; Christian brethren, do you not feel that you must help in compelling them to come to the wedding-feast? Is it not laid upon you that you must go after lost souls, that you must speak to them, seeing that you must have a hand in bringing these blood-bought ones to Christ by His Holy Spirit?

IV. But now, lastly,

OUR LORD GUARANTEES THE UNITY

of His Church. "Them also I must bring, and they shall hear My voice; and there shall be one fold and one shepherd." We hear a great deal about the unity of the Church, and notions upon this subject are rather wild. We are to have the Roman and the Greek and the Anglican Church all joined together in one; if they were so, the result would not be worth two-pence; but much evil would come of it. God has, I doubt not, a chosen people among all these three great corporations, but the union of such questionable organizations would be a dire omen of mischief to the world; the dark ages, and a worse Popedom than ever, would soon be upon us. The more those three quarrel with each other the better for truth and righteousness. I should like to see the Anglican Church standing at drawn daggers with the Roman, and coming into a more and more open opposition to its superstitions. I would to God that the national church would in all things be delivered from the Pope of Rome and his Antichristian enormities.

As a matter of experience this is carried out in believers. I do not care who the man is, if he is a truly spiritually-minded man he is one with all other spiritually-minded men. Those people in any visible church who have no grace are usually the greatest sticklers for every point of difference and every particle of rite and form. Nominal professors are soon at war, quickened believers follow after peace. Of course, when a man has nothing else but the outside, he fights for it tooth and nail; but a man who loves the Lord, and lives near Him, perceives the inner life in others, and has fellowship therewith; that inner life is one in and compels them to be one in heart. Set two brethren at prayer, the one a Calvinist and the other an Arminian, and they pray alike. Get a real work of the Spirit in a district and see how Baptists and Pædo-Baptists pull together. Tell out your inward experience and speak of the Spirit's work in the soul, and see how we are all moved thereby.

Here is a brother, a member of the Society of Friends, and he likes silent worship; and here is another who enjoys hearty singing; but when they get near to God they do not quarrel over this, but agree to differ; the one says, "The Lord be with you in your holy silence," and the other prays that the Lord may accept his brother's psalm. All who are one with Christ have a certain family feeling, a higher form of clannishness, and they cannot shake it off. I have found myself reading a gracious book which has drawn me near to God, and though I have known that it was written by a man with whose opinions I had little agreement, I have not therefore refused to be edified by him in points which are unquestionably revealed. No, but I have blessed the Lord that, with all his blunders, he knew so much of precious vital truth.

What Protestant can refuse to love the holy Bernard? Was there ever a more consecrated servant of God or a dearer lover of Christ than he? Yet he was most sorrowfully in bondage to the superstitions of his age and of the Romish Church. Are you not all one with him who sang—

"Jesus, the very thought of thee
With sweetness fills my breast;
But sweeter far thy face to see.
And in Thy presence rest"?

The external Church is needful, but it is not the one and indivisible Church of Christ. Jesus as the life binds His Church together, and that life flows through all the regenerate, even as the blood flows through all the veins of the body. Drop the external, and look by faith into the spiritual realm and you will see one flock and one Shepherd.

THE PRACTICAL LESSON

is, let us belong to that one flock. How are they known? Answer: they are a hearing flock—they hear the Lord and follow His lead. Be you one of those who listen to Christ's voice, and to none besides. Keep to the one Shepherd! How do you know Him? It is Jesus; in His feet and hands are nail-prints, and His side bears yet the scar. He it is who leads the one only flock. Follow Jesus and you are right. Follow Him everywhere and you are happy. The best way to promote the unity of the Church is for all the sheep to follow the Shepherd. If they all follow the Shepherd they will all keep together. Let us go forth and try and do that, and let us long for that happy day when all disputed points shall be settled by all obeying the Lord.

Compromises would only mean an agreement to disobey the Lord. Let no man yield a principle under pretence of charity; it is not charity to call falsehood truth. We must follow Jesus fully, and we shall come together. First pure then peaceable is the rule. Oh, when shall the triple banner again float over all—"One Lord, one Faith, one Baptism!" O God the Holy Ghost, forgive us our errors, and bring us to Thy truth! O God the Son, forgive us our want of holiness, and renew us in Thine own image! O God the Father, forgive us our want of love, and melt us into one family. To the one God be glory, in the one Church, forever and ever. Amen.

JOHN L. ROSTAN,

Pupil and Successor of Felix Neff.

WHEN Felix Neff, the devoted evangelist of Switzerland, laid down his work exhausted with labor, it was to John L. Rostan that he confided the continuation of the most dangerous and most laborious portion. How nobly and devotedly the trust was fulfilled many a Swiss mountaineer and many a French peasant testifies. Hundreds, now grown gray and nearing the tomb, while looking forward to a blissful immortality, thank God that He sent Rostan in their youth to teach and preach in their homes.

John Louis Rostan was born in the year 1807, at St. Marcellin, a hamlet in the commune of Vars, Upper Alps. Being gifted with a good memory, he readily learned the little that was taught in the village school. His agricultural employments kept him from many temptations, and his natural timidity tended also to preserve him from the vitiating influence of ungodly company. When he was about seventeen a great transformation took place in his disposition and habits, and the gentle and submissive child, called in derision by his comrades "the little saint," was fast becoming metamorphosed into the self-willed and opinionated young man.

In the year 1824 Felix Neff visited Vars for the first time. The simple earnestness of that devoted missionary won the young mountaineer's heart. The early seriousness reappeared, and he began, although still deeply ignorant of the way of salvation, to seek after God.

In the spring of 1825, Rostan paid a visit to an aunt living in one of the Vaudois valleys. This was misspent time for him. He gave himself up to his former frivolous pursuits. But a gracious Providence was watching over the future herald of the Cross, and in the midst of his follies, he was startled by the appearance of Felix Neff. The latter had been invited to visit these valleys, and his visit, so blessed to the Vaudois churches, made a deeper impression than ever on Rostan's soul. In an agony of mind he came to Neff, and said, "What must I do to be saved? Will prayer save me?" "No," he replied, "prayer is not the Saviour; it is only the channel of salvation." He then went on to point out, in a most affectionate strain, the way of salvation. "From that moment," says Rostan, "with a broken heart, I put my hand to the plough; but," he adds, "I put the plough before the oxen. I succeeded in cleansing the outside of the cup, and whitening the sepulchre; but all the refuse was still within."

During the winter of 1825-6, Neff established a school in the village of Dormilhouse, in the upper part of the wild valley of Freyssinières, where his labors during the summer had been abundantly blessed. Rostan was one of his first pupils. Neff said of him, "Among the best of my scholars, as regards spiritual things and secular too, is John Rostan, of Vars; he is probably destined for the ministry; such, at least, is my hope." Intercourse with the Dormilhouse Christians opened Rostan's eyes. Still, he says, "I wished to bring to the Saviour at least a little repentance, or faith or love, but I had none to bring."

Interview with Rostan, the Alpine Colporteur.

Native Christian Work in China.

The Lord did not long leave so earnest a seeker without the consolations of His presence. One day, when he seemed to have reached the furthest extreme of anguish, that mighty word of promise fastened on his mind, "The Son of man is come to save that which was lost!" "My heart opened," he says, "and the Sun of Righteousness dawned upon it, bringing faith and, with it, grace, peace, and joy. Thus the God I sought revealed Himself to me. I felt that I had passed from death unto life."

In the spring of 1827 Neff, broken in health, reluctantly left the mountains to retire to Geneva. The person he selected to carry on his work was John Rostan, who commenced to travel as a colporteur, and in this work spent three years, ever laboring to the utmost of his strength, not contenting himself with the sale of his books, but, as he tells us, "sowing with hands and mouth the incorruptible seed of the Kingdom." Wherever he had opportunity he preached and taught, sometimes in public buildings, but more frequently in the homes of the peasants (one such scene is depicted in the illustration). In 1833 he identified himself with Christian operations in the south of France, spending the hot season in journeys through the broiling plains, and in the winter returning to the inhospitable mountains to encounter the perils of an almost Arctic clime.

For a quarter of a century he continued a career of ceaseless activity, which told upon his physical frame, and his sun went down while it was yet day. But he died, as he had lived, in firm reliance on the vital truths of Christianity. His dying testimony was only in confirmation of the evidence that had been afforded by his spotless life as to the power of the blood of Christ to cleanse the heart from sin.

"You have no fear?" inquired a friend. "No." "Have you any communication that you wish to make to me?" "Live the life of Jesus: all the rest is nothing." "I have labored in the cause of Christ," he added; "I have not spared myself; I have not counted my life dear unto myself. I know that God will be the Husband of the widow and the Father of the fatherless." At one o'clock in the morning of July 25th, 1859, the sanctified spirit of J. L. Rostan returned to God who gave it.

NATIVE CHRISTIAN WORK IN CHINA.

Mr. A. Randle, a missionary laboring under the auspices of the China Inland Mission, in a letter recently received, thus describes the work carried on by a converted Chinaman, and a scene of which is shown in the illustration on this page:

"Mr. Pan, who is now one of our most successful native assistants, is forty six years of age, and is a native of the prefecture of Kiu-chau in Western Cheh-kiang. He was for some years the manager of a little party of theatrical performers, and travelled about with them, making arrangements for their public plays; but at the time he first heard the Gospel he had settled as a farmer. His interest in the truth, and subsequent conversion, were brought about in a most interesting manner.

"A Christian colporteur called at his house, and induced him to buy a book. The two men chatted together about the new doctrine, that was so strange to the one, but so real to the other, though perhaps even the latter was far from profound in his knowledge of the truth. Nevertheless, God blessed that conversation, and Pan was led to come to Kiu-chau, some forty miles from his home, to inquire more fully about what he had heard. After having learned the elementary truths of the Gospel, he was led to make a public confession of faith, and in a few simple words he stated that he had been brought to trust in Christ alone for the pardon of his sins. He was, in due time, received into fellowship, and was baptized in September, 1877, by Mr. A. W. Douthwaite, my predecessor in the work here (Kiu-chau).

"After a time, his walk and testimony being consistent, he was tested as a colporteur for a few months, and was subsequently appointed as a native helper and evangelist.

"He has now the care of more than twenty converts in two villages, Ling-ting-ling and Peh-shi-kai, which are only a mile apart, the one being in the Cheh-kiang, and the other in the Kiang-si province. The former village is his native place, but it is at the latter (Peh-shi-kai) that the converts assemble. We have rented a small room there, past which many travellers go daily, and hundreds of coolies carry their goods between the two cities of Chang-shan and Yok-shan. In this room Pan converses with any passers-by who will listen to him, and whom he induces to step in and listen to the Gospel message."

DORA BERTRAM'S LETTER.

(See Illustration.)

Judge Bertram sat alone in his private study. His decision in an important case was to be given in court the following day, and the judge was engaged in carefully revising the manuscript he intended to read, so that any point which might be obscure might be rendered lucid. A very conscientious man was Judge Bertram, who thought less of his reputation as a lawyer than of his duty to the citizens who had elected him to his honorable office, and his responsibility before God for the just and righteous conduct of his court. Like the famous Abbot Samson, Judge Bertram was not to be moved from the straight course by specious arguments of counsel nor by consideration of the wealth or influence or political power of suitors, either plaintiff or defendant. The majesty of the law must be vindicated, was his maxim, and if he believed that it had been outraged in a case brought before him, he gave judgment without fear or favor. Undoubtedly a just judge whose decisions were sound, but a judge whose severity might sometimes have been advantageously tempered with mercy. Inflexible justice without mercy characterized the court in which he held sway.

The manuscript was at length completed to his satisfaction, and the judge was turning away from his writing table, when a timid rap on the door attracted his attention. "May I come in, papa," said a low, musical voice, which had in it an accent of agitation, telling of a spirit moved by strong feeling.

"Yes, Dora," said the judge, wondering what cause could have been potent enough to brace his daughter's courage to the point at which she would venture to disturb him in his sanctum.

The door opened, and a beautiful girl of eighteen, fashionably attired, entered timidly. She looked eagerly in her father's face for indications of the humor with which her intrusion would be borne, but seeing there no sign of impatience, she stepped quickly to her father's side, and in an agitated voice said, as she placed an open letter before him, "Do read this, papa."

The letter was in a lady's hand. The tale it told was one of joy and gratitude to God. "Edward," the writer said, "has become a new man. He has not touched a card or been in a gambling house, or tasted a drop of intoxicating liquor for more than a year. He is devoted to me, and we have both joined a Christian church. Edward is prospering in business, too, and has laid aside a small sum toward repaying the loss of that dreadful time. But he is hungering for reconciliation with his father. Dearest Dora, tell me is there any hope of that. It is the one drop needed to fill our cup of happiness?"

So far the judge read, and then turned sadly away to his writing-table. Edward was his own son, his only son, the pride of his heart; he was brilliant, clever and accomplished, but years ago he had become infatuated with the gambling-table, had lost large sums, and had embezzled the money of the firm who employed him, to pay his losses. He had confessed his sin to his father, and had pleaded for mercy; but the judge would have no mercy, and would have had him in prison that day had not Edward rushed from his presence and made good his escape. Then Judge Bertram had visited the firm his son had robbed, and had sorrowfully written a cheque to cover the defalcation. He then went to his son's wife and told her all, and invited her to come to his house and make it her home. But that Alice would not accept. She waited patiently, believing her erring husband would surely write for her, and resolved that when he did so she would go to him without delay. Her confidence was justified, and since she had left to rejoin her husband the judge had heard nothing of them. It was like opening again an old wound when Dora showed him the letter.

"Do read this, papa."

"Papa, you will not refuse to forgive Edward, now he has repented and reformed. It is blessed news; let me write and say that you will forgive him."

"Certainly not, Dora," said the judge, in his sternest tone. "You have the defective sense of justice inherent in the female mind. Repentance and reformation are no atonement for a crime. I am glad for his own sake that Edward is living an honest life now; f he were not he would probably be in prison. ut his honesty now does not make good the ast."

"But, papa, Alice says he is saving money to epay that sum he took; surely that is atonement."

"No, my child, no. That is but a small part f the trouble. I have already replaced all that, nd if Edward could repay me he could not undo he wrong. He broke the law. His offence is gainst his country and against society; that an never be set right until he has taken his lace in the dock and suffered the punishment he law inflicts for his crime. No, Dora, he is n escaped criminal, and I will not forgive him. I did I should act inconsistently."

Dora turned away, disappointed. She knew gument with her father was useless, and be- de, she knew he was right in what he had said. et she could not help thinking it would have een better for all if the judge could have for- ven his son. She sat down and wrote her sis- r-in-law an encouraging letter full of love and pe, but advising that for the present no appli- tion should be made by Edward to his father r a reconciliation.

Months passed away, and a correspondence tween Dora and the exiles was kept up. Once twice she mentioned to her father that she d heard from them, and that Edward still con- ued to lead a faithful life; but the father gave sign of relenting. A severe winter was ex- ienced that year, and for the first time in his Judge Bertram was laid on a bed of sick- s. It was only a severe cold with a little in- nmation, but he deemed it wise, at his time of , to follow his physician's advice and take e of himself for a few days. But the cold s obstinate. The few days which the judge had given himself to recover stretched to weeks, and both he and Dora realized with serious misgivings that he was growing weaker daily. The physician spoke hopefully of the effect of the coming spring, but it was evident that he, too, was losing confidence.

There were times during those weeks of sickness when the judge would lie silent for hours, lost in thought. At other times he would have Dora beside him reading the newspapers or some new book. One day he asked her to read to him a chapter out of the Bible, and after that it became a custom every day for her to read the sacred book to the sick man. The judge had never been a religious man; always strictly honorable, priding himself on his unflinching integrity, but never believing in the doctrines which with some scorn he called the theology of the evangelical school. But it was evident that he was troubled by some doubts, for he asked Dora many questions as to her own belief, and she detected that he was applying to his own case before God the principles of justice which had guided him in his judicial career.

One day as Dora sat by his side reading the epistle to the Romans, which above all other portions of the Bible the judge liked best, following with his acute mind the masterly argument of the great apostle, he said: "Dora, you would like to write to Edward, would you not? you may write now. I want to see him."

The letter was quickly written and despatched. Dora wrote urgently, for Edward was in the far West, and it would take him more than a week to travel home, and his father's days were evidently numbered. The judge had calculated the time it would take to bring his son, and as he lay weak and suffering he feared he would not live to see him.

That fear was shared by Dora and the physician, who saw that the sands of life were running out fast. After an unusually bad night, Dora ventured to ask her father if he would forgive Edward when he came. "Yes, my child, yes," said the dying man. "My eyes are opened now. If I do not live to see him, tell him he has my full, free forgiveness, as I hope to be forgiven." Soon afterward the change which experienced nurses recognize as the near precursor of death passed over the sufferer's face, and he sank into a state of insensibility.

They stood around his bed watching him, Dora weeping and longing for Edward's arrival ere it was too late. There was no change in the vacant face for over an hour, but then it was lighted up suddenly. The eyes were still closed, but the dying judge spoke. "I plead guilty," he said; then, after a pause, he added, as if in answer to a question: "Nothing but the merits of Jesus, the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus, hath made me free from the law of sin and death." Then there was silence for a few minutes. Dora bent over the dying man to kiss him. She saw his lips move, and heard the words feebly uttered, "Atonement through Him — full atonement," and with those words the spirit passed away. The unblemished life, the honorable record, the unstained reputation of the just judge had been accounted worthless in that crisis; but the atonement of the Saviour of sinners had availed.

PETER BLAKE'S VOYAGE.

A SERIAL STORY BY HESBA STRETTON.

An Unconscious Hostage.

CAPTAIN NORCOTT had almost forgotten Peter Blake's presence, so absorbed was he in his painful thoughts, when suddenly the clear voice of Victor rang down from the mizzen-top-mast.

"Boat astern! Stop her!" he shouted.

In a moment both the captain and Peter were out on deck. Victor was swinging down the mast as swiftly as a monkey, and presented himself almost breathless before the captain. "There's a boat drifting, please, sir," he gasped; "only one man in her."

Captain Norcott walked up with his telescope, Victor following him closely. He ordered a boat to be lowered at once, and Fleck and Peter, with Victor at the tiller, to hasten to the rescue, while the Dolphin lay to until they could return.

It was more than half an hour before they came alongside the little boat, which, tossing as it was upon the waves, plainly made no attempt to meet them. But when they reached it at last they found a young man sitting well-nigh exhausted on the thwart and hardly able to speak to them.

"I lost one of my oars," said the young boatman, faintly, "and the boat drifted out with the tide."

"Look here, Peter!" cried Fleck, pointing to the name painted in letters of green and gold on the prow of the pleasure-boat; "what do you call that, eh?"

"The Penrose!" exclaimed Peter.

"That's my name," said the stranger, faintly; "I'm Arthur Penrose."

"Are you the son of Penrose, the ship-owner, who has a wharf and warehouse down at Wapping?" asked Peter, eagerly.

"Yes," he answered.

"Yonder's one of his ships," put in Fleck, "and we're part of the crew. The Dolphin she is, sir."

"But the Dolphin was lost at sea," said young Penrose, putting his hand to his head, and still looking about him confusedly.

"Ay, ay, sir!" cried Fleck; "yet there she is, and you'll soon be aboard of her; one of your father's own ships, sir. There's something to think about!"

He grinned as he spoke, and glanced aside at Peter, with a gesture that said plainly that the lad of twenty whom they had just rescued was a poor blockhead, with no more wits than a baby. He looked delicate and feeble, and sat shivering in the boat, until Victor stripped off his blue jacket and wrapped it about his shoulders. Victor felt as if he had rescued him from death. If he had not been at the mast-head looking keenly round about him, the chances were great that young Mr. Penrose would not have been seen by any one of the crew.

"Safe now, thank God!" murmured the young man again.

"Ay, thank God!" said Victor. Never had he felt so happy. God had chosen him to save the life of a fellow-creature, and his heart leaped with a triumphant gladness such as he had never felt before. He sprang on board the Dolphin and rushed aft to the captain, crying in an exultant voice—

"We've saved him, sir; and it's young Mr. Penrose!"

"Peter," said Fleck, as they went forward to the forecastle, while young Penrose and the captain descended to the cabin, "Peter, lad, we're all saved now."

"How?" asked Peter, shortly.

"How! Won't the skipper be bound to run into port with the young owner yonder? and then, why, man alive! which of us men'll be fool enough to sail out again in this crazy old cockleshell?"

"And how far are we from port?" asked Peter, gloomily; "haven't we run into the Middle Channel? and how's the wind blowing? Maybe I could catch a sight of land from the mast-head. Did you see the sea last night, Fleck, all ablaze? And the sky's no longer blue, but white; and what do yonder tall clouds mean? The sea's going to pay up its old debts. There are no birds about, and this morning at daybreak I saw a flock of them flying southward fast, as if they were scared. They're in port by now, I guess; but I doubt whether all of us will set foot on shore again, though young Mr. Penrose is aboard."

"Don't you say so," cried Fleck, terrified, "we'll run in for shore at wunst; ay! if there were fifty mates and captains on board. Stir up the crew, Peter; they don't need more than a word from you to stir 'em up. It's for our lives, lad, and our poor girls at home."

Peter Blake did not answer immediately. He stood shading his eyes with his hand, and gazing across the unbroken expanse of sky and sea. The water was still tranquil, but it was leaden-colored, and the sky above it looked wan and sickly. The clouds he had pointed out to Fleck stood up in tall, threatening pillars, towering behind a massive wall of dull gray. The wind had shifted since morning, and there was a low sighing in the air. Not a sail was in sight, not one of those little coasting vessels which run from port to port, and are careful not to put out in the face of a threatened storm.

"God help us!" he said, "and God help the women at home!"

"Stir up the men," urged Fleck; "it's not too late to run in, maybe. Stir up the men, and let's go to the captain at wunst."

"And be had up for mutiny!" answered Peter. "No, no; I'll wait for orders, Fleck. They'll run no risk they can help, with young Mr. Penrose on board."

It was three o'clock in the afternoon; and the sun set before five. With a heart torn with anxiety, Peter waited to hear orders given for changing the ship's course. Any breeze, with such a ship, would be fraught with danger; and there was every sign of a gale rising. Night was coming on, too; night, which multiplied every peril tenfold. And still no orders came. Could the captain know what he was about?

But Captain Norcott and his mate were having a stormy discussion in the cabin below. No one knew better than the mate what an unfortunate dilemma they were placed in by the unexpected presence of the owner's son on board the Dolphin. That they must run for port was evident; yet it was certain that every man of the crew would desert, had they a chance given to them. Then the exposure and the scandal, how was Penrose to be saved from that? The mate did not care to lay the difficulty in plain words before his employer's son; but Captain Norcott told him that the crew were on the point of mutiny, declaring the Dolphin to be unseaworthy.

"What's the matter with her?" he asked; "she's one of my father's finest ships, isn't she?"

"Some of the men say she's not the true Dolphin," replied the captain; "she was lost at sea, they say, and an older vessel has been named after her and put in her place. I can say nothing of my own knowledge about either Dolphin."

"But what do you think, captain?" asked young Penrose.

"I think she's a vamped-up, unseaworthy, infamous old cheat!" exclaimed the captain, losing for a moment his forced self-control.

"Do you mean my father knew it?" asked young Penrose, hotly.

"If it's true, he must have known it," he answered. "The old Dolphin was his own ship. Blackburn here can tell you more than I know. They'd not dare to tell me."

"It's a lie, sir!" cried young Penrose; "and you shall answer for it. Blackburn, you know my father, and there isn't a better man living. A kinder-hearted man couldn't breathe; he never denied me anything, never. No! you shall not run the Dolphin into port. I will go on with you wherever you are bound for. I shall feel no fear in one of my father's ships. And when we reach home in safety, I'll disgrace you publicly, captain; ay, if I can only do it by horse-whipping you in the streets of London."

The passion of the owner's son was so great, that it tended to calm Captain Norcott. He shook his head, sadly and silently. The mate, too, was silent; and in a minute or two young Penrose spoke again, less angrily.

"You don't know my father," he said, with a half sob, "but Blackburn knows him. What do you say about all this, Blackburn?"

"I say," he replied reluctantly, "we'd better make for port, if we can, and chance the crew deserting. He has no other son but you, Mr. Arthur, and it would be the death of him if you were lost."

"Do you mean there is real danger?" he asked, with a face of dread.

"A little, perhaps," answered the mate. "It's true the old Dolphin was lost, and they put this in its place. But if the weather keeps fair it will be right enough; and if anything happened her, it would be by accident of the sea, and nobody to blame."

"Then we'll go on," said young Penrose. "You shall not run into port for me. I'm not afraid of any ordinary peril by sea, and there can be no other in one of my father's vessels."

"Mr. Penrose," said Captain Norcott, "under God I'm master of this vessel for the present voyage; and no soul on board shall meddle with my authority. The Dolphin was meant to be cast away; she's laden for it, and she's manned for it. I'm going on deck now to run her ashore, and I shall not quit the deck for one moment till I see her safely anchored in the nearest haven. You and your father may do what you choose, and what you can. Only, please God, it may not be too late to save her!"

Both captain and mate hurried on deck, and in a moment all hands were at work. There was busy tramping about the ship; men ran aloft into the rigging cheerily, for the gloom of inaction and hopelessness was gone. A new spirit of vigor and obedience pervaded the crew, so lately on the verge of mutiny. Peter Blake worked with the energy of a man roused at last from despondency. The hope shone before him of returning to those whom he had left at home, and of restoring Victor to them. If the storm would but delay its coming, the freshening breeze would serve to waft them the more speedily to port. A ceaseless, though silent cry went up from his most inmost heart to God, that they might not perish on the sea.

But the night seemed to close in upon them more quickly than usual. A pall of thick clouds spread over the west, hiding the sun as it sank behind them The wind had quickened to a moderate breeze, and with full sail set the Dolphin was making about five knots an hour. But the captain found himself further from the coast than he thought, and both wind and tide were dead against him. If the wind continued to rise it would soon be impossible to carry all sail.

A thick darkness came on, with heavy rain. The breeze freshened until it was necessary to reef all but a few sails. But it was not a gale yet—nothing like it, the men said to one another; every one of them had been out in worse weather. Victor's voice, chanting somewhere in the darkness, fell clearly upon Peter Blake's ear through the whistling of the shrouds. He was singing his loudest to outvie the wind, a psalm that Bessie and he had often chanted together at home: "The floods have lifted up their voice, O Lord, the floods have lifted up their voice; the floods lift up their waves. The Lord on high is mightier than the voice of many waters; yea, than the mighty waves of the sea!"

"That lad chants well," said a voice close at hand; and Peter could make out in the gloom the figure of young Penrose beside him. There was no one else near, so the remark must have been made to him.

"It's my brother, sir," he answered, "and it's a bitter grief to me that he's at sea this night."

"Why?" asked young Penrose. "You don't mean to say there's any danger, with no more breeze than this."

"Not if the Dolphin was what she should be," he replied; "but she'll split up like a little match-box, as my poor mother says, if she only grazes a rock. Pray God we may keep in deep water while it's dark!"

"Do all the crew think as you do?" asked young Penrose. Peter could not see his face, but his voice was sad and faltering.

"To a man!" he answered; "every one among us. We knew there'd be little chance for us if any bad luck came. Oh, Mr. Penrose, sir, if ever you live to be a shipowner yourself, I pray God you may remember this night, and think of the poor sailors afloat, and their wives and children ashore, whose lives are in your hand! There's four belonging to me at home, and scarce a man among us that hasn't as many, or more, looking to him for bread; and here we're floating away toward death in a rotten old coffin. Think of that, sir. And God Almighty will hold your father to account for this night's work; ay! and many a night like it, when crews have been lost at sea, and all gone down to the bottom, cursing him bitterly. Think of it, sir; and may God forgive him, if he can be forgiven for such a sin."

It was past midnight when, amid the thick rain and darkness, Captain Norcott saw, or fancied he saw, the lights of some vessel riding at anchor three or four miles away. The sea had grown rougher every hour, and the heavily-laden ship had become unmanageable, and would no longer answer her helm, though much of the deck cargo had been thrown overboard. Now and then flashes of lightning playing across the horizon revealed white lines of surf, breaking along a rocky cost, or some sunken reef, toward which they were helplessly driving.

HEROD AND PETER.

S. S. Lesson for May 20, Acts 12. Golden Text, Ps. 50 : 15. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Trial the Seed of Power—Restraints on Satan's Agents—The Possession Herod could not Touch—Peter Arrested—Equanimity in Prison—Faith above Circumstance — Deliverance in the Saviour's Touch—A Lapse of Faith—The Midnight Prayer-meeting—Inconsistency of the Intercessors—Peter Preaching—Herod's Miserable End.

WHILE Barnabas and Saul were being blessed of God at Antioch, trouble was coming upon the Church at Jerusalem. "Every branch that beareth fruit, He purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit" (John 15 : 2); "Now for a season, if need be, ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations" (1 Pet. 1 : 6). It is in trial that we become more closely acquainted with God, and we can put to the proof His precious promises and tell others, not as a theory, but as the testimony of fact and experience, what a Deliverer He is.

Herod the king was the instrument stirred up by Satan; he "stretched forth his hands to vex certain of the Church." But he did not know how limited were his powers, and how completely from going beyond what God permitted. The same God who said to Sennacherib through Isaiah "I will put My hook in thy nose and My bridle in thy lips, and I will turn thee back by the way by which thou camest" (Isa. 37 : 29), put a limit also to King Herod's power. The king, it is true, "killed James the brother of John with the sword;" thus far might he go. But had not Jesus said to the seventy, "Nothing shall by any means hurt you" (Luke 10 : 19)? How then was it possible that one who was fully trusting in the Lord, should be not only hurt but killed? Thank God, to such men as can say, "To me to live is Christ," it is always equally true, "to die is gain" (Phil. 1 : 21). The sting of death is sin (1 Cor. 15 : 56) but "whosoever abideth in Him sinneth not (1 John 3 : 6) and to him death is gain. When Herod himself came to die, his body eaten of worms, his soul eternally the companion of demons, to him to die was not gain but irreparable loss. He thought to take from James all he had, but Herod could not touch the real spring of life which was in the disciple, and in the power of an endless life which God had given him.

HE WAS RESTRAINED

Herod was seeking popularity, and everything must be sacrificed to it; justice and right were nothing in his eyes, himself was the all-important one. Therefore "because he saw it pleased the Jews, he proceeded further to take Peter also. (These were the days of unleavened bread)," the anniversary of the crucifixion. But Peter knew a living risen Jesus, and although he was apprehended, put in prison, kept by four quaternions of soldiers, he knew that "all things work together for good to them that love God," and we can well believe there was joy in that prison, and that Peter's faith did not fail. What did it matter to him whether he lived or died? that was of consequence to the Lord to whom he belonged, not to himself. What was it to him whether he served God without those walls preaching or healing, or whether he served God within them by rejoicing in suffering for Jesus' sake, and by praying continually for the persecuted Church? How could he have a will about the matter? he had given himself up, and was entirely at God's disposal.

PETER IN PRISON.

Some days passed, and meanwhile "instant and earnest prayer (see margin) was made of the Church unto God for him." Some of those who prayed, laid hold of God, not all. There was no anxiety in the mind of Peter; the night before his proposed execution he "was sleeping between two soldiers, bound with two chains;" he could not move in his sleep without waking them both; but no feverish dreams made him restless or wakeful; his mind was in peace and his Lord was nearer to him than the soldiers to whom he was chained.

Oh, how independent God's children may be of circumstances! It is not circumstances which make us happy or unhappy, but the measure of our faith in God, which does or does not lift us above them. If we are fully persuaded in our own minds that the things which are happening are working together for our good, how can we be disturbed by them? Disturbance in our minds proceeds from a belief that things are wrong, and at heart we believe God has made a mistake in permitting them; or, we are not recognizing God at all; unbelief and anxiety go hand in hand.

Peter's sleep, however, was destined to be disturbed, but how blessedly, "the angel of the Lord came upon him, and a light shined in the prison; and he smote Peter on the side, and raised him up, saying, Arise up quickly. And his chains fell off from his hands." There is of Jesus, no chains can retain the hands which He sets free. The soldiers slept on, the light which shone was for Peter only. How often God is doing great things in the very presence of somebody who is completely unconscious of what is passing between the Lord and another in the very same room. It is only those who are spiritual that can discern spiritual things, the unspiritual sleep on through light and sound from God, unconscious and unawakened. "The angel said unto him, Gird thyself, and bind on thy sandals. And so he did. And he saith unto him, Cast thy garment about thee, and follow me. And he went out, and followed him; and wist not that it was true which was done by the angel; but thought he saw a vision."

How was this? Had Peter forgotten how once before when he and the rest of the apostles had been cast into prison "the angel of the Lord by night opened the prison doors, and brought them forth" (Acts 5 : 19)? How is it that Peter was so dull and his faith so small? Very probably he was looking at the death of James, and thus circumstances were blinding him, and hindering him from the full exercise of faith at the moment. It is very clear that his faith from the hands of God. "When they were past the first and the second ward, they came unto the iron gate that leadeth unto the city; which opened to them of his own accord; and they went out, and passed on through one street; and forthwith the angel departed from him."

Mechanically, almost unconsciously, Peter had obeyed and followed until now; but this was no dream, here he was at liberty, and God had done it. "When Peter was come to himself, he said, Now I know of a surety, that the Lord hath sent His angel, and hath delivered me out of the hand of Herod, and from all the expectation of the people of the Jews." It is not only Peter who is slow to recognize the hand of God and His blessed deliverances. Often we are for days in the enjoyment of some blessed intervention of God before we wake up to the fact that "Himself hath done it."

THE MIDNIGHT PRAYER-MEETING.

"And when he had considered," and this with Peter meant taking counsel with God, "he came to the house of Mary, the mother of John, whose surname was Mark; where many were gathered together praying." The dear people could not sleep while their beloved Peter was in prison, about to be executed on the morrow, so they united together to pray, but as the event shows, they had not arrived at believing he was to be set at liberty. In answer to Peter's knock, a damsel named Rhoda came to the door, and hearing Peter's voice, regardless of the danger in which he was placed, she left the door closed in her astonishment and ran in to tell the little praying company that their prayer was answered and that Peter stood before the gate. And they who had been up to this moment praying for his release, now that they heard he was free said to her, "Thou art mad." Oh, how strange that even in these early days when the Church was so much more pure than now, there could have been so much unbelief among the disciples! "When she constantly affirmed that it was even so" they suggested that Peter was dead and it was his angel. But what had they been praying for? Was it not that Peter might be saved from the fate awaiting him and delivered from the malignant tyranny and persecution of Herod?

And you, dear reader, are you more consistent than they were? How do you act when you pray? Do you count certainly on the answer, and when it comes, do you take it as a matter of course? Can you praise God for it before you have any more proof than His own word for it? He teaches us "whatsoever things ye desire that ye receive them and ye shall have them." This is the secret, "When ye pray," at the very hour, then and there believe and ye shall have. But how do we know that our requests are pleasing in the sight of God? If we are thoroughly given up to God, then the Spirit of God dictates to us only such prayers as please Him. To have any power in prayer, we must know first whether that which we pray is according to His mind, and once sure of this, there is no room for the least doubt in our prayer. In measure as we learn how to pray our whole life becomes one prayer, it becomes the instinct of our being to put all things as soon as they arise into the hands of God, and to experience His deliverances habitually as our daily portion. In measure as we do this we do know that "peace of God which passeth all understanding," we know the entering into God's rest and ceasing from our own works as He did from His (Heb 4 : 10).

All this time that the company in Mary's house were doubting, and discussing whether or not it was Peter, he was kept standing in the street, in great danger to human eyes, of being again apprehended; so inconsiderate is unbelief. At last they did open the door and to their great astonishment their prayers were answered, Peter did stand there. Without doubt there were others in Jerusalem who had prayed and claimed his deliverance, but God sent him as a special messenger to the doubting ones, that they might learn from henceforth to pray with faith. Peter "beckoning unto them with the hand to hold their peace, declared unto them how the Lord had brought him out of the prison. And he said, God shew these things unto James, and to the brethren. And he departed, and went into another place." God's hand was in all this. He sought to scatter elsewhere the light of the Church which had been kindled in Jerusalem.

THE PUNISHMENT OF HEROD.

And what about Herod the persecutor? God could use him as a vessel of wrath fitted to destruction. But the unhappy man could not persecute the children of God without bringing down judgment upon himself. He caused the poor innocent soldiers who had kept Peter to be put to death, because he would not see the hand of God in his deliverance. Herod would recognize none in earth or in heaven as greater than himself, and when the inhabitants of Tyre and Sidon, knowing the king's weak side, flattered him and imputed to him divine eloquence, saying, "It is the voice of a god and not of a man," immediately the God whom he rejected and despised smote him, and the would-be deity "was eaten of worms" and died. What a contrast to his intended victim Peter, whom God delivered from bolts and bars and quaternions of soldiers! Even on earth how much better is the lot of the persecuted, than that of the persecutor!

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Affirmation Bill was Rejected by the British House of Commons on May 3d by a majority of three votes. It was introduced to enable Mr. Bradlaugh, the infidel member of Parliament, elected by the borough of Northampton, to take his seat without taking the customary oath. In spite of the fact that Mr. Gladstone warmly supported the bill in a speech said to be the most eloquent he ever delivered in Parliament, 292 members voted against the measure. The Conservative party voted solidly against the bill, and they were aided by seven Liberals who usually support Mr. Gladstone, but voted against him on this question from conscientious motives, and by forty-five Irish members who did not care one way or the other, but saw an opportunity to express in Irish fashion their gratitude to a statesman who has served Ireland well and faithfully. The rejection of the bill is illogical, but English Christians generally approve it, as it indicates the strength of public opinion against the notorious blasphemer and his ways. The movement which keeps Mr. Bradlaugh out of the British Parliament is the same, in origin and principle, as the movement which kept Robert Ingersoll out of the gubernatorial chair of Illinois. It may be illogical, but it is eminently wholesome and salutary.

True Bills against Sheridan and Walsh and Tynan, charged with murder, were found by the Grand Jury of Dublin on May 3d. As Sheridan and Walsh are known to be in America, and Tynan is believed to be here, it has become the duty of the British Government to ask for their extradition. It is not known whether the demand will be made, as the British Foreign Secretary believes the evidence against them is not strong enough to insure their extradition. The evidence proving their complicity in the crime of murder is complete, but it cannot be shown that the crime was prompted by personal malice, and was not a political offence which latter ranks in the category of crimes for which the accused cannot be extradited. Should the demand be made it will be submitted to the State courts to decide, firstly, whether if the crime had been committed here the evidence would have been sufficient to convict; and secondly, whether the crime is covered by the extradition treaty. The case may afterward be carried to the United States Court on appeal on the second question involved, but not on the first. If the decision is against the accused in all the courts, it still remains for the President to decide whether the prisoners shall be surrendered. It is within his prerogative to refuse the surrender on questions of law and fact, but in these cases it is not probable that President Arthur would overrule the decision of the courts. It is doubtful whether, if assassins of the class of Sheridan and Walsh from a European country sought a refuge in England, the English law would admit of their being surrendered. Lord Beaconsfield said that Hartmann would not be given up to Russia.

Important Light has been Thrown on the Irish dynamite conspiracies by Professor Morton, of the Stevens Institute of Technology, who explained to a reporter of the New York Herald the probable object of using rubber bags to contain the explosive. He said he believed the conspirators' scheme was to attack the Houses of Parliament from the water side, or perhaps by exploding dynamite in one of the large sewers beneath them. Indeed, the finding of so many large rubber bags gives color to the surmise that the plan decided upon was to attempt to place the explosives where water had to be guarded against. London is a city of sewers and tunnels, there being no less than eighty-five miles of new, large sewers on either side of the river Thames. It would not be an impossible matter to tap a sewer running under a building to be destroyed at a point distant from it and toward the head. Following a rainfall rubber bags partly filled with dynamite and partly inflated with air might easily be floated under the building, the time fuse being regulated by the force of the drainage current and the distance to be travelled. Everything points to the fact that the public buildings along the Thames were to be the object of attack. The Houses of Parliament front for 900 feet on the river. Their external masonry consists of magnesian limestone, this variety of stone being selected with great care, from its well-known durability. Three one-pound cartridges of No. 1 dynamite would blow a gap in any of the walls large enough through which to drive a Broadway stage.

Two Prisoners Charged with Participating in the murder of Lord Frederic Cavendish and Mr. Burke have pleaded guilty, and were condemned to be hanged on June 2d. One of them said: "I was brought into this at first foolishly, not knowing what it was. I was forced from my work to go to the park. We had to obey the orders of the society or take the consequences. When I got in the park I could not get away. I saw the murders committed, but took no part in them. I went to the park on Kavanagh's car. He speaks the truth. So does Carey. The murders were committed by Joe Brady and Timothy Kelly and by nobody else." It is evident that the tyranny of the secret societies has been intolerable. The confessions should operate as a warning to Irishmen in America, where branches of the same societies flourish.

The Statue of Liberty Enlightening the world, intended to be placed in New York Harbor, is rapidly approaching completion in Paris. This magnificent gift to the Empire City will be the largest statue in the world, three times as large as the colossal statue of Bavaria at Munich. M. Grévy, the President of the French Republic, and several members of the Cabinet, on May 5th, inspected the statue, which is set as far as the waist. Thirty men are constantly engaged in fixing the huge copper plates which connect the separate parts of the statue.

The Triple European Alliance has been Made the subject of interrogatories in the French Senate. The Secretary of Foreign Affairs in replying, said he believed in the sincerity of the declarations of Signor Mancini, the Italian Foreign Minister, and Herr Tisza, the Hungarian Premier, that no idea of aggression against France was entertained. He believed that the alliance would not in any way change the relations of France with the Powers. France, he said, must be prudent, for a vanquished country which is regaining its strength and which is condemned to maintain a large defensive force, must not be surprised to find itself exposed to jealousies and distrust. If the formation of the triple alliance has the effect of inculcating lessons of prudence, it will do a useful work. France appears lately to be in need of such lessons.

The Czar of Russia Intends to Make His coronation memorable in the annals of the country. The information is given out from official sources that upon the occasion of the coronation the poll tax will be reduced an aggregate amount of 16,000,000 rubles (about $10,500,000) for the entire empire, and that there will be a remission of various fines, sentences and penalties. The St. Petersburg correspondent of the London Daily News writes that the ceremonies will be the grandest and most magnificent of their kind of the present century. The Russian Government is spending millions for the preparations, and the rich nobility, patricians and merchants of "Whitestoned Moscow," are vying with each other to give to His Majesty a brilliant reception. Besides the festivities in the Kremlin, the great fêtes for the people will be one of the most interesting parts of the coronation programme. The enormous Chodynski plains, where they are to come off, are now the scene of the most busy preparations. Booths, tents, barracks and all other components of a great Russian fair are being erected, with stands for the spectators and an imperial pavilion opposite to the Petroffsky Palace, from which the Czar and Court can survey the entire field and the populace at their amusements. It is believed that at least 400,000 persons will be present. Drink and food for the people will be distributed from one hundred and twenty decorated railway baggage cars, transformed into temporary bars and drawn up in one long row.

An Album as a Souvenir of the Frenchmen who died at Yorktown fighting for American independence has been sent by the citizens of Providence, R. I., to the President of the French Republic. It was presented on May 2d to President Grevy by Mr. Morton, United States Minister to France. The President was deeply touched both at the gift itself and at the manner in which it was presented, and requested Mr. Morton to convey to the citizens of Providence his kindly regards and thanks for the patriotic gift.

A Severe Earthquake in Persia Partially destroyed the city of Tabreez on May 14th. The despatch reporting the disaster states that the earthquake destroyed a great many houses, and caused the death of a large number of persons. Tabreez is the capital of the province of Azerbaijan, and is a miserably built city inclosed by a brick wall about three and a half miles in circumference. It has seven gates, and in the suburbs are fine gardens said to be thirty miles in circuit. The population numbers about 100,000, and a large trade is carried on between India, Russia, Constantinople and the Black Sea. There are several silk factories in the city.

The French Expedition to Tonquin has Produced in China a hostility to the French name, so decided that for the protection of merchants there it is deemed prudent to retain several French ironclads near Shanghai and Hong Kong; therefore only a portion of the squadron in Chinese waters will proceed to Tonquin. It is expected that Captain Kergaradec, French Envoy to Annam, will be appointed Lieutenant-Governor of Tonquin when a protectorate is established. It is stated that the French Minister to Pekin, who was ordered to return home, has been instructed to remain at Pekin until further orders.

THE loss which fell on Michigan University on April 8th, when Professor Cocker breathed his last, is one not easily repaired. As a professor, a minister and an earnest Christian, he won the love and confidence of all with whom he came in contact, and his death is to-day deeply mourned by a host of attached friends. He was enabled by God to do a great work for the cause of Christ in his State, and especially for the Methodist Episcopal Church, with which he was connected. Ten years he labored in the ministry, and fourteen years in the university, and during all that time he was growing in the respect and affection not only of Christians of his own denomination, but of the servants of Christ of other sections of the Church, and also of men in public life who admired his shrewd commonsense and practical wisdom.

The Rev. W. George, pastor of the M. E. Church of Dexter, Mich., Dr. Cocker's intimate friend, to whom we are indebted for materials for this sketch of his life, thus writes of Dr. Cocker:

"The 'boys' all looked up to him as a father, and eagerly sought the wise counsel and assistance which were never refused. His influence over them was unbounded, and to-day in every part of the country they mourn his loss, and with grateful affection cherish his memory. Nor did the students only look up to him and love him. Every citizen of the town and State, young and old, rich and poor, felt that in him they had a friend and counsellor. The roughest and rudest men and women were quelled and respectful in his presence. The secret of this influence was found not only in his varied scholarship and great aquirements, but in his uniform kindness, pure, transparent life, and noble Christian character. He was, as the University President said at his funeral, 'more than a minister or a professor. He was a vital moral force in the University.'"

Dr. Cocker was born at Almondbury, Yorkshire, England, in 1821. His parents were members of the English Wesleyan Church, in which his father was a local preacher. The young man was converted in early life, and became a local preacher at about eighteen years of age. His father had designed him for one of the learned professions, and gave him the advantages of a good English education at King James's grammar school. Having a taste for business life, he was placed in a German business house. He afterward engaged in the manufacture of woollen goods, in which occupation he remained for seven years. In 1850 he was led, through failing health, to seek a change of climate. He resolved on going to Australia, and notwithstanding the misgivings of his friends, as to the effect of a long sea voyage, he found himself, after the hardships and privations of a passage of sixteen weeks, a stronger man for the experience. He settled at Launceston, Tasmania, where he remained about a year as an agent for an English shipping house. The discovery of gold changed the current of trade, and Mr. Cocker removed to Melbourne, where he carried on a large and successful mercantile business.

VISIT TO THE SOUTH SEA ISLANDS.

The great panic of 1856, which involved nearly the whole colony in financial ruin, proved disastrous to his enterprise, and losing nearly all of his accumulations, he purchased a small vessel and went on a trading voyage to New Zealand, Tonga, Fiji and Tahiti. During that voyage he made the acquaintance of the gallant band of missionaries who were laboring to win the South Sea Islands for Christ. Among them were James Calvert, John Hunt and William Wilson. They had toiled for several years with many tokens of success. Thakombau, one of the chiefs, had been brought, through the blessing of God on their preaching, from heathenism into the glorious light of the Gospel, and many other trophies had been granted them. On several of the islands, however, idolatry still held sway, and cannibalism was practised.

During this visit Mr. Cocker had a narrow ESCAPE FROM CANNIBALS.

He accompanied his friend, William Wilson, on an excursion to one of the smaller islands of the group, where no Christian mission had yet been established. Mr. Wilson was seeking opportunity to extend the mission to that island, and the visit appears to have been for the purpose of reconnoitring the position of the enemy of souls. The two Christian soldiers soon found that their mission would be attended with danger. There was a hostile demonstration made by the natives, and the two white men, in order to escape observation, entered an idol temple, hoping that when the excitement without was allayed they would be able to effect their escape.

The hiding-place, however, was detected; the savages swarmed into the building, and Cocker and Wilson were dragged out and bound. Then commenced the wild orgies which precede the horrible feast on human flesh. The intended victims looked on while the weird dance was performed, and listened to the death song which heralded the entrance of the executioner. Death seemed very near, but the two Christians were resolved to meet it as became the followers of the Saviour. They raised their voices in prayer to God for deliverance, if that were possible; if not that by their death the cause of Christ might be advanced.

Suddenly from some cause they never understood, but which was clearly the work of Him who numbers the very hairs of His children, the attention of the savages was diverted. The intended victims saw the opportunity, and with one desperate effort they burst their bonds and ran. Though hotly pursued they succeeded in reaching their boat, and were soon pulling vigorously away from the island. William Wilson, Dr. Cocker's companion in this peril, still lives, but his missionary colleague, John Hunt, received a martyr's crown in Fiji.

Mr. Cocker's business concluded, he embarked on a ship to RETURN TO AUSTRALIA.

On this voyage Mr. Cocker had another experience of the efficacy of prayer. He often described with animation in after years a moment of supreme peril he experienced. The vessel encountered a severe storm and became unmanageable. To the horror of all on board they saw right on the course on which they were drifting a line of jagged reefs, the wind bearing the ship swiftly to her destruction. The captain and seamen were helpless; not so the Christian passenger. He knelt on the deck and besought Him who made the sea, for deliverance. To the surprise of all, even as he prayed, the wind changed, as if by miracle, and the vessel glided unharmed past the fatal rocks.

On landing in Australia he found employment as clerk in a lumber business, and remained there some time. He subsequently made an expedition to the Friendly Islands, and on his return to Australia, the ship on which he sailed suffered wreck, and Mr. Cocker and his fellow-passengers lost all they had, barely escaping with their lives.

Mr. Cocker's next voyage was to Callao, Peru. During that voyage the shock of an earthquake was experienced and caused no small alarm, but no disaster resulted to the vessel or those on board. Landing at Callao, Mr. Cocker made his way by Panama and Aspinwall to New Orleans, and thence by the Mississippi to Cairo. He then proceeded to Chicago, where he hoped to find employment, but failed. Recollecting that a minister whom he had known and befriended in Australia was settled at Adrian, Mich., he made his way thither, hoping to obtain temporary assistance. His condition on his was pitiful in the extreme. Weary, penniless, and in deep affliction, he carried in his arms the dead body of his child who had died on the way to Adrian, and was still unburied. But his friend had forgotten him. Disappointed and depressed, he hardly knew were to turn for help. But the God in whom he trusted had reserved for him an open door, and his extremity was God's opportunity. He applied for aid to a minister of his own Church, and was cordially received. He at once commenced Christian work, and after a brief interval was appointed pastor of a church in the small village of Palmyra. From thence his fame and reputation as a preacher rapidly spread, and he was called in succession to Adrian, Ypsilanti, Ann Arbor, and then again to Adrian and Ann Arbor. In 1869 he was appointed to the Central Church, Detroit, but in the same year the chair of philosophy in the University became vacant, and it was offered to Dr. Cocker, who accepted it, and resigned his pastorate.

Dr. Cocker's work

was as congenial and inspiring to him as it was beneficial and creditable to the institution. He possessed a breadth of research, an enthusiasm of truth, and a magnetism of soul, which eminently qualified him to hold and to mould the better type of students. As Professor of Moral Philosophy, he seemed to feel himself especially charged with the responsibility of maintaining and defending the verity of Divine Revelation, and the currents of thought that sweep over such institutions rendered him an important factor in the religious influence of the University. He was a firm believer in Christianity. He had for himself entertained the momentous question of its truth and necessity, and he had not only bowed to its authority, but had consecrated his life to its propagation. It was to him the one truth, in the light of which all other truth had its manifestation.

His thorough acquaintance with science and with all forms of scepticism, and his lucid and fair-minded statement of religious truth, imparted great interest to his Sunday afternoon lectures and his Bible class talks, and drew crowds to hear him. But it was not only in giving a general stability and aggressiveness to the religious forces of the University that he made himself felt. Instances of his ability to resolve the doubts of sceptical students, and to lead them into a Christian life and into the ministry, attested his spiritual power, and showed that he continued true to his divine commission.

A STRANGE PROCESS.

Dr. Cocker's literary eminence is especially remarkable, when considered in connection with his opportunities. That he received in boyhood a liberal education is admitted. The school he attended was remarkable for the thoroughness of its training; but on leaving it, he at once plunged into the engrossing struggle of business life in which few men are able to continue their purely literary education. Business is itself an education, but it is of the moral qualities rather than the intellectual. Yet when at the age of thirty-six Mr. Cocker abandoned commercial pursuits, and, at the call of God, devoted himself to the ministry, his intellect seemed to have gained in power as well as to have increased its store of learning. There are many young men fresh from college, the ordeal of graduation but recently passed, who do not possess the literary knowledge which Mr. Cocker possessed, when at the age of thirty-six, he relinquished business. It shows how firm a grip his mind had on facts and processes it had once received, and how strongly it had held and used them.

The Christian who sees in all the events of life the working of his Father's will, may profitably dwell on the events of this dead professor's life. God evidently prepared him to fill the place he afterward occupied, by a training well ted that day. As he was dressing for the meeting at night, this dark record fell out of his pocket on to the floor of his room, where his mother found it. She wrote across it, 'The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin,' and laid the paper on her son's dressing-table. That night the young man came home as dark as ever, although the evangelist minister and missionary had spoken to him and tried to lead him into the light. On entering his room, the paper attracted his attention, and he read the words written by his Christian mother. Sitting down, he took the Bible and turned to the passage in it. Then the darkness fled away like the morning mist before the rising sun. Now he is successfully preaching Christ to others, and leading many into the peace of salvation."

How Two Ladies Found Peace.—"I was in Liverpool with Mr. Moody, and one night, after he had been preaching half a dozen times in the course of a few hours, he was so tired that he could not speak. Our hotel was crowded with people anxious to converse with him, but at last we got them all away. About half past nine two ladies came to see him. I went down to the public room to see them, and told them that it was impossible for them to see Mr. Moody. 'Oh,' said one, 'my sister and I have come from a great distance, and we must be satisfied. Can you tell us how to obtain peace with Christ?' 'I cannot tell you anything more than what you know already. What you have to do is to give your heart to Christ.' 'We have done so every night for the last twenty years,' they answered. 'It is impossible,' I replied; 'that is a libel on religion.' 'I tell you, sir, that every night my sister and myself have knelt down and offered our hearts to Christ, but yet no peace has come to us.' 'Your prayers, I have no doubt, were all right, but you just laid your hearts at His feet, and when you rose from your knees you have taken them back again. Go home, and pray as usual, but this time leave your heart at the feet of Christ,' was my advice. 'Why wait till we go home, sir? Can we not do it here and now?' We three knelt down in the public room, and in prayer these ladies gave their hearts to the Lord Jesus, and left them with Him. They went away in the possession of the 'peace which is unspeakable, and full of glory.'"

A PROPOSAL TO BELIEVERS.

From the Prayer Union of Melbourne, Australia.

Bases of the Suggestion—1. The Injunction to Pray for Israel—2. Scriptural Injunction Pleasing to the Holy Spirit—3. A Blessing Assured to Watchful Christians—4. Exact Correspondence between Our Position and that of Anti-Advent Believers—5. And that of the Disciples before Pentecost—6. The Ease with which Branch Unions may be Formed—The Great Pre-requisite.

FELLOW-WATCHERS, of all nations, in all lands—if your hopes are built on the coming of Christ, will you unite with us in prayer that He may come speedily? We have only just awakened to the consciousness of a grand omission. What has hitherto been done in secret, we believe should have been done openly. We have at last "agreed together" to pray for that which, above all other things, we most desire. We celebrated the morning of the new year by meeting together for this one purpose—to intreat the Lord Jesus not to delay His coming. We had never heard of nor read of a similar gathering; but it was so scriptural, so satisfying, so divinely blessed, that while our hearts are full, our lips must speak. It may be that thousands in other parts of the world may wish to do as we have done; we therefore make an urgent appeal to all who look for a personal Saviour, to form themselves at once, without delay, and without ceremony, into prayer unions, or praying bands. We base this suggestion upon the following grounds:

SUPPLICATION FOR ISRAEL.

1. We are taught in the Old Testament to pray for the coming of Christ to reign over the House of Jacob. The Lord Jesus has pledged Himself in the most solemn and public way, never to rest, never to hold His peace till Zion shines again "as a lamp that burneth." He has, moreover, appointed the "Watchmen" and "Remembrancers," who are never to keep silence, who are to co-operate with Him in perpetual intercession until God makes "Jerusalem a praise in the earth." (Isa. 62 : 1-7.) These "watchers" and "remembrancers" are not necessarily Jews. All who "make mention of the Lord" should pray for the peace of "the city of the Great King." Supplication for Israel, therefore, being an eminently scriptural exercise, should form an integral part of every union.

WHY PRAY FOR CHRIST'S COMING?

2. We are taught both in the Old and in the New Testament to pray for the coming of Christ, to take away His waiting people. (a) The legitimacy of a prayer union for the restoration of Israel involves the legitimacy of prayer for the return of Jesus. When Jesus comes to deliver Jerusalem, it will be after He has come to take away His saints. They are to "follow Him" when He issues out of heaven "to smite the nations with a sharp sword." (Rev. 19.) They are to be "with Him" when His feet stand on the Mount of Olives. (Zech. 14.) Prayer for the second blessing comprehends prayer for the first. He cannot rebuild Zion until He has translated His Church. (b) We are not only directed to pray for the Lord's appearing in the New Testament, we are given the very words of the prayer—"Thy kingdom come." "Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus." What the whole creation "groans and travails" for, we may surely ask for. "Make haste, my Beloved, and be thou like a roe or a young hart upon the mountains of spices." (Cant. 8 : 14.) (c) The Lord Jesus Himself is "Our Hope." (1 Tim. 1 : 1.) We have no other. If He does not come, things will continue as they are, and things as they are are well nigh intolerable. "And shall not God avenge His own elect, which cry day and night unto Him? I tell you that He will avenge them speedily." (Luke 18 : 7, 8.) (d) This daily and nightly cry is not the fruit of mere sentiment or of selfishness; it is wrung out of us by necessity.

SATAN'S KINGLY SEAT.

He is the "God of this world;" he goes about as a roaring lion, as a venomous serpent, as an angel of light, revelling in seduction and slaughter. Working Christians are indeed earnestly busy. Here and there, they "save a few with fear, pulling them out of the fire," but the great majority idle their life away considering themselves instead of "considering Him," giving moments to God instead of months, and pence instead of whole burnt-offerings.

They are not all gathered in, and that is because of our culpable indolence and because of our self-will. "The harvest truly is plenteous, but the labors are few." As soon as the last effort is made, and the last of the elect is gathered, Jesus will come. Unbelief may cause us to lose countless treasures from the superabundance of grace; but no unbelief can possibly sunder the Bridegroom from the bride—"All that the Father giveth Me shall come to Me." (John 6 : 37.)

"Hallelujah! who shall part Christ's own Church from Christ's own heart?"

3. A union of this kind must be infinitely

PLEASING TO THE HOLY GHOST.

We need not dwell on the joy it will convey to the Lord Jesus Christ Himself to know that He is so sorely missed. When He says, "Arise, My love, My fair one, and come away," He adds, "Let Me hear thy voice"—the sweet voice of prayer—the "Turn, My beloved" (Cant. 2 : 13-17), for "How can I come to Thee except Thou return to me." But we must dwell on the joy which a world-wide Second Advent Prayer Union will convey to the Holy Ghost. It is now His delight both to glorify Jesus and to quicken souls; and will not Jesus be more glorified, and will not more souls be quickened after the Second Coming than before? We may, therefore, be sure of His presence if we gather together with our hearts set on this one thing—the glorious return of God's dear Son.

A PECULIAR BLESSING ASSURED.

4. There is a promise of peculiar blessing connected with the attitude into which this union must inevitably throw us. One evangelist alone records it. In Luke 17 : 7, the Saviour describes an earthly master, and his earthly method with his servant. The laborer must work in the field until meal time, and when his work in the field is done he has still to continue working in the house. He must get ready his master's supper, gird himself and serve him, before he attends to his own wants. But in Luke 12 : 37, we find something very different. It is not labor added to labor, service in the house following service in the field, attending to his lord first and then attending to himself. No! Jesus will interrupt and change this natural order—"Blessed are those servants whom the Lord when He cometh shall find watching; verily I say unto you, that He shall gird Himself, and make them to sit down to meat, and will come forth and serve them."

OUR POSITION AND ATTITUDE.

5. There is an exact correspondence between our position before the Second Coming of Christ and the position of Old Testament believers before His first coming. The hope of Christ filled their minds, and colored their whole life. He was what they longed for. Jacob cried, "I have waited for Thy salvation, O Lord!" (Gen. 49 : 18.) Hezekiah wept sore, because, he said, "I shall not see the Lord, even the Lord, in the land of the living" (Isa. 38 : 11); and of all the watchers about the time of the incarnation, from the aged Simeon to Joseph of Arimathea, Anna was the chief, and she "departed not out of the temple, but served God with fastings and prayers night and day"—prayers that ripened into thanksgiving when she saw the child Jesus. (Luke 2 : 25-38; 23 : 51.) To ask that He may come quickly, is simply to do what others have done who desired Him above everything, and to obey the prophecy, "Prayer also shall be made for Him continually." Him for whom we daily pray, we shall most surely look for, and daily praise. (Ps. 72 : 15.)

IDENTITY OF POSITION.

6. There is an exact correspondence between our position before the coming of Christ and the position of the disciples before the coming of the Holy Ghost. The promise of the Spirit was given in Luke 24 : 49, but the time of His coming was not named. The Lord Jesus said, "Not many days hence," but He did not say how many. Acts (1 : 5.) Prayer was, however, begun at once, and was continued until it was answered. Now, the promise, "Surely I come quickly," in Rev. 22 : 20, is as real a promise as that in Acts 1 : 5, so that the Church, in order to imitate the practice of the early disciples, should have continued "instant in prayer" throughout the whole of the dispensation. If this most early exercise has been so long and so sinfully neglected, ought we not, with all the intenser earnestness, to give ourselves to it now?

7. Lastly, the immediate formation of branch unions is attended with no difficulty whatever. They may exist with or without cards of membership, with or without public meetings. Minister may join with minister, brother with brother, sister with sister, friend with friend, as well as multitude with multitude. The one, the great pre-requisite is for two or three in every place to be inwardly convinced that Jesus personally present is what they want, what the Church wants, what the world wants—that the whole creation is quivering in pain beneath the "rod of her oppressor," and that there will be a daily increase of calamity, until that Blessed One comes back whose right creation is, and whose shall be the kingdom and the glory forever and ever.

Signed on behalf of the members of the Melbourne Prayer Union by five ministers of the Colony.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Government Report of the Exports and imports is published by the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics in his ninth monthly statement for the current fiscal year. He says the excess of the value of exports of merchandise was as follows: Month ended March 31st, 1883, $16,912,703; three months ended March 31st, 1883, $50,900,163; nine months ended March 31st, 1883, $105,475,632; twelve months ended March 31st, 1883, $166,284,097. The total values of the imports for the twelve months ended March 31st, 1883, were $742,442,259, and for the twelve preceding months, $700,842,874, an increase of $41,599,385. The exports for the same periods were $808,726,356, and $790,809,020, showing an increase for the year ended March 31st, last of $17,917,336.

The Selection by the Civil Service Commission of Mr. Keim as examiner-in-chief, was severely criticised by the press of both political parties, and was evidently generally unpopular. Mr. Keim had an interview with the President on Thursday, and in consequence of what passed between them, wrote the following day withdrawing his name from the contest. This result is very welcome, chiefly because the success or failure of the Civil Service Reform bill largely depends on the sincerity and earnestness and capacity of the examiner. The unequivocal expression of public opinion, in reference to Mr. Keim's appointment, proved that it would have caused a loss of confidence in the work of the Commission. On Friday the President appointed Mr. Charles Lyman, of Connecticut, as chief examiner. Mr. Lyman has been known for several years as an advocate of civil service reform, and served on the Civil Service Board appointed by General Grant. He was appointed to a clerkship in the Second Auditor's office, Treasury Department, in 1864, and was subsequently promoted to be assistant chief of the stationary division, and in 1877 was made chief clerk of the Treasurer's office, which latter position he now holds. This selection has been well received. It is a significant indication of the power of the press that Mr. Keim's appointment was promptly withdrawn in deference to its protest.

The Peace Congress to which Mr. Blaine, when Secretary of State, invited the nations of North, South, and Central America to send representatives, appears to have been favorably regarded by those nations. Mr. Blaine's New York organ states that the forthcoming annual volume of diplomatic correspondence will show that the invitation was accepted by nearly every government to which it was sent. Mexico accepted with great cordiality, declaring that "the object deserved the most sincere approbation and applause." Guatemala, Salvador and Honduras accepted at once, without reservation. Nicaragua and Costa Rica cordially approved the design, but deferred formal acceptance until they could learn definitely that the Congress would assemble. Venezuela accepted in a most enthusiastic response, believing that the labor of the congress would be beneficial to peace throughout America, and thence exert an influence upon Europe. Even in Chili, where extraordinary objections were anticipated, the Foreign Secretary replied that the laudable purpose for which the Congress was invited must meet the approval of all nations. Brazil, the only American monarchy, accepted the invitation cordially, the emperor's government declaring that Brazil was deeply interested in the movement. It will be remembered that the project was abandoned when Mr. Blaine left office, his successor believing that it would involve complications injurious to the country.

A Clause in the Extradition Treaty Recently concluded between our government and that of Belgium may be commended to the notice of certain plotters as indicative of the opinion of the President and the Senate on the subject of assassination. The treaty, after excluding from the list of extraditable crimes all political offences, has this clause: "An attempt against the life of the head of a foreign government or against that of any member of his family, when such attempt comprises the act either of murder or assassination or of poisoning, shall not be considered a political offence or an act connected with such an offence." This limitation is especially significant just now, because in extradition proceedings the result largely depends on the attitude of the President.

An Address by an Indian Boy at the Union League Club in New York last week gives the Indian idea of the policy best adapted to solve the Indian problem. "Educate the Indians so that they may take care of themselves," he said. "Don't keep them cooped up on reservations which, as everybody knows, are composed of the worst lands in the country." The speaker was one of about twenty Indian boys and girls whom Captain Pratt had brought from the Indian Training School at Carlisle, Pa., for the purpose of letting New Yorkers see what progress was being made at that school. These children represented many different tribes, and three years ago none of them could speak English. They entertained the audience with orations, recitations, songs, lessons in geography and arithmetic, and instrumental music. It was evident from the entertainment given, that the policy adopted at Carlisle is having the most beneficent effects.

Raids on the Opium-Smoking Dens of Mott Street, New York, were made last week, and four proprietors of joints were arrested. It is charged that the Chinamen have distributed candy containing opium to young girls with the object of creating an appetite for the drug. Father Barry, supported by the Roman Catholic Young Men's Association, asserts that members of his congregation living in the Chinese quarter, know of numbers of girls from twelve to sixteen years of age, children of respectable parents, who have been thus ruined, and have become opium habitues, and visit the joints every day. The police agree with Mr. Jenkins, of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, in believing that there is no truth in the candy charge, and say that the report has been started by the Irish to arouse public feeling against the Chinese. It is certain, however, that numbers of American girls and women, some of them elegantly attired, are regular visitors to the joints, and that an aristocratic establishment uptown, which is ostensibly a millinery store, is in reality an opium den, and is extensively patronized. As is usual in all inquiries into the existence of vicious resorts, the proprietors claim that they have paid the police regularly for immunity. The better class of Chinese residents of the city assembled on Friday, and formally offered the Police Commissioners their assistance in rooting out the evil.

An Extraordinary Scene in McGlory's Dancing saloon in New York was witnessed on Sunday night, May 6th. The character of the saloon is known everywhere, and a more unlikely place in which to hear prayer and praise does not exist in the city. On Sunday night, however, the workers from the Florence Night Mission, the organization of which was recently announced in these columns, obtained permission to hold a meeting there. The usual habitues of the place were present in large numbers, and observed order throughout the service. The Moody and Sankey hymns were sung, and the parable of the Prodigal Son was read and explained. At the conclusion of the service Mr. Allen induced all present to join in the Lord's prayer. Three hundred young girls were there, who probably had never offered that prayer since they were children. Another service was held last Sunday night.

The May Anniversary of the American Bible Society was held in the Bible House on May 10th. It was the sixty-seventh annual meeting of the society. The report stated that the receipts of the past year were $598,641.91, and $53,000 have been added to the trust fund, only the interest of which is available for general purposes. The disbursements amounted to $599,206.89. The report also stated that the work of translating and revising the Bible in foreign languages has been continued with success. During the year 1,273,657 copies of the Bible or parts of it, were issued from the Bible House, and 402,575 copies abroad. For the blind, 307 Bibles were printed. In sixty-seven years 42,083,816 volumes have been printed by this society. There are 311 colporteurs engaged in distributing the general supply of Bibles in the United States.

The National Temperance Society Celebrated its eighteenth anniversary on May 10th, when Dr. Theodore Cuyler preached in the Broadway Tabernacle, New York. Mr. J. N. Stearns, the energetic secretary, read an abstract of the annual report of the society. It had made rapid progress during the past year, he said, in every department of its work. Seventeen States had made constitutional amendments prohibiting the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, and the decision against the amendment in Iowa would only result in a more complete and substantial victory in the near future. The increased activity of the liquor fraternity showed that the work of the society was felt. The report of the treasurer, W. D. Porter, showed that the total receipts for the year were $60,568.32, and the total expenditures $61,649.70.

Telegraphing for Prayer.—A City Missionary stated at a recent meeting that having occasion to visit a Christian merchant a short time ago, he found him very sad. A message had come from a secluded spot among the mountains, where a sick daughter was seeking health, to say that that daughter was dying. The missionary reminded the merchant that God was omnipotent, and the healer of our diseases, and suggested that he telegraph to the daily noon meeting in Fulton Street, New York, asking the friends there to pray with him that God would stay the disease and heal the daughter. A telegram was sent, prayer was offered, and the prayer of faith saved the sick.

A Fatal Prize was Captured by a Hawk near Long Branch, N. J., last week. Some visitors, strolling on the beach, observed a large fish hawk swoop down into the waters of the bay and strike its talons into a huge plaice. The bird rose with its prey, but its weight proved too great and dragged him down. Several times the bird struggled to ascend, but failed, and, exhausted, it finally fell into the water still clinging to its captive. Its talons were so embedded in the fish that it could not release them, and it was drowned. The fish died of its wounds and both were washed ashore, where with difficulty they were separated. The death of the hawk in this effort to carry off its prize is typical of a disaster very common in life. Covetousness and avarice only too often prompt men to struggle for a great financial prize, and in the struggle they sacrifice honor, integrity, and sometimes even life, natural and eternal (1 Tim. 6 : 9, 10).

A Shower of Birds is among the Remarkable news reported from the West. The Davenport Gazette states that in the night of May 1st a singular phenomenon occurred at Independence, Iowa, during a heavy thunder-storm. Many citizens were aroused by a pelting against the windows, and supposed it to be hail ; others thought it was caused by bats. But the next morning thousands of birds were found all over the city, some dead and some alive. Wherever a door had been open the place would be full of them. It was a literal shower of birds, and how and whence came they ? One theory is that they were drawn into the vortex of a Southern cyclone and carried as far as Independence, where they were dropped. The terrified creatures in that storm appear to have neglected no refuge open to them, but in the great tempest coming on the earth, it will be found that many who boast of greater intelligence than birds, have neglected the wide and secure refuge now open before them (Isa. 4 : 5, 6).

A Saved Man was Lost in South Carolina recently in an effort to save himself. A Press Association telegram, from Columbus, reports that on May 4th a break for liberty was made by nine of the convicts working on the Georgetown and Lane's Railroad. The guards fired on them, killing one man outright. Another was shot in the river and drowned, and a third was shot and is supposed to have drowned. Of the six that escaped, two were afterward captured. One of the convicts shot was a white man named Coles, who, it is supposed, instigated the whole affair. He was serving a life sentence for murder. One of the negroes killed had been pardoned by Governor Thompson, but notice of the pardon had not been received at the convict camp, until after the escape and death of the pardoned man. If the pardoned convict had but known that his pardon had been issued, he would not have risked his life in an effort to save himself. The work of all preachers and evangelists is just that. They have to tell condemned sinners that they cannot save themselves, but that their pardon is given them freely (Rom. 8 : 1).

A Magnificent Mausoleum is being Prepared by a wealthy citizen of Connecticut to receive the remains of a beloved daughter who died in February last. The body, which was embalmed at the time, lies in a coffin heavily draped with white broadcloth in the parlor of her father's house as it did on the day of the funeral ceremonies. A marble sarcophagus is being cut to hold the coffin, and it will be supported by four marble pedestals. For the present the floor of the mausoleum, in which it is intended to place it, will be carpeted, but later in the season it will be laid with marble tiles. At the east side light will be given by three windows of glass of brilliant colors. The vault will be closed by heavy iron doors, over which will be a transom light of stained glass. The mausoleum is in the midst of a grove of pines, some of which have been cut down so that the rising and the setting sun may cast its rays into the interior. Many parents love their children so well that they also would, if they could afford it, build such costly structures to receive their remains. But those who have, as well as those who have not the means so to show their love, may well consider that a still better proof is open to them. By leading them to the Saviour during their lives they may inhabit a house not made with hands eternal in the heavens (Acts 2 : 39).

Three Years' Vicarious Imprisonment Terminated last Thursday, when Governor Blackburn issued a pardon for a man lying in a Kentucky penitentiary. It appears that in 1880 a man, named James S. Sizemore, was tried for murder, and convicted. He made no defence, and he was accordingly sentenced to six years in the penitentiary, where he has since been incarcerated. Sizemore, however, was not guilty. The crime was perpetrated by his brother, a man who had a large family, and Sizemore when arrested knew that his brother was guilty, but moved by compassion for the helpless children who would suffer by their father's arrest, he kept silence, and voluntarily suffered for him. His brother when dying recently made a declaration of his guilt, and gave such unmistakable proof of the truth of his confession that the governor issued a pardon at once when the facts were made known to him. Such a proof of fraternal love and self-sacrificing devotion has seldom been chronicled. As we read of it we are assisted in our efforts to realize the love of Him who, while we were yet enemies, actually died in our stead (Rom. 5 : 7 and 8).

The Detection of a Murderer through a dream is recalled to memory by the death of the criminal on Friday last in the State Prison at Wethersfield, Conn. He was a colored man named Randolph, and the crime of which he was guilty was that of the murder of his wife. He was a crafty man, and after he had killed the poor woman he went to her father's house, and pretending that he thought she was there, said he had come to fetch her home, as she had been away several days, and he could not get along without her any longer. A few nights afterward the father of the murdered woman had a very vivid dream in which he saw his daughter fall, slain by her husband's hand, and afterward saw him burying her. When he awoke he was so impressed with his dream that he persuaded his son to go and dig in the spot he had seen in his dream. He did so, and there found the mutilated remains of the dead woman. Randolph was arrested, tried and convicted, and was imprisoned for life. He died in prison on May 11th, having been there since September, 1856, nearly twenty-seven years. He confessed his guilt before he died. Doubtless Randolph expected by his craft to escape detection, forgetting, as sinners do, that the omniscient God sees crime, and has inexhaustible means of bringing it to light (Isa. 26 : 21).

A Six-Cent Patch which Led to a Shoemaker's fortune is an incident related in a Sing-Sing journal. It states that a gentleman at Tarrytown, who commenced life as a shoemaker, recalls an acquaintance he made in business with satisfaction and pleasure. As he was at work at his bench one day a gentleman wearing a peculiar blue cloth cloak, dropped into the shop and asked what the charge would be to put a patch on his boot. The six-cent charge was satisfactory ; the boot was removed from the foot, and the customer sat by entertaining the shoemaker during the job. He afterward called at the shop very frequently, and took pleasure in giving to the shoemaker introductions which established him in a better business and on the road to fortune. It was a trivial incident to form the foundation of a fortune, but then the customer he served was not an ordinary man. The shoemaker did not know it at the time, but he learned afterward, that he had had the honor of working for Washington Irving, and it was to Irving's friendly interest that he subsequently owed his fortune. It reminds us of the apostolic injunction respecting hospitality (Heb. 13 : 2), which is far too generally disregarded among us. We entertain the great and wealthy, but strangers and poor people do not find us obeying our Master's command (Luke 14 : 12-14).

THE MARVELLOUS MAGNET.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.*

"I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me. This he said, signifying what death he should die."—JOHN 12 : 32,33.

The Main Attractive Force—It Lay in Christ's Death—An Odious Death—Reserved for Slaves—A Disgraced Author's Name Changed—I. The Attractive Force in a Crucified Saviour—Himself to Himself—Mission Work in Greenland—The Point to Begin with—Drawing the Heathen—Men of All Sorts—A Reclaimed Knight-of-the-Garter—What the Force is—Incarnate Love—Rest Provided—The Change it Works—The Power of Suffering—II. How the Force is Exercised—Through the Holy Spirit—Nails on a Magnet—The Drawing Sometimes Gradual—Secretly—Gently but Effectually—The Norway Maelstrom—III. What is Implied—Natural Separation—Assured Welcome.

JESUS is the spokesman here. He tells of His own death by crucifixion, and of the result which will follow. It appears, then, that our Lord's power to draw all men to Himself lies mainly in His death. By being lifted up from the earth upon the cross He was made to die, and so also was He made to draw all men unto Himself. There is an attractive power about our Lord's person, and about His life, and about His teaching ; but, still, the main attractive force lies in His death upon the cross. Most certainly this is rare and strange ; for when a great religious leader dies, a large measure of his personal power is gone. The charm of the man's manner, the impressiveness of his personal conviction, the lofty tone of his daily enthusiasm—these are immense helps to a cause while they are with us ; to lose them is a fearful drawback such as makes it perilous for a religious leader to die.

Men may remember a leader's life for a time after his death ; they will do so most emphatically if he has been eminently good. We say of the righteous, "Even in their ashes live their wonted fires." From many a tomb there rises a silent voice more eloquent than the choicest speech : "He being dead yet speaketh." But there is a measure and bound to

THE INFLUENCE OF A MERE MEMORY.

How often is it the case that, after a little while, the leader having gone, the feebler folk gradually drop away, the hypocritical openly desert, the lukewarm wander, and so the cause dies out. The man's successors desert his principles, or maintain them with but little life and energy, and, therefore, what was once a hopeful effort expires like a dying taper. For a man's work to prosper it is not desirable that he should die. Is it not strange that what is so often fatal to the influence of other men is a gain to our Lord Jesus Christ ; for it is by His death that He possesses His most powerful influence over the sons of men ? Because Jesus died, He is this day the mightiest ruler of human minds, the great centre to which all hearts are being drawn.

Remember, too, that our Lord Jesus Christ died by a most shameful death. We have come to use the cross as an ornament, and by some it is regarded as an object of reverence ; but the cross, to speak very plainly, was to the ancients what the gibbet is to us—an odious instrument of death for felons—exactly that, and no more. The death of the cross was one never allotted to a Roman citizen except for certain heinous crimes. It was regarded as the death-penalty of a slave. It was not only painful, it was disgraceful and ignominious ; and to say that a man was crucified was, in our Lord's time, exactly tantamount to saying in our speech to-day that he was hanged. It means just that ; and you must accept the death of the cross with all the shame that can be connected with the gibbet and the tree of death, or else you will not understand what it meant to Jesus and His disciples. Now, surely, if a man is hanged there is an end to his influence among men.

* Preached on an evening when the regular hearers, at Mr Spurgeon's request, left their seats to be occupied by strangers.

When I was looking through all the Bible commentaries in the English language, I found one with a title-page attributing it to Dr. Coke; but on further examination I perceived that it was the commentary of Dr. Dodd, who was executed for forgery. After he had been hanged, of course the publishers could not sell a commentary under his name, and so they engaged another learned doctor to take it under his wing. The man was hanged, and therefore people would not read his book, and you are not at all surprised that it should be so. But herein is a wonderful thing. The Lord Jesus has lost no influence by having been hanged upon the tree; nay, rather it is because of that He is able to draw all men unto Himself.

Let us never be ashamed, dear friends, to preach Christ crucified—the Son of God lifted up to die among the condemned. Let those of us who teach in the Sunday-school, or preach at the street corner, or in any other manner try to set forth the Gospel, always keep a dying Christ to the front. Christ without the cross is no Christ at all. Never forget that He is the eternal God, but bind with that truth the fact that He was nailed to a Roman gibbet. It is on the tree He triumphed over Satan, and it is by the cross that He must triumph over the world. "I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto Me. This He said, signifying what death He should die."

The great truth of the text I have stated to you; let me enlarge thereon.

I. I shall try to speak first upon the attractive force which lies in a crucified Saviour. You will observe that it is briefly summed up in these words:

HIMSELF TO HIMSELF.

"I will draw all men unto Me." I dare say that you have heard the oft-recounted story of the missionaries

AMONG THE GREENLANDERS.

Our Moravian brethren, full of fire and zeal and self-denial, went right away among the ignorant folk of Greenland, as those people then were, longing to convert them. Using large prudence, they thought, "These people are so benighted that it cannot be of any use to preach Jesus Christ to them at first. They do not even know that there is a God, so let us begin by teaching them the nature of the Deity, showing them right and wrong, proving to them the need of atonement for sin, and setting before them the rewards of the righteous and the penalties of the wicked." This was judged to be most fit preparatory work. Watch for the result!

They went on for years, but had no converts. What was there in all that fine preparatory teaching that could convert anybody? Jesus was being locked out of the Greenlanders' hearts by those who wanted Him to enter. But one day one of the missionaries happened to read to a poor Greenlander the story of Jesus bleeding on the cross, and how God had sent His Son to die, "that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life;" and the Greenlander said, "Would you read me that again? What wonderful words! Did the Son of God die for us poor Greenlanders that we may live?" The missionary answered that it was even so; and, clapping his hands, the simple native cried, "Why did you not tell us that before?"

Ah, just so! Why not tell them this at once, and leave it to clear its own path? That is the point to begin with. Let us start with the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world. "God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life." To my mind that is the point to begin with and the point to go on with; yes, that is the truth to conclude with, if there can ever be any conclusion to the grand old story of the incarnate God who loved His enemies, and gave Himself to die in their stead, that they might live through Him.

The text says that Jesus Christ will draw all men unto Himself. Now, all men who hear of Jesus Christ at all are drawn, but they do not all yield. Some of them pull back, and the most awful thing that ever happens to a man is when he pulls back till Jesus lets him go. What a fall is that, when the drawing power is taken away, and the man falls backward into a destruction which he himself has chosen, having refused eternal life, and resisted the Saviour's power! I suppose that all of you have felt a measure of that drawing. Why, it is not merely those that hear the Gospel, but whole nations have been drawn, in other respects, by the all-pervading influence of Jesus and His love. At this instant the influence of Christianity is being felt in every corner of the earth to an extent which it is not easy to exaggerate. If I had an orator's power, I would picture my Saviour casting golden chains of love over all nations, wherever the missionary goes preaching His name.

The Lord is taming the nations as a man by degrees subdues wild beasts. Jesus is gradually to Himself. He has had a long tug at India. That dead weight still lies in the furrow. But it must come; it must yield. All those that watch it see that if there is any cause that does make progress in India it is the cause of Christ. The East appears never to move, but if there be any move it is Christward. Jesus is drawing China slowly. Japan is being drawn as in a net. Where the testimony of Christ has been borne the idols begin to shake, and their priests confess that a change is coming. Every century sees a marked advance in the world's condition; and we shall progress at a quicker rate yet when the Church wakes up to a sense of her responsibility, and the Holy Spirit is poured out upon the Church to turn us all into missionaries, causing us all in some way or other to preach the Gospel of Christ. Jesus is drawing, drawing, drawing.

But all men are not saved. No, for when drawn they do not come. Yet Christ crucified is drawing some to eternal life. When Jesus died on the cross it was not for my lord and lady only; nor was it for the workingman alone; it was for all sorts of people.

> "While grace is offered to the prince,
> The poor may take their share.
> No mortal has a just pretence
> To perish in despair."

He that is best taught and instructed has often been drawn to Jesus by the Lord's overpowering charms. Some of the most learned of men have been delighted to come to Christ. But the most illiterate and rude have equally been drawn by Jesus, and it has been their joy to come. I love to hear of the Gospel being preached to the poorest of the poor; and so preached that it reaches those who never were reached by it before. God speed every effort by which Jesus is set before the fallen and degraded; so long as it is the Gospel, and not mere rant, we wish God-speed to the most irregular of witnesses: our fears begin only when Jesus is no longer in the van.

We greatly need to have the Gospel preached in the West of London, and so preached that our great ones may receive it, and find life through Jesus Christ. May such a movement soon take place. How I should like to hear of a converted duke telling out the Gospel, or a reclaimed knight-of-the-garter proclaiming mercy for the chief of sinners! Why not? And, blessed be God, the Saviour, lifted up, draws all sorts of men to Himself—some of every kind; not the Jew alone, as at the first, but the Gentile too.

> "None are excluded hence but those > Who do themselves exclude.
> Welcome the learned and polite,
> The ignorant and rude."

There is no exclusion of any class or creature from the mercy of God in Christ Jesus. "I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto Me;" and the history of the Church proves how true this is; the muster-roll of the converted includes princes and paupers, peers and potmen.

But

that attracts men to the crucified Saviour? They do come; there is no doubt about it. Look ye, sirs; there is nothing in the world that men will hear so gladly as the Gospel. How many years have I stood in this place to preach to a congregation precisely similar to the present! The crowds have been here as regularly as the hours, Sunday after Sunday, morning and evening, year after year. Suppose that I had been appointed to preach upon a scientific subject; could I have gained or held such audiences? I should have been spun out a long while ago if I had been bound to draw upon myself for my matter. If I had preached any other than the doctrine of Christ crucified, I should years ago have scattered my audience to the winds of heaven. But the old theme is aways new, always fresh, always attractive. Preach Jesus Christ. That is the recipe for catching men's ears and laying hold upon men's hearts. Whence this universal attractiveness?

Well, first, it is

for Jesus Christ is incarnate love. In Him you see one who divested Himself of all His glory, that He might save the guilty—who came down upon earth, not seeking wealth and fame, but simply seeking to do good by saving men—who, having laid aside His honor and His glory, at last laid aside His life, and all for love; for love which met a sad return; for love which has, however, saved its objects with a great salvation. One of the school-men says that, whenever we know that another person loves us, we cannot help giving back a measure of love in return; and I believe that the statement is true. If I were asked the secret of the attractive power of the crucified Saviour, I should answer that it is invincible love.

No doubt there is also this about the crucified Saviour—that He draws men by the wonderful rest which His death provides for men. The most earnest Christian man must sometimes have his doubts as to whether all is right with him. The more sincere a man is the more does he tremble lest he should deceive himself. You, good brother, have your personal anxieties; certainly I have mine. But when I turn my eyes to Jesus upon the cross, and view the thorn-crown, and the sacred head, and the eyes that were red with weeping, and the hands nailed fast to the wood, and the feet dripping with gore; and when I remember that this shameful death was endured for love of me, I am so quiet and so happy in my spirit that I cannot tell how peacefully my life-floods flow. God must forgive my grievous fault, for my Redeemer has so grievously answered for it.

Has not your soul come to an absolutely perfect rest when it has gotten to Christ? When He Himself has drawn you to Himself, have you not entered into rest? Because men perceive that such a rest is to be had, therefore they come to Christ. He Himself uses this as an argument why they should come; remember His cheering words, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

Then I am sure that there is a great attraction about Christ, when we see the change which He works in men. Have you known a drunkard become a Christian, or a thief become upright? Have you seen a harlot made chaste? Have you marked any of the modern miracles which are always going on around us in the form of conversions? If you have taken pleasure in these signs and wonders, I know that you have said, "Lord, I, too, will come to Thee to be converted." The sight of His power to elevate and sanctify has attracted you to Jesus.

I could continue thus to show what this attractive force is; but, lest I should weary you, I will only say that it lies much in His sufferings themselves. Is it not a strange thing that suffering attracts? Yea, more; lowly suffering conquers;

she sitteth as a queen upon her throne, and reigneth by the royalty of her resignation. Are any of you unconverted, and do you wish to be converted? I cannot suggest a better exercise than to read over the story of the death of Christ, as it is told by the four Evangelists. When you have read it once, read it again; and as you read it, say, "Lord, I must have a sadly hard heart, or else this would move me to tears. I pray Thee, change my heart." Then read the story again; for sure at last it will touch you. God the Holy Spirit blessing you, it will move you, and you will be among the "all men" that shall be drawn to Jesus by His own personal force. So much, then, about what this force is.

II. Very briefly, my second head is to be—

HOW THE FORCE IS EXERCISED?

This force is exercised through the Holy Spirit. It is the Spirit of God who puts power into the truth about Christ; and then men feel that truth, and come to Christ and live. But our blessed Lord and Master uses instruments. The force of Christ's love is sometimes shown to men by those who already love Him. One Christian makes many. One believer leads others to faith. To come back to my metaphor of a magnet; you have sometimes seen a battery attached to a coil; and then, if you take a nail and put it on the coil, the nail has become a strong magnet. You notice that for you take another nail, and you put it on the end of it and it holds the second nail fast. Now number two is turned into a magnet. Try it. Put a third nail upon it. See, it is held fast! Number three has become a magnet. Try the next nail; it holds on to it like grim death; and now number four has become a magnet. Bring another nail within the influence. Number five has become a magnet. And so it continues. On and on and on the magnetism goes, from one nail to another.

But now just go to your battery, and detach one of your wires, and the nails drop off directly, for the coil has ceased to be a magnet, and the nails have ceased to be magnets too. All the magnetism comes from the first place from which it started, and when it ceases at the fountain-head there is an end of it altogether. Indeed, Jesus Christ is the great attractive magnet, and all must begin and end with Him. When Jesus lays hold upon us we get hold of a brother, and ere long He turns into a magnet also; thus from one to another the mystic influence proceeds; but the whole of the force abides in Jesus. More and more the kingdom grows, "ever mighty to prevail;" but all the growing and the prevailing come out of Him. So it is that Jesus works—first by Himself, and then by all who are in Him. May the Lord make us all magnets for Himself. Jesus says, "I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto Me;" but He leaves room in His figure for the co-working of all grateful hearts.

Jesus draws men gradually. Some are brought to Christ in a moment; but many are DRAWN BY SLOW DEGREES.

The sun in some parts of the world rises above the horizon in a single instant; but in our own country, at this season of the year, it is beautiful to watch the dawn, from the first gray light to the actual break of day. Is it dark, or is it light? Well, it is not quite dark; it is darkness visible. By-and-by there is light. No sun is up as yet, but yet the light increases till the East begins to glow, and the West reflects the radiance; then, by-and-by, up rises the great king of day. So does the Lord bring many to Himself by gentle degrees. Do not say, "I am not converted, for I do not know the moment of the great change." I knew an old lady once who did not know her birthday; but I never told her that she was not born because of that, for there she was. And if you do not know when you were made a Christian, yet, if you are a Christian, it little matters how. If you are really born of God, the date of your new birth is interesting to curiosity but not important to piety. Salvation is often accomplished by a lengthened process.

Moreover, the cords of our Lord's drawings are very secret. By a secret power does Jesus draw home the strangers and the foreigners whom His grace has chosen; they say to one another, "Come, and let us go up to the house of the Lord; let us seek the face of the Saviour." The mystic attractions of the power of Christ are secretly drawing many who knew Him not; and now they ask their way to Zion with their faces thitherward. Look how the sun draws along the planets. He hastens on in his mighty career in space—I know not whither, but drawing with him all the worlds which compose the solar system; all these silently attend his majestic marches. Such is Christ, the great central sun; all His people follow, for He draws.

Fail not to observe how gently He does it! But, oh, how effectually! I thought, as I mused upon my text, that I saw a great whirlpool like the maelstrom in the north of Norway. I thought I saw an enormous whirlpool so huge that all the souls of men, like ships of diverse forms, were being drawn toward it. With strained sight I gazed upon this monstrous death! Woe to those who are sucked in by that dreadful whirlpool, for there is no escape; the abyss has no bottom, destruction is sure to all who are caught in the tremendous down-rush! Even ships far out at sea on other tacks, though they escape this maelstrom, are hindered in their course by it; for this one monstrous devourer labors to absorb all, and leaves no bay, nor harbor, nor foreign main unaffected by its perpetual draught.

As I was thinking of this giant evil, and wondering how I could navigate my own bark so as to avoid this mouth of hell, I saw a hand that had the mark of a nail upon its palm, and lo, it held a mighty magnet which attracted every vessel with a force greater than any born of sea or storm. This magnet attracted many ships so that they flew to it at once, and were gently drawn toward their desired haven in the very teeth of the maelstrom. I saw other vessels in which the mariners hoisted sail to try to escape the influence of this magnet, and even put out their oars to strive to get away; and some of them did so escape. Alas, they floated farther and farther into the maelstrom's destructive power, to be sucked down to their perdition. These were so besotted that they labored against mercy, and resolved to be destroyed; we are glad that all are not left to act so madly.

III. I shall conclude by drawing one or two lessons. Then I have done.

WHAT DOES ALL THIS IMPLY?

"I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto Me." Well, it means this first—that men, by nature, are a long way off from Christ. You were not born converted. Of that I am sure. Nor were you born a Christian either; and, though they took you to the font, and said that they made you a "member of Christ, a child of God, and an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven," there was not a word of truth in it, for you were such a child of God that you loved sin, and such a member of Christ that you knew nothing of Him, and such an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven that, unless God saves you, you will never get there. I may say of Christians who are made in that way, "Eyes have they, but they see not; mouths have they, but they speak not, neither speak they through their throats;" and I fear that I must add, "They that make them are like unto them; so is every one that trusteth in them." It is a poor Christianity that is created by such monstrous folly. "Ye must be born again," and ye must be born again of the Spirit of God, or ye cannot enter the kingdom of heaven. Man is a long way off from Christ, and Christ must draw Him. Friend, ask Him to draw you.

I gather another lesson—that men will not come to Christ unless He draws them. Sometimes, when I am trying to prepare a sermon to preach, I say to myself, "Why must I take all this trouble?" If men were in their senses they would run to Christ without calling. Why must we put this business so temptingly? Why must we plead? Why must we be so earnest? Because men do not want to come, not even to their own Saviour. They do not wish to have their sins forgiven. They do not wish to be renewed in heart; and they never will come—no, not one mother's son of them—unless He that sent Christ to them shall draw them to Christ. A work of grace in the heart is absolutely necessary before the sacrifice of the Lord Jesus will be accepted by any one of us. Jesus said, "Ye will not come to Me that ye might have life." What our Lord said is true to this hour; man has not improved an atom.

But, then, learn another lesson. If there is any man here that Christ is drawing, he need not say, "May I come?" Of course you may, if you feel drawn to come. Are you coming? Come, and welcome. Christ never yet turned away a soul that came to Him—not one. "Him that cometh to Me, I will in no wise cast out." If He is drawing you, run, for you have scriptural warrant for so doing.

trust Christ, and you are saved. Rely wholly upon what Christ is, and what He has done; and you are saved. In that very act there is a change effected within you which will show itself forever in your character; for he that believes in Jesus Christ, the Son of God, is born again. The faith which looks to Jesus and the life which lives upon Jesus come together. I cannot tell you which is first—the new birth, or faith. Can you tell me which spoke of a wheel moves first? No. And these are spokes of one and the same wheel. "He that believeth in Him hath everlasting life." Oh, believe Him. Trust Him. Lay hold upon Him. Accept Him, and go your way; and the mountains and the hills shall break forth before you into singing, and all the trees of the field shall clap their hands. Amen. So let it be!

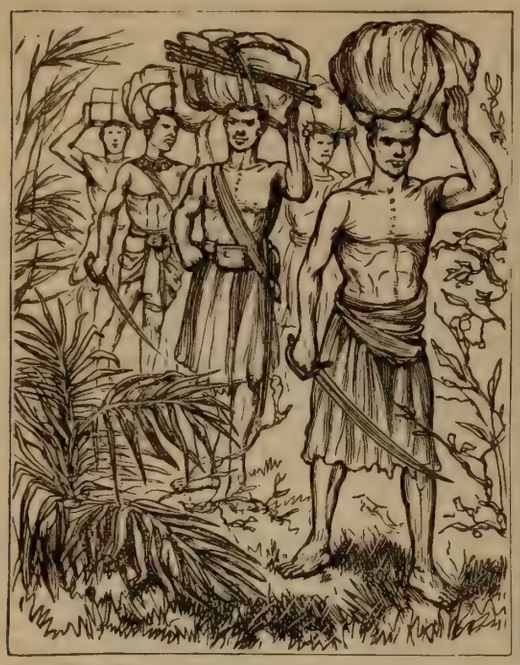
T. L. JOHNSON,

Colored Missionary in Africa.

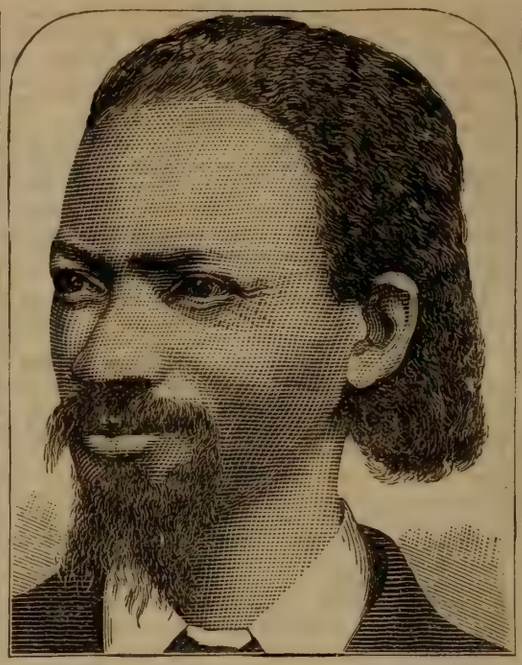
MR. JOHNSON, whose portrait appears on page 316, who has been enabled to labor successfully among the benighted members of his race in Africa, was born in Virginia in 1836. Until the close of the Civil War he lived in slavery, but he attended the revival services which in 1857 not only in Virginia but throughout the Union were so wonderfully blessed. Johnson was converted, and when the war was over he engaged in Christian work among his own people.

He felt deeply the need of some educational training to fit him for the duties of the ministry, on which his heart was set. From his former owner, Mr. Brent, and his family, he had heard of Mr. Spurgeon, the English preacher, and of his college. When he was free his thoughts reverted to the subject, and as soon as he could save sufficient money to defray the cost of a passage across the Atlantic, he embarked for England. He was cordially received by Mr. Spurgeon, and at once commenced a course of study preparatory to his entering on the labors of a missionary in Africa.

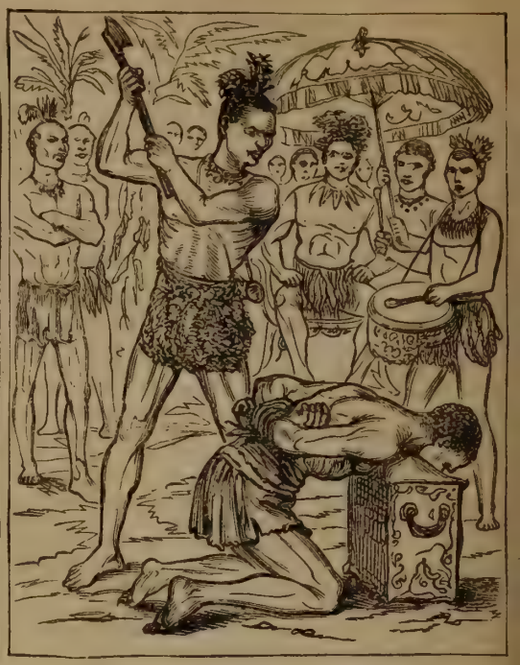
In a pamphlet recently published, Mr. Johnson thus describes his experience: "It is impossible to tell how much benefit I derived by going to the Pastors' College, for which I shall ever feel grateful. I regard this as being a turning point in my history. Much as I have loved Africa, and been desirous of serving her for Christ's sake, I am quite sure that I never could have labored efficiently in this work, had it not been for the advantages experienced in that institution.



Travelling in an African Wilderness.



T. L. Johnson, the African Missionary.



Human Sacrifices in Dahomey.

ON OUR WAY TO AFRICA.

"We went under the auspices of the Baptist Missionary Society. On November 6th, 1878, my wife and I bade farewell to the dear, kind friends in London. On the afternoon of November 9th we sailed from Liverpool on the steamer Kinsembo, and on the evening of November 22d we came in sight of Cape Verd, on the west coast of Africa. As soon as I caught sight of the peak, nearly thirty miles off, I went into my cabin for my telescope. For years my prayer had been that I might see Africa, the land of my fathers, and now my prayer was answered.

ASHANTEE.

"In travelling on the west coast of Africa, you often hear of Ashantee, a very powerful kingdom. The Ashantees are said to be most numerous, warlike, and powerful. Information given by Bowdich, Dupuis, and others shows how these travellers were impressed with the display of gold in remarkable profusion which had been found in Ashantee, and had been worked into ornamental devices years ago. They found the attendants of the king laden with ornaments of gold. Everywhere there were signs of wealth. The common articles for daily use were made of gold. The travellers, however, describe not only the gold they saw, but the customs of the people which were horrible and repulsive. The people were still barbarians, and kept up the practice of

OFFERING HUMAN SACRIFICES.

These travellers saw at the king's palace the royal executioner, with his hatchet on his breast, and the fatal blood-stained stool before him, (see illustration), ready, at the sound of the death-drum, to do his fearful work. They heard that the king had recently murdered, over his mother's grave, three hundred victims. On the death of a royal person, many hundred people are still massacred. In late years, through the influence of missionaries and the authorities at Cape Coast Castle, there has not been so much of this wholesale slaughtering of human lives, yet many, it is to be feared, are yet murdered.

TRAVELLING IN THE INTERIOR.

"The best roads in the interior of Africa are mere foot-paths through the forest, from town to town, on which the natives walk single file, a few yards from each other, each man with his load on his head and his cutlass in his hand or at his side, to defend himself against any beast or serpent that may be in the path. (See illustration on this page.) This was the way we started out of Victoria when we commenced our long journey of eighty miles through the wilderness to Bakundu, the station assigned us for missionary operations."

Mr. Johnson's work in Africa being interrupted by the death of his wife and his own ill-health, he was advised to make a journey to England. He did so, and in 1880 he returned to that country. Later in that year he paid a visit to America, and commenced a preaching and lecturing tour, with the object of raising funds for the Baptist Missionary Society, under the auspices of which he labored in Africa.

THE VICTIMS OF THE RUMSHOP.

From Mr. Moody's Last Address in Liverpool.

IT may be that there is a poor wretch who has come in here to-night discouraged and disheartened and with his clothes in rags. He is there up in the gallery behind a post to-night. He is looking down upon the people, and sees a good many of the people looking happy. He says to himself, "My home is dark and wretched, and I have made it so." Ten years ago he led a young lady to the altar and swore he would love and protect her. But now for some years past he has turned out to be a confirmed drunkard, and instead of being a comfort to her he has become a curse. Many a day she has borne upon her body marks of his cruel blows. Her children are in rags, and the publican has got the wages he ought to have given to her. The little children are trying to earn something by selling newspapers in the streets, and he will perhaps go and take their money and spend it in strong drink.

Perhaps he is now saying, "I will not go down to a drunkard's grave. I will become a child of God." He goes straight home. His wife says, "John, I hope you have not been to the public-house to-night." He says, "No, Mary, I have been at the circus to-night, and do you know I have heard something I have never heard before." He may have heard it, but it never came home to him until to-night. "I have heard that American say, that I, a poor drunkard, can become changed, that God can turn me against strong drink, that I can become not only a temperate man but a Christian, and,

MARY, CAN YOU PRAY?

I wish you to pray for me. Before you pray I want you to read the third chapter of John." Mary, who is hardly able to credit what she sees and hears, takes down the Bible and reads.

I can imagine the poor drunkard saying, "Wife, did you ever hear anything so sweet as that? God is not going to condemn me. He has given Jesus to save me. He is going to lift me up. Mary, won't you pray for me?" I can see the poor drunkard's wife getting down upon her knees. It is not an eloquent prayer she makes. But it needs not eloquent prayers to bring down the power of God and bring down heaven's blessing. Her cry is, "God save us as a family. God have mercy upon my husband; and, O God, break the fetters that are binding him to sin."

The next morning the man gets up early and goes off to his business or to find work. At the close of the week he brings her home his week's wages.

A GREAT CHANGE

then takes place in the home. His little children are bright and happy. They are pleased with their father. They have now got as good and as kind a father as any child. Three months after, the home that was once so dark and wretched is now a little Bethel upon earth. His children rush to meet him as he comes home, they no longer hide themselves from terror of him. If you were in his home you would hear of an evening no longer the song of the drunkard, but the songs of Zion. You would hear them singing, "Rock of Ages," "Just as I am." What a change! Thank God, that is taking place all over England. Homes are being changed, drunkards are being saved, harlots are being reclaimed. Oh, let it be our prayer to-night that the Christians may take the glad tidings of salvation into the courts and alleys of Liverpool, and tell these men that they can be saved. The devil has blinded them long enough. Let us tell the man that has lost all hope, that the Son of God can save him.

LOTTIE NELSON'S MENTORS.

A DULL, awkward girl was Lottie Nelson, without proper spirit, or proper pride, or proper regard for the proprieties of life. It must have been so, for Mrs. Lonsdale, Lottie's eldest sister, made that statement often. And Mrs. Lonsdale was an accepted authority in the best circles of the great city in which she lived. Mrs. Lonsdale could introduce her protegés into the most exclusive society, and the fact that a young lady was approved by Mrs. Lonsdale was sufficient to procure for her invitations to balls and parties, and to insure her a cordial welcome in houses at which a passport of some kind was needed.

But she could not conscientiously give Lottie Nelson a passport, much as she would have liked to do so. Lottie would have disgraced her, would have caused her judgment to be derided. Mrs. Lonsdale was in despair. Lottie was eighteen, and knowing well that in the quiet New England village where she lived she was little likely to marry well—that is to marry a wealthy and aristocratic suitor—she had written to her mother, a woman as ambitious as herself, urging that Lottie be sent to her at once, and promising to "form her" and introduce her to fashionable society. Lottie was accordingly sent, but somehow she had not been "formed."

"I can do nothing for you, Lottie," she said one day after her discipline had been in operation nearly two months. "You are a hopeless case, I believe. You do not even dress as other girls do. You just hang your clothes on any way, as if you did not care how they look. I have given you dresses that are fashionable, but when you put them on they look as if they were on a lay figure—as if they did not belong to you. And last night when we had invited young Gould on purpose to meet you, you had scarcely a word to say, and left him to talk to the curate about Sunday-schools and the sick poor. You will never secure an eligible husband in that way."

"But I don't want an eligible husband, Clara, and I was much more interested in Mr. Watkins's description of his missions than I ever could be in Mr. Gould's account of the amateur theatricals."

Lottie Nelson Receives an Invitation.

"I am surprised at you, Lottie," said her sister; I can scarcely believe you are my sister. Do you suppose I should ever have married Mr. Lonsdale or have occupied the position in society I do if I had acted as you are doing? You have a far better opportunity of getting on than I ever had. I had no sister to introduce me, and yet you do not care to make the slightest effort to improve it. You will never do as well as I, unless you change your ways."

"Indeed, Clara, I do not wish to do as you have done. You do not seem to me at all a woman to be envied. You are constantly striving after things that do not seem to me worth struggling after, and you are elated and depressed by occurrences that I should think very trivial—not worth a thought. I would rather be of some use in the world."

Lottie's outburst astounded her sister, who had never doubted for a moment that the young village girl regarded her as the very highest ideal of a successful and happy lady. She supposed that Lottie admired and envied her, and was only prevented following her example by sheer incapacity. That Lottie did not admire her, or her life, or her position, argued a degree of stupidity almost incredible in its density. "I have no patience with you, Lottie," she said at last, "you had better become a hospital nurse at once. I believe that would be nearer your idea of a happy life."

"It would, indeed," said Lottie, "and I think it would be a much better life than that you and your friends are living. I do not believe you are really happy after all, and I am sure you are doing no good."

"We do not need a simple school girl's criticism and advice at any rate," said Mrs. Lonsdale, sweeping out of the room in which the conversation had been held, indignant at the assurance this girl, so much her inferior in all that makes a woman charming, had shown in sitting in judgment upon her. Mrs. Lonsdale did not like to admit herself defeated, but it seemed very much as if she who had succeeded in so many contests requiring tact and skill, and in which she had contended with women of the world, adepts in all its arts, would be foiled in her efforts to improve her own sister. It was very annoying and vexatious, and it must not be if she could help it. Lottie must be humored, it was evident, rather than lectured, and she must be lured gently into the stream of fashionable life. So Mrs. Lonesdale decided and arranged in her mind a course of action suited to her plan. She could not take Lottie to the homes of her most fashionable acquaintances, but she could take her to the theatre and to a few of the places where her shyness and awkwardness would not be so conspicuous, and so she might be gradually initiated into the ways of good society.

Later in the same day Mrs. Lonsdale was surprised by the information that Mrs. Hardy had called to see her. The Hardies were known to her, but they were not in her, set and there had never been any visiting between them. They were wealthy and of good family, well educated and very much respected by good people, but very eccentric. But wealth has claims on the homage even of the people of Mrs. Lonsdale's class, unless it is allied with vulgarity, which it certainly was not in Mrs. Hardy's case, and so Mrs. Lonsdale received her visitor with the outward deference due from one who knows the ways of the world.

"I came to speak to you," said Mrs. Hardy, "about your sister. We should be so glad if you would bring her to call upon us. Mr. Watkins, the curate of St. George's, has told us how very interesting she is." Mrs. Hardy did not add, as she might have done, that Mr. Watkins had told her that he feared a precious soul was in danger of being led into temptation by a worldly woman, and urged her to make an effort for the poor girl's rescue.

Mrs. Lonsdale knowing nothing of this, promptly sent for Lottie, rightly conjecturing that there might be some affinity between her sister and this wealthy lady; who herself dressed in a style long discarded by fashionable society. Lottie soon appeared; looking, as her sister thought, more dull and sheepish than usual. Mrs. Hardy, however, did not appear repelled by Lottie's uninteresting appearance, nor even to notice her loose shaggy hair and ungraceful style of dress, but greeted her with kind cordiality. Lottie, who had been accustomed to the thinly-disguised contempt of her sister's visitors, and to that display of superiority which wounded her sensitive nerves and rendered her more conscious and ill at ease than she generally was, was pleasantly surprised by the manner of this new acquaintance, and was at once drawn toward her by a grateful acknowledgment of sympathy.

It was quickly settled that Lottie should accept Mrs. Hardy's invitation, and then Mrs. Hardy, by a few simple questions, drew from the girl an account of what she did in her village home. The class she taught in the village school, the cottages of the poor, the little efforts she had made to brighten cheerless homes, and the sufferings of certain favorite humble friends, were all described with a brightness and interest that astonished Mrs. Lonsdale, who had never seen her sister so animated before. Finally Mrs. Hardy carried Lottie off with her on a round of visits she was then making, and Mrs. Lonsdale returned to her own room, wondering at the odd fancies some people had, and their strange notions of what constitutes pleasure.

The acquaintance with the Hardies ripened, and many an evening when Mrs. Lonsdale was shining resplendent with lace and jewels, the queen of some aristocratic assemblage, Lottie was in the Hardy mansion discussing with Mrs. Hardy and her daughters the weighty matters connected with the cutting out and manufacture of certain homely garments destined to make glad the heart of some poor distressed Christian. Mrs. Lonsdale never succeeded in "forming" her sister Lottie, but the attempt was made, and very successfully, by Mrs. Hardy's eldest son, who found Lottie not so uninteresting nor so dull as Mrs. Lonsdale considered her, but declares that she is the best wife a clergyman ever had, and a blessing to the parish. It is only fair to add that his opinion is indorsed in hundreds of poverty-stricken homes.

PETER BLAKE'S VOYAGE.

A SERIAL STORY BY HESBA STRETTON.

Night and Despair.

PETER BLAKE was growing fearfully anxious. Never had life seemed so precious to him. Victor kept near to him, for there was nothing for the boy to do. But Captain Norcott gave orders for lighting up a signal fire on deck, and with almost fierce activity and haste Peter threw his whole strength into the task. A red flame soon blazed up high into the thick gloom of the night; they must keep that flame alight, or no eye could see them in the blackness. The minute-gun boomed across the dark waters. In the lurid light of the burning tar-barrel, the swarthy, weather-worn faces of the crew could be seen, drawn and pinched with fear, as they heaped upon the flame every combustible they could lay their hands upon. Peter Blake did not rest for a moment, or pause to cast a glance at the sea. That flame seemed to be the only link between him and Bessie, with the other helpless ones, dependent on him, at home.

"Is there much danger, Peter?" asked Victor, as he followed him about the ship.

"Ay, my lad," he answered.

"Peter," said the boy, "suppose we are cast upon the rocks, and there's a chance for you, don't you think of me. Try your best to save yourself, for their sakes at home. Don't you lose any chance for me. Promise me, Peter."

"What will mother say?" asked Peter, with a heavy sob.

"It's for mother, and Bessie," he answered, "and baby, and little Nan. I'm not afraid. I'm thinking of what some great captain said once, 'We are as near to heaven by sea as by land.' I should only get there first, where Jesus Christ is, and you'll all come some day."

"Oh, Victor, my lad!" cried Peter, "it would break mother's heart, and mine."

"It would break all their hearts," he said, in a brave, unfaltering voice, "if both of us were lost at sea."

"God keep us off the rocks!" cried Peter again.

But almost as he spoke the words, the strange ripping sound of timbers crushing against a sunken reef grated through the ship. The Dolphin shivered and trembled like some living creature that has received its death wound. A loud, hoarse, simultaneous cry from the crew rang shrilly through the noise of the falling spars and the crashing of the masts. The white waves, which played ceaselessly about the hidden reef, leaped upon the deck, drowning the signal fire, which flickered and burned lower every minute.

There was a wild confusion on board, for now each man thought only of saving his own life; and the dense darkness increased tenfold the confusion and the difficulty. Not one among them expected the ship to hold together for more than a few minutes. The bows were held fast by the rock which had pierced them; but the hinder part was beaten and broken by the waves. As the last gleam of light was dying out, Peter saw Victor's pale young face beside him, and felt his arms thrown round his neck.

"Save yourself," he said, "for their sakes at home. Good-by."

"I cannot leave you," cried Peter. But in an instant Victor had loosed his hold, and was out of the reach of his brother's hand. He could no longer be seen in the darkness; but Peter heard his voice calling to him out of it.

"Good-by," he said. "Tell little Nan that I told her true; the sea is in the hollow of God's hand. I'm not afraid."

The next moment a second loud crash was heard, mingling with the despairing cries of drowning men. The Dolphin was broken in two; and Peter himself was swept away into the black trough of the sea.

But all the crew were not lost.

The point of rock that had pierced the hull still held the bows firmly. The foremast was left, though the main and mizzen masts had been carried away. How long this small fragment of the Dolphin would hold together against the play of the surf, who could tell? The wreck shivered at every fresh gust of wind, and every dash of the tide against it; while the mast leaned and swayed to and fro over the tossing waters.

Fleck, when the second shock came, was clinging in abject terror to this mast, crying for mercy more loudly than any of his shipmates. When the hull parted amidships with a terrific crash, he clambered up into the shrouds, and peered wildly into the darkness, where the white foam of the surf was the only thing to be seen. For some minutes nothing could be heard amid the grinding of the spars, and the creaking of the crazy mast to which he clung, mingling with the roar of the waves far and near, thundering over a rocky coast. But by-and-by he heard voices beneath him; and he called out with a momentary feeling of relief and hope.

"Who's there?" he shouted, loudly, "who's left?"

"It's me," answered Victor, "me and Mr. Penrose."

"Nobody else?" shouted Fleck.

"Nobody!" he replied.

"We're all lost," cried Fleck, "every soul of us. We may go to the bottom any minute. I'm coming down, for this mast 'ill lurch over before long. All through old Penrose, curse him!"

"Hush!" said Victor, "hush! he's here, holding on by me."

"I wish he was here," answered Fleck, descending from the tottering mast, "I'd sink more content if he was alongside of me."

But Arthur Penrose did not speak a word. He had tasted a bitterness worse than that of death during this terrible night. He had no wish to be rescued now that he had been the witness of the sudden death of many men, hurried out of life to satisfy his father's greed of gain. How could he ever forget it? If he lived, must he forever see those despairing faces and hear that despairing cry? No; he would rather die than live with such a burden.

"He doesn't know what he's doing," said Victor. "Perhaps he's like those men that crucified our Lord, and he prayed for them, 'Father, forgive them, they know not what they do.' He doesn't know, or he'd never do it again."

Did his father know what he was doing? The question pressed heavily on young Penrose. He could remember now, while he was clinging for bare life to the poor frail refuge left to them, how little concern he had felt when the news came that one of his father's vessels had been lost at sea. How many could he remember? The names came up before him clearly and distinctly, and he could not keep himself from checking them off upon his fingers. Some of them had never been heard of. What did that mean? Was it true that so many of his father's ships had foundered, with the loss of all the men on board? All the men! Not one to live and return to tell the tale of his shipmates' doom. His brain began to wander. He fancied that he could see amid the surf the white, fierce faces of drowning men, jeering and mocking him, and stretching out long skeleton hands to drag him down to them. These were the men his father had drowned; his father, who was always so good and kind to him, but whose hands were redder with blood than any murderer's.

A gray light broke at last upon the surging sea, but with the coming dawn the wind was rising. All about they could see miles of white breakers, dashing roughly against the reefs lying under the shallow waters. The jeering faces no longer haunted him, but the morning brought with it a feeling of profound sadness. He recalled the time when he had been used to kneel on his mother's lap in the early morning, and say "Our Father." But how long it was since then! How long it seemed since he had repeated that prayer, though it was but three days since he had joined in the words at chuch. He could not say "Our Father" now. His calamity had come, and God would mock at him. There was no chance for life, yet he did not dare to call upon God, as the little cabin boy beside him was doing. For, from time to time during the long dark hours he had heard Victor praying, and now and then singing softly to him, but he himself could not pray. His misery and despair were too great.

"Look! look!" cried Victor, as the morning light strengthened; "a lifeboat! a lifeboat!"

Arthur Penrose and Fleck sprang to their feet. Out a little distance from them a boat was cruising hither and thither, as if in search of the wreck. But the white foam about them was tossing in showers of spray higher than the one mast that was left, and seemed to conceal them from the view of those on board the boat. It was in vain they called and shouted; the din of the waters drowned their voices. Yet from time to time, as the boat rose on the crest of a wave, they could see it plainly, before it fell back into the trough of the sea. The hope that had taken possession of them died away, as they felt they could make themselves neither to be heard nor seen.

"Lad!" cried Fleck, hoarsely, "run up the mast. It'll hold a light weight like thee. Up with thee! Up! We shall all be lost if they miss catching sight of us."

"No, no!" said Arthur Penrose; "the boy shall not go. It would be certain death to him."

"Up! I say;" shouted Fleck, in a frenzy of terror; "there is no other chance. They must see him on the mast. Up, Victor!"

"I'll go," cried Victor, with a white, set face; "it's better for one to die than all of us. God's kept the mast from falling perhaps on purpose. Jesus Christ didn't save Himself."

"Up quickly, lad," urged Fleck; "they'll go away and lose us. Up!"

But Victor was already climbing the tottering mast. A wild sea lay all round him. As far as his eye could reach rapid breakers were foaming to and fro over sunken reefs, and pointed rocks, which lifted themselves like needles above the surface. Two or three miles away lay an island; but between it and them there was a stormy wilderness of waters. If he could not make himself seen or heard by the crew of the lifeboat, they must all perish.

"Take care of mother, and them at home," he called out, looking down for a moment at the up-lifted faces of Fleck and Arthur Penrose.

"I will," answered Penrose; and Fleck shouted, "Ay, ay, lad!"

Cautiously, but swiftly, he climbed as high as he dared climb on the mast. He could feel it tottering and swaying with his weight; but it still held in its socket; and below him Fleck was urging him to mount still higher. The surf almost blinded him as it swept across his face, and the roar of the breakers deafened him. He clung with all his might to the mast, as he wiped the salt water from his dimmed eyes. Did they see him; the crew of the lifeboat? Were they steering toward them, or away? His young, clear, shrill voice rang above the din of the waves.

"O God! let them hear me," he prayed, with a deep, heavy sob.

Yes! they heard. He could see them signal back to him that he was seen. They were drawing nearer and nearer. As long as he kept his perilous post they could steer directly toward them; but if he left it, they might lose sight of the wreck again in the wash of the sea. Once more Victor lifted up his voice.

"Oh, come quickly," he cried.

"We're coming as quickly as we can!" they called back again.

Now he might go down; but just then a great sea which had been rolling toward them unnoticed, tossed itself high against the rocks, and broke over the wreck with resistless force. The tottering mast bent like a reed before it. Arthur Penrose saw Victor clinging to it as it swayed over, and heard him cry, "Our Father!" Then he himself lost all consciousness of his own perilous position.

When Arthur Penrose came to himself, with a painful sense of effort to struggle back to life, he opened his eyes upon a group of strangers surrounding a bed on which he was lying. One of them appeared to be a doctor, for he was counting the beatings of his pulse, though he, as well as all the others, had the look of rough and weather-beaten men.

"Where have you taken me to?" he asked, fancying for a moment that he had been picked up in his little pleasure-boat, and carried to shore in England.

"You are in my house, sir," said one of the group; "in the island of Alderney, among friends. Our life-boat rescued you, and brought you here. We will do our best for you, be sure."

In Alderney! He turned his face toward the light, and through the uncurtained window he could see the rough and tossing sea, and that only stretching up to the distant horizon. He felt sick and giddy at the sight of it; and as if he read the story on the stormy scene, all the memories of the terrible time he had passed through flashed, with intense vividness, through his mind.

"Are there any others saved?" he inquired, in a faint undertone.

"One seaman, who gives his name as Fleck," answered the doctor. "Come, come; you must forget all that for a little while. Here, drink this."

PAUL AND BARNABAS IN CYPRUS.

S. S. Lesson for May 27, Acts 13: 1-12. Golden Text, ver. 7. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Apostolic Apathy as to Missions—A Church with Five Teachers—Its Spirituality—An Erroneous Notion—The Missionaries Chosen—The Kind of Men God Calls—Why Men Abandon Work—The Holy Ghost's Messengers—Opposed by a Sorcerer—Satan's Numerous Instruments and Devices—Spurious Holiness—The Hand of God on Elymas.

"GOD so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son;" our Lord's express command to His disciples was that they should "go into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature" (Mark 16: 15), that they should "go and teach [or disciple] all nations" (Matt. 28: 19) "that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in His name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem (Luke 24: 47). Yet there seems to have been a strong tendency in the early Church to settle down and remain where God had blessed them; beginning at Jerusalem was to them settling down at Jerusalem There seems never to have arisen among the apostles in Jerusalem a burning desire to carry the precious truth of God to "those who lay in darkness and in the shadow of death." It was through the disciples of Jerusalem, and not the apostles, that Samaria was evangelized. God had to give Peter a special revelation in order that he should be made willing to preach his first sermon to the Gentiles at Cæsarea; men of Cyprus and Cyrene were the first messengers of Christ to the city of Antioch, and even Paul himself needed to be thrust forth, full as he was of the constraining love of Christ, in order that he should understand his call to break up untried ground among the heathen.

"There were in the church that was at Antioch, certain prophets and teachers; as Barnabas and Simeon that was called Niger, and Lucius of Cyrene, and Manaen, which had been brought up with Herod the tetrarch, and Saul." Five teachers in one church! No doubt the fellowship of spirit and the union in prayer among them was most blessed, but was this fully carrying out the mind of the Master? While Antioch was being so well cared for, and many souls there were reaping the spiritual fatness which was the result of this strength of workers, what was becoming of hundreds of thousands of lost souls elsewhere?

These men were, however, ready to learn the mind of God.

"THEY MINISTERED TO THE LORD, AND FASTED."

Something must have led them to do so, there must have been a conscious need which drove them to come thus apart. We cannot believe that they were actuated by the spirit which prompts some believers to force God to answer their prayers by fasting and praying until He does so, evidently thinking that God is unwilling, and has to be compelled. Oh, how contrary is such an idea to the truth, for the Lord waits that He may be gracious unto us (Isa. 30: 18). It is in the days when the Bridegroom is taken away that the instinct of a soul is to fast and to wait upon the Lord for a further revelation of Himself and of His will. It is rather, "The Lord has something to say to me, therefore I will set myself apart to listen," than, "I want something from God, therefore I will do violence to myself that He may be compelled to attend to me." The former idea is befitting the teachable child of God, the latter conveys a wrong impression of our most loving Father.

MISSIONARIES CHOSEN.

"As they ministered to the Lord, and fasted, the Holy Ghost said, Separate Me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them." Here was the reason of the impulse to fast to which their spiritual instincts had recognized and responded. This was indeed a Holy Ghost call; would that every minister, every missionary, every evangelist had such a distinct call of God as this. Some are chosen by men because they can pay for their university education, some because it would be a credit to the family to have a clergyman among them. Some are chosen as preachers because they have a facility in expressing their ideas, without reference to their spiritual condition; some choose preaching as a profession because they think it is easier work than the labor of their hands, and it brings them more into prominence. The Holy Ghost has nothing whatever to do with the call of such.

God called Samuel; no man would ever have thought it wisdom to trust a mere child such as he was with the declaration of the mind of God, but no fitter instrument could have been found. God called Moses, not when he was in the zenith of favor at court, and in the full exercise of learning, but just when he was a nothing and a nobody in the land of Midian. God called Isaiah just when he had discovered he was "a man of unclean lips" (Isa. 6: 5-9); Jeremiah when he was a child (Jer. 1: 5-7); Ezekiel when he fell upon his face before the manifestation of his Lord (Ezek. 1: 28; 2: 1-7); Amos when he was following the flock (Amos 7: 14, 15); truly, God's ways are not as our ways. If we are doing any work for God, let us be sure that the Holy Ghost has called us to that work, and then neither difficulties, hindrances, nor even impossibilities will hold us back, for God, who has sent us is equal to them all. Discouragement cannot find room in a man who is sent of God.

Our hearts are often saddened when we hear of those who have put their hands to the plough and have turned back. We hear of men educated for the ministry, but going into business; we hear of missionaries, after remaining a year or two out in the field turning back and getting some comfortable post at home; we hear of Scripture readers and Bible-women finding that they did not get as much personal advantage as they expected, and just turning back to another line of life, as though the winning of souls were only one means, out of many, to gain a respectable livelihood! We see those who have joined the more novel methods of reaching the masses, and who have become officers in the various armies now engaged in fighting the devil, who, instead of first settling whether they were ready to count the cost and accept all risks, trusting God to supply all their needs, soon lose courage and turn back again, and thus the unbelievers mock at the call of the Holy Ghost, as though it were a mere imagination, and the work of our God deteriorates. Few of these, we fear, have really known the call of the Holy Ghost.

When the elders of the Church at Antioch had fasted and prayed, and laid their hands on Barnabas and Saul, "they sent them away. So they, being sent forth by the Holy Ghost, departed into Selucia; and from thence they sailed to Cyprus."

BEING SENT FORTH BY THE HOLY GHOST.

If I am sent forth by the Holy Ghost, then He who sends me forth is responsible for all the consequences of my going forth, strength, talent, wisdom, judgment, as well as food, lodging and clothing, become His responsibility; He does not send us a warfare on our own, but on His, charges. Being sent forth by the Holy Ghost they came to Salamis, in the island of Cyprus, and "preached the Word in the synagogue of the Jews." They did not take up this work because they thought they would like it, but because God liked it. Nothing is told us of the fruit of their labors in this place.

"And when they had gone through the isle nnto Paphos, they found a certain sorcerer, a Jew, whose name was Bar-jesus; which was with the deputy of the country, Sergius Paulus, a prudent man, who called for Barnabas and Saul, and desired to hear the Word of God." It was no light thing in these early times to find a ruler among inquirers after Christ. It might be productive of most blessed results, if this man's soul were saved, and if he himself became an ardent friend of the Gospel. But the devil saw the advantage, and had his instrument ready. Elymas was his tool, and this wretched man, in league as he was with the powers of darkness, saw how contrary Christianity was to his own practises, and he withstood God's messengers, seeking "to turn away the deputy from the faith." This is no uncommon thing, wherever a work of God is going on in power there the devil is close at hand to withstand it. His instruments are diverse. Sometimes he introduces controversy about some doctrine, Calvinism and Arminianism, infant or adult baptism; sometimes he seeks to injure the truth by a current of asceticism, sometimes by the introduction of fanaticism, but in the present day his favorite way of marring the work of God is by the painful inconsistencies of those who preach and those who testify for Christ. By men who profess to have a clean heart, and yet retaliate everything which is said against them, showing that the heart is not cleansed from self-love, who praise God that self is destroyed in them, and yet are as much pained as any one else is when there is the smallest disparagement of anything they say or do; those who say they are ready to go all lengths for Christ, and yet cannot take an injury which man does them from His hand at all; men who sing about giving all they have to Jesus, and yet live in the greatest ease and comfort. These are Satan's favorite instruments in our day.

What would Saul do? He could not stand against the power of the devil in Elymas by virtue of any power which was in him, but he knew, by blessed experience, the power of God. Thus, "filled with the Holy Ghost he set his eyes on him, and said, Oh, full of all subtilty and all mischief, thou child of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord. And now, behold, the hand of the Lord is upon thee, and thou shalt be blind, not seeing the sun for a season." Elymas was a Jew, and had had knowledge about the true God, but never had the hand of the Lord consciously come upon him, and now it must be in judgment not in mercy. God did not delay to respond to His servant; "Immediately there fell upon Elymas a mist and a darkness, and he went about seeking some to lead him by the hand." The deputy could resist no longer, the power of God was manifest in his very presence; "when he saw what was done [he] believed, being astonished at the doctrine of the Lord."

It has been the promise of Christ since the time He was on earth to confirm His word "with signs following." Men who dread the interference of God above all things, declare that there is no need now for signs and miracles, that the age is too enlightened to require startling things such as strike the vulgar, but the real fact is, men are far more unbelieving in proportion as the pride of knowledge increases, and the fact which is seen by all who have any experience of the hand of God in faith healing, is this, that those unconvinced of God's claims upon them, of His love and power, and of His great salvation, are more readily brought into contact with God when they see His works of healing, than in any other way. But in this present, unbelieving age, every argument is tried to prove that God does not interfere now to do works of healing; men are afraid of having God too near them, they would rather keep Him at a distance. Well may our Lord ask the question, "When the Son of man cometh, shall He find faith on the earth?" (Luke 18: 8).

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Condition of Tenant Farmers in England is at last to receive the long-promised attention of Parliament. Their grievances are very heavy, and have been borne with exemplary patience. Their titled landlords have in many cases acted the oppressor's part, and have imposed restrictions upon them which have made it extremely difficult for them to maintain their families, although in the majority of cases they could obtain men to labor on their farms at the starvation wages of two dollars a week. A first step toward the relief of the farmers was made on May 10th, when a member of the administration introduced a bill in the House of Commons, by which agricultural tenants will be entitled to receive, when their tenancies expire, compensation from landlords for improvements they may have made to the lands they occupied.

Dr. Gallagher and the Other Prisoners charged with conspiracy to blow up public buildings in England with dynamite were, on May 10th, held for trial, with the exception of O'Connor, whom the prosecution failed to connect with the others. He was released, but was immediately arrested again and carried to Liverpool to answer another charge. The other prisoners were committed for trial on the charge of treason-felony, conspiracy to damage public buildings, and unlawful possession of nitro-glycerine. The trial will be begun on the 28th of June at the Old Bailey. Confirmation of the suspicion that the object of the plots was the Houses of Parliament was given by the officers who arrested Dr. Gallagher. They testified to having found in the prisoner's clothes orders for admission to the House of Commons.

A Decided Feeling against Secret Societies is reported from Ireland by the special correspondent of the New York Sun, who states that "the societies in Ireland have received a death blow through the success of the Crown in prosecuting the conspiracy cases. The entire press of Ireland concurs in its approval of the result, and in expressing the hope that Irishmen will hereafter be deterred from the insane and criminal folly of joining such organizations. They join without any idea of their purpose, and in every instance the moving spirits have been among the first to betray their dupes. The conviction of Kelly has produced a profound sensation, and there seems to be a revulsion of feeling with regard to the trials and their significance." It may be hoped that the societies in America will also take heed, for treachery appears to have been as prevalent here as in Ireland, and the British Consul in New York was duly informed by Irishmen of the proceedings of the secret societies after every meeting.

The Roman Catholic Archbishop Croke, who has taken a prominent part in the Irish agitation, is said to have received a reprimand from the Pope for his attitude on the question. It was conveyed in a communication from Cardinal Jacobini, the Papal Secretary of State, to which the Archbishop replied, maintaining that his conduct in relation to the agitation in Ireland had been perfectly regular, and that his object was not to stimulate revolt, but to obtain for the people right and justice. The explanation of the Archbishop, it is said, was not deemed satisfactory at the Vatican. The Moniteur, of Rome, now states that it has reason to believe that an important and very categorical document has just been sent by the Vatican to all the Irish bishops, and that Archbishop Croke has promised the Pope that he will in the future conform to the attitude of Cardinal McCabe with regard to Irish affairs.

The Rocks Ahead in French Policy are Described by a writer in Paris in a cable letter to the New York Herald. He says: "It is evident that on the Congo, in Tonquin and Madagascar, France is being led into a series of petty foreign adventures which are covering her chagrin at the loss of her influence in Egypt. It will be difficult for her to come out without burned fingers. Paris is certainly just now anxious to hear from the Congo. It is pretty certain that if M. De Brazza ventures to pull down the international flags near Stanley Pool, or attempts to assert by force French supremacy on the Upper Congo, he will come into conflict with Stanley. Should this occur France must be prepared to support M. De Brazza in a campaign against the foreign Powers, who are responsible for the welfare of the International African Society. But the Tonquin question is fraught with more danger than that of the Congo. Judging by President Grévy's autograph letter calling upon the Emperor of Annam to submit his dominions to a French protectorate, France has evoked the hostility of China, so that carefully worded journals such as the Siècle and the Temps warn France that the danger of war with China should be earnestly taken into consideration." He also expresses his conviction that all the expeditions have been undertaken to restore French national self-respect, which has been lowered by her Egyptian blunders.

The Malagasy Envoys have been Cordially received in Germany, and it is hoped that German influence may hold in check the unjust attempts made by France to impose her yoke in Madagascar. The envoys write that they are greatly pleased with the reception they met with in Berlin and hope to sign a treaty with the government. They claim that the commerce of Germany with Madagascar exceeds that of France. Herr Kock, a merchant at Tamatave, the capital of Madagascar, has been appointed German Consul at that place.

Dr. Moffat, the Venerable Missionary, has written a letter denouncing the English policy in the Transvaal. Dr. Moffat has spent the best years of his life in the near neighborhood of the colony, and therefore speaks with authority. He says: "Our government are verily culpable; they talk of removing the sufferers; but where to is the question; and to pension the plundered chiefs is an idea too disgraceful to be entertained. First, to promise to shield and defend them against Boer aggressions, then leave them to be plundered and murdered. I cannot contemplate the future of the Bechuana tribes without deep sorrow, especially as it is all the result of the maladministration of a nation—the wisest in the world. In order to get quit of these deeply-wronged tribes, it is proposed to remove them to another locality, that the lawless Boers may have unrestricted right to rule according to their own ideas of right and wrong; but where can these suffering people be placed? I know the whole of the country. The whole affair is a disgrace and shame, and will remain a blot in England's escutcheon, which long manufactured speeches will never erase."

The Annexation of New Guinea by Great Britain appears to have caused little remark among other nations. The government of Queensland took formal possession of New Guinea in the Queen's name, pending the decision of her ministers. The excuse for this precipitate and daring act is the necessity of anticipating foreign Powers, especially Germany, which is said to have been maturing a plan for the colonization of the country. New Guinea, or Papua, is the third largest island in the world, containing a territory 274,000 miles in extent, one third greater than that of France. Its interior, comprising mountain ranges and table lands, has never been explored; and its sparse population consists of various tribes, some tractable, and others fierce and untameable. It is rich in tropical vegetation and mineral wealth, while its coast regions are humid and unhealthy. The large number of islands England now possesses in every part of the world is a significant fact which students of prophecy have noted as confirmation of the opinion that she is the Tarshish and the isles of the sea so often mentioned in prophecy.

A Bishop's Testimony to the Value of the work in which Messrs. Moody and Sankey have been engaged in Great Britain was given on a public platform, recently. Dr. Ryle, the Bishop of Liverpool, who presided at a meeting held in that city, while the American evangelists were there, noticing the smallness of the attendance, attributed it to the attraction of the services at the Circus, conducted by Messrs. Moody and Sankey, and said he did not wonder at it. He was one of those who thanked God extremely for Mr Moody. He thanked God for the testimony Mr. Moody bore to the simple Gospel of Jesus Christ. There was nothing sensational, no beating of drums and blowing of trumpets; but he simply told in very simple language the story of the cross, and brought out the truth of the Word of God, and did it not for any party, not for any sect, not for any particular church, but for the cause of his Lord and Saviour. He thanked God for any man who could get the ear of the people in the way Mr. Moody did. Mr. Moody was only following the steps marked out by the evangelists who turned the world upside down.

The Evangelistic Work of M. Von Schluembach in Berlin is meeting with remarkable success. German papers say that those who have been blessed, and the ministers whose hearts have been stirred by its means, are arranging for its continuance. A new Y. M. C. A. has been started, which, if rightly conducted, may become a power for good all over Germany.

A Mouse's Nest made of Bank Notes.—A French workman was disagreeably surprised recently to find that a sum of 2000f. ($400) in bank notes he had hidden in a cellar for safety had disappeared. The pocket-book which had contained the notes was there, lying open, but there were no signs of the notes. On searching well, however, some small fragments of paper were seen lying about, and it was suggested that mice might be the thieves. Following the direction of the fragments, the flooring was taken up of a room above in which a fire had been lighted, and there near the stove was found a mouse's nest lined with the precious paper, nibbled into small pieces. These were collected and taken to the Bank of France, where the notes will be reconstituted if possible; and if the numbers can be ascertained, other notes will be given by the bank in exchange. The workman, however, is little likely to recover all his property, and the loss will probably be a serious blow to him as he is obviously of a miserly disposition, or he would have deposited his money in a bank. It may be hoped that he will be led by his loss to follow the Saviour's injunction (Matt. 6 : 19–21).

The Bible is Claimed by an English Temperance journal as a total abstinence book on the ground that in it the word wine occurs 261 times; 121 times it contains warnings; 71 times warnings and reproofs; 12 times pronounces it as poisonous and venomous · five times totally prohibits it.

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman (London), for May, may be obtained at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, price six cents, postage paid.

Volume V. of the Christian Herald and Signs of our Times is now ready, bound in cloth, containing all the numbers for 1882 with complete index. Price $3 including postage. Ten per cent less to ministers and the trade.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

PRESIDENT ARTHUR.

THE events of the life of Chester A. Arthur, President of the United States, whose portrait appears this week on our front page, have been so widely published and were so thoroughly canvassed during the Presidential campaign, that it is unnecessary to do more here than present a brief summary of them. He has promised to be present at the opening of the bridge to-day, and will naturally and properly by reason of his exalted office, be the most conspicuous personage at the ceremony. His picture, therefore, and a brief sketch of his life are therefore appropriate at this time.

General Chester A. Arthur was born in Franklin County, Vt., October 5th, 1830. He is the oldest of a family of two sons and five daughters. His father was the Rev. Dr. William Arthur, a Baptist clergyman, who emigrated to this country from the County Antrim, Ireland, in his eighteenth year, and died October 27th, 1875, in Newtonville, near Albany.

General Arthur was educated at Union College, and was graduated in the Class of '49. After leaving college he taught a country school during two years in Vermont, and then, having managed by rigid economy to save about $500, he started for New York, and entered the law office of ex-Judge E. D. Culver as a student. After being admitted to the Bar, he formed a partnership with his intimate friend and roommate, Henry D. Gardiner, with the intention of practising in the West, and for three months they roamed about in the Western States in search of an eligible site, but in the end returned to New York, where they hung out their joint shingle, and entered upon a successful legal career. General Arthur soon afterward married the daughter of Lieutenant Herndon, United States Navy. Mrs. Arthur died only a short time ago, deeply lamented by her husband and children.

General Arthur was a delegate to the Convention at Saratoga that founded the Republican party. Previous to the outbreak of the war he was Judge Advocate of the Second Brigade of the State Militia, and Governor Edwin D. Morgan, soon after his inauguration, selected him to fill the position of Engineer-in-Chief of his staff. In 1861 he held the post of Inspector-General, and soon afterward was advanced to that of Quartermaster-General, which he held until the expiration of Morgan's term of office.

At the expiration of Governor Morgan's term, General Arthur returned to his law practice. Business of the most lucrative character poured in upon him, and the firm of Arthur & Gardiner prospered exceedingly. Much of their work consisted in the collection of war claims and the drafting of important bills for speedy legislation, and a great deal of General Arthur's time was spent in Albany and Washington, where his uniform success won for him a national reputation. For a short time he held the position of counsel to the Board of Tax Commissioners of this city, at $10,000 per annum. Gradually he was drawn into the arena of politics. He nominated, and by his efforts elected, the Hon. Thomas Murphy a State Senator. When the latter resigned the Collectorship of the Port of New York on November 20th, 1871, President Grant nominated General Arthur to the vacant position, and four years later, when his term expired, renominated him, an honor that had never been shown to any previous Collector in the history of the port. He was removed by President Hayes on July 12th, 1878, despite the fact that two special committees made searching investigation into his administration, and both reported themselves unable to find anything upon which to base a charge against him. In their pronunciamentos announcing the change, both President Hayes and Secretary Sherman bore official witness to the purity of his acts while in office. A petition for his retention was signed by every judge of every court in the city, by all the prominent members of the Bar, and by nearly every importing merchant in the collection district, but this Gen. Arthur suppressed.

After General Arthur's removal from the Custom House, he engaged in the practice of the law, and in the direction of Republican politics in the State, being Chairman of the Republican State Committee. At the Chicago Convention of 1880 he was nominated to the second place on the Republican ticket, and elected. When President Garfield died on September 19th, 1881, General Arthur became his constitutional successor, and was duly sworn in as President of the United States. In person he is over six feet in height, broad-shouldered, athletic, and handsome. He is a member of the Episcopal Church.

FRANKLIN EDSON,

Mayor of New York.

MAYOR EDSON, whose portrait appears on the front page, was elected to the position he occupies in November, 1882. He comes of an ancient family. He traces his pedigree back to Deacon Samuel Edson, one of the early Puritans, who resided in Salem, Mass., prior to 1639, and removed to Bridgewater in 1650.

Colonel Josiah Edson, one of his descendants, was noted for his loyalty to the British crown during the Revolutionary War. He did not believe that he could honorably break his repeated oaths of allegiance. He was colonel of a regiment of militia, and was obliged, to escape his incensed neighbors, to take refuge under the British flag. His large estate at Bridgewater was confiscated. Opher Edson was born in Grafton, Windham County, Vt., but early in life removed to Chester, where he became a farmer. He married Soviah Williams, a descendant of Roger Williams, of Rhode Island. His son Franklin was born at Chester, Windsor County, Vt., on the 5th of April, 1832.

His early life was spent on his father's farm. He attended a district school during the winters, working during the summers, until he was fourteen years old. Subsequent to that and until he was seventeen he went during the autumn months to the Chester Academy, an institution which had a high reputation, and during the winter taught school, still continuing to do farm work in the summer. In February, 1852, he went to Albany, N. Y., and joined his brother Cyrus, who was already established in business there. He had saved some of his wages and had a capital of $60. After three years of clerkship he became his brother's partner, but one month later Cyrus was killed by the explosion of a boiler at his distillery, and Mr. Edson assumed the conduct of the business, retaining it for fifteen years. He held many positions of trust and honor in Albany, among them a director of the New York State Bank, vestryman of St. Paul's Episcopal Church and president of the Young Men's Association.

In 1866 he sold his business in Albany, and, removing to New York, became a commission merchant. In 1871 he was elected a member of the Board of Managers of the Produce Exchange, and in 1872 he was made chairman of the Trade Committee and of the Committee on By-Laws an Annual Report. One of the most important services rendered by Mr. Edson to the members of the Exchange was the distinct organization of each of the different branches of the produce trade and the establishment of rules under which their differences could be arbitrated. He was elected president of the Exchange in 1873 and re-elected in 1874. He was again elected to the chair in 1878. During his first two terms he devoted great attention to the transportation and grading of grain. He is the founder of the system of inspection now in vogue here, which is an invaluable safeguard for merchants. He labored indefatigably to secure the reduction of the canal tolls, and for years advocated their total abolition. Mr. Edson is a director of the Bank of New York, and was formerly a trustee of the Pacific Mutual Insurance Company and of the common schools in the Twenty-fourth Ward. In 1856 he was married to Miss Fanny C. Wood.

SETH LOW,

Mayor of Brooklyn.

MR. LOW, whose portrait completes the trio which most appropriately accompany the picture of the bridge, was elected to the Mayoralty of "the city of churches" in 1881. His election was a mark of unusual honor, because Brooklyn was then about to make a critical experiment. The control of the city and the appointments were vested in the Mayor, who thus acquired a power rarely confided to one man. It will be readily perceived how important, under such circumstances, it was that the man selected for the office should be wise, sagacious, and of unimpeachable integrity. The fact that Seth Low was elected, is, therefore, a tribute to his mental and moral character of no mean order.

Mr. Low was born in Brooklyn in 1850, and is the son of Abbott A. Low, a well-known merchant in Burling Slip. He was graduated from Harvard College in 1870. He then entered business with his father, and has managed the affairs of the firm, in which he is associated with his father, for several years. Mr. Low has taken an active part in Republican politics in Brooklyn, and has been a delegate to the General Committee of Kings County from the First Ward. In all municipal affairs he has shown much interest, and the Bureau of Charities, systematizing the benevolence of churches and individuals, is largely due to his efforts. His influence has always been on the side of decency and purity in politics, and he has been a conspicuous advocate of reform in the civil service. In the late canvass he refused to make pledges or committals of any sort, beyond a general promise that he would, if elected, use all his influence in furtherance of the public interests without regard to partisan affiliations.

THE BROOKLYN BRIDGE.

Necessity for the Bridge—The First Project—Death of the Engineer—The Difficulties to be Surmounted—Building the Towers—The Foundations Laid on a Floating Raft—The Cables—Fixing the Beams—Conclusion of the Work—Its Permanence.

THE magnificent triumph of engineering skill, which is to be placed this day at the service of the people, has been thirteen years in building, and has cost more than fifteen million dollars. No such bridge exists in the whole world, and its completion places the United States in the van of the nations in the march of human conquest over natural difficulties.

THE FIRST PLAN

of a bridge to connect the cities of New York and Brooklyn was drawn in 1865, when the people of the two cities had grown weary of the tedious travel across the East River in the ferry-boats. The grievance was not a fanciful one. The merchants and professional men of New York had long before been driven across the river by the need of purer air and the high rents of New York. During part of the year the ferry-boat trips were made with sufficient regularity, but the presence of a dense fog blown from the sea was not an unfrequent occurrence, and then the time at which the ferry-boat would start and the time it would occupy in crossing, were matters of speculation. In the winter huge blocks of ice would float down the river and would freeze into a solid mass around the slips, and then, too, traffic would be delayed to the annoyance and sometimes serious loss of the travellers. A demand was consequently raised for a bridge, and a company of capitalists set themselves to the task of constructing one.

MANAGERS.

Before the work was well commenced, however, it was generally felt that a work so stupendous ought not to be left to private enterprise, and it was arranged that the cost of the structure and its management should be placed in the hands of the two cities. By an act of the legislature this scheme was effected, and it was decided that two-thirds of the cost should be defrayed by Brooklyn and one-third by New York, and that the work should be managed by a board of trustees appointed by the Mayor and Comptroller of each city.

In September, 1867, the plans prepared by the engineer, John A. Roebling, were ready for inspection, but it was more than two years later that a practical commencement of the gigantic undertaking was made. Before the first stone was laid a sad accident deprived the trustees of the services of their engineer. While superintending the preparations for laying the foundation of one of the towers, Mr. Roebling received an injury which produced lockjaw, and he died after an illness of sixteen days. He was succeeded by his son, Washington A. Roebling, who has been chief engineer throughout. It is, however, a sad fact that, though superintending the work, he has been obliged to rely on the reports of subordinates, and has scarcely seen the bridge which has been built under his directions. While engaged in directing the early progress of the work he spent some considerable time down in the caisson (a structure which will be described in its place), and was seized by the mysterious "caisson disease," from which he is still a sufferer.

DIMENSIONS.

The two points selected as the termini of the bridge are 1595 feet apart, a distance never before crossed by a single span, and it was necessary, according to law, that the roadway of the bridge should be 135 feet above mean high water mark, which involved the erection of a tower on each shore 277 feet high. These figures will convey to the mind some idea of the enormous difficulties to be surmounted, especially when it is realized that the foundations of these enormous piles of masonry must be laid under the water of the river.

The process of

of the towers, which is one of the most interesting chapters in the history of the work, is thus described by Mr. William C. Conant in Harper's Magazine: "Probably to the end of time thoughtful spectators unversed in the mysteries of engineering will pause, as they now do, before these gigantic towers, more wonderful than the Pyramids, with the everlasting sea beating their mighty bases, and will perplex themselves in vain to imagine by what means the granite masonry could have been laid so solid and true beneath not forty feet depth of rushing tides alone, but eighty feet below their surface, on the rock which those tides had not touched for untold ages. To explain this mystery in one word, the submarine portion of the tower was really built above-water, in the open air, and then sunk toward its bed as soon as built. But this is to put a new mystery in place of the first, for how could such a mass of masonry be set firmly to a hair's-breadth in its bed against the mighty current, or how could its bed be excavated to this enormous depth to receive it?

"The principle of the diving-bell, supplemented by the air force-pump or compressor, is the solution of the difficulty. Only the diving-bell must be a peculiar one, made to carry on its back the giant tower as it dives to the bottom, as it delves into the bowels of the earth, and as it reposes at length and forever on the rock. It is technically called a caisson (having been first used in France), from its resemblance to an inverted chest. Imagine your diving-bell or caisson, made of an oblong form, corresponding to the shape and size of its burden, with a margin of eleven feet excess on all sides. You must, of course, also have it built with sufficient durability of material and strength of mass both to carry down the masonry entire, without flinching, and to rest under it forever without yielding or decay. To obtain sufficient strength and rigidity in the structure for its tremendous back-load, let its entire top, 102 feet by 172, be built to a thickness of 21 feet of dense Southern pitch-pine in timbers twelve inches square, laid in solid courses crossing each other, fastened with powerful through-bolts, and all the joints and seams filled with pitch. Let the sides be eight feet thick at their junction with the top, built in the same manner, but tapered on the inside down to an iron-shod edge only eight inches thick. Finally, let the whole cavernous interior be lined with boiler iron, seamed air-tight, for its perfection as a diving-bell, and for protection against the danger of fire, which experience in building the first or Brooklyn tower of this bridge has shown to be imminent at all times while working by gas-light and with blasting explosives in compressed air.

"While the caisson with its entrances and appurtenances approaches completion in the shipyard, arrangements must next be made for placing it in position on the bottom of the stream. First a slip or dock must be built to fix it in the exact position of the intended tower. The "water-lot" marked for occupation is levelled as well as possible by dredging, and a row of piles is driven as deep as possible along the landward line, making three sides of an oblong inclosure or stockade. Into this inclosure the caisson is towed. The exact lines of the pier foundation are mathematically fixed by the engineers, and the caisson is placed in the proper position to a hair by blocking and wedging on all three sides. It now rises and falls with the tide, however, and is therefore not yet capable of being exactly and finally placed.

"The next business, accordingly, is to commence the foundations of the pier on the massive platform or raft of solid timber 22 feet thick and 102 by 172 feet square, which we have figuratively called the back of the submarine monster which is to carry the whole burden down to its final bed. The huge squared blocks of granite are now laid at leisure in hydraulic cement in uniform courses, and soon their weight overcomes the buoyancy of the caisson, and settles it to the bottom, with its top still visible above water. The compressed air is now let into the diving-bell interior, forcing the water out beneath the iron-shod edges of the sides where they rest on the bottom. This done, the workmen can go down into the very wet cellar, and complete the levelling of the earth under the supporting edges of the structure.

"Now, while the caisson barely touches bottom by its weight, but does not rest too heavily, the engineers can, with their mathematical instruments and wedges, finally adjust the mass in exact position, and by easing away the bottom under it wherever required, with much patience, they at length get it level, and uniformly supported by blocking placed under its cross partitions. A few more blocks of granite laid on will make it immovable. Many formidable difficulties have thus been surmounted, and the curious observer now sees how everything so far can be done by the puny hand of man when guided by his mighty mind. The last operation, after laying bare the bed-rock, and testing its soundness and solidity at all points, is to fill up the caisson with a solid hydraulic concrete, which will harden into rock and unite itself immovably with the rock on which it rests, becoming to the caisson what a tenon is in a mortise. This concrete is rammed as tightly as possible under the roof of the caisson; but if it be impossible to drive it as tight as if the weight of the tower actually rested on it, this is not amiss. For the continued and increasing weight on the wooden supports will certainly compress them further in time, and will eventually, in all probability, bring the weight of the tower firmly, if not altogether, upon the incompressible concrete with which the caisson is filled.

"With regard to the danger of decay in wood, which presents itself to most minds in this connection, experience has long since shown that, when buried beyond reach of air and changes of temperature, wood is perfectly incorruptible, and will endure, so far as we can judge, as long as stone. Oxygen, chemically free as it is in air, is the agent of decomposition, and in its absence all substances are alike incorruptible. The sea-worms make no trouble at the depth below the bottom where we have left our timber platform. It may safely be trusted to support the bridge between New York and Brooklyn as long as there shall be need of it." The first caisson was towed into place on May 2d, 1870, and on June 15th the first granite blocks were laid. It was not until July, 1876 that the two towers were finished.

THE CABLE.

The next step was to unite the two towers by the huge wire ropes stretched across the river from which the structure was to be suspended. An immense anchor shaped like a star was imbedded in New York, and another one exactly like it in Brooklyn, 930 feet back from the towers inland, and on the top of the anchor a pile of masonry was built in each city, weighing 60,000 tons each, to keep the anchors firm and immovable. To the anchors the cables were attached, rising from them in a graceful curve to the top of the towers on which they rest, but to which they are not fastened, and so across the river.

The four cables are composed of single wires not twisted, but laid parallel to each other and are threaded like a skein of thread, around gigantic pieces of metal shaped like horseshoes. Each wire is an eighth of an inch thick. The wire was wrapped over the horseshoe on the New York side, carried over the tower, across the river, over the Brooklyn tower to the horseshoe on that side, and then brought back to the New York side. This was continued until there were five thousand thicknesses of wire, which were then rounded by a process well known to engineers into a compact circular mass and formed one cable. There are four cables, and consequently twenty thousand thicknesses of wire to support the floor of the bridge.

The floor is slung from the cables by vertical ropes, which were attached by iron bands which surround the cables. The iron bands are five inches wide and five-eighths of an inch thick. They securely clasp the cables, and have an ear at their lower edge to which the rope can be fixed. To the ropes are attached floor beams running parallel with the towers, and on these is placed the flooring of the bridge. That is 85 feet wide, which gives space for a promenade for pedestrians a double line of rails for steam cars, and a further space on the outermost edge on each side for two lines of vehicles. The promenade is raised above the other spaces, so that the pedestrians can look clear over the tops of the cars on each side.

THE FIRST TRIP.

The first man to cross from tower to tower was Mr. E. F. Farrington, the master mechanic, who superintended the fixing of the cables. He made the passage on Friday, August 25th, 1876, in a boatswain's chair, which is simply a piece of board slung by its four corners to a grooved wheel which ran along the top of the suspended rope. His passage was greeted by the firing of cannon, and watched with thrilling interest by thousands of spectators on each shore and on the ferry-boats.

The history of the building of this gigantic structure is the history of innumerable difficulties overcome, and is interesting in its minutest details. Here we have had only space to sketch some of its most remarkable features which, however, indicate the consummate skill which has been displayed throughout. It is now completed, and at the date of writing this sketch, the date of opening is fixed for the day on which this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be in the hands of its readers.

European engineers, who have examined the structure, confidently endorse the plans of its builders, and predict that at the end of four centuries it will still be a safe means of transit from city to city. Students of prophecy do not believe that when four centuries have rolled over this world any such bridge will be required. But of this we are well assured, that the pathway by which men may travel from earth to the better land above, the one and only road through Christ will never fail, and they pray continually that, while it is open, increasing numbers may avail themselves of it, until that day when there shall be no more sea.

THE SPICERY OF RELIGION.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, May 20, 1883.

"Of spices great abundance: neither was there any such spice as the Queen of Sheba gave King Solomon."—II CHRON. 9 : 9.

The Splendor of the Jewish Court—Solomon's Wisdom—A Queen's Riddles—Threading a Diamond—Filling a Goblet—The Queen's Visit—The Voice of the Spices—Spice Needed in Religion—In Business—In the Home—Insipidity in Religion—Spice in Preaching and Teaching—Sesquipedalian Nuisances—Spice in Work—Spice in Music—The Coming Heavenly Music—Religion is Spice—The Great Catholicon—A Widowed Mother in the West—The German Christian at Prayer—The Tomb of an Empress—The Spiritual Temple.

WHAT is that building out yonder, glittering in the sun? Have you not heard? It is the House of the forest of Lebanon. King Solomon has just taken to it his bride, the princess of Egypt. You see the pillars of the portico, and a great tower, adorned with one thousand shields of gold, hung on the outside of the tower—five hundred of the shields of gold manufactured at Solomon's order, five hundred were captured by David, his father, in battle. See how they blaze in the noonday sun!

Solomon goes up the ivory stairs of his throne, between twelve lions in statuary, and sits down on the back of the golden bull, the head of the bronze beast turned toward the people. The family and the attendants of the king are so many, that the caterers of the palace have to provide every day one hundred sheep and thirteen oxen, besides the birds and the venison. I hear the stamping and pawing of four thousand fine horses in the royal stables. There were important officials who had charge of the work of gathering the straw and the barley for these horses. King Solomon was an early riser, tradition says, and used to take a ride out at daybreak; and when, in his white apparel, behind the swiftest horses of all the realm, and followed by mounted archers in purple, as the cavalcade dashed through the streets of Jerusalem, I suppose it was something worth getting up at five o'clock in the morning to look at.

THE KING'S WISDOM.

Solomon was not like a great many of the kings of the present day—crowned imbecility. All the splendor of his palace and retinue were eclipsed by his intellectual power. Why, he seemed to know everything. He was the first great naturalist the world ever saw. Peacocks from India strutted the basaltic walk, and apes chattered in the trees, and deer stalked the parks and aquariums with foreign fish, and aviaries with foreign birds; and tradition says these birds were so well tamed, that Solomon might walk clear across the city under the shadow of their wings as they hovered and flitted about him.

A QUEEN'S RIDDLES.

More than this, he had a great reputation for the conundrums and riddles that he made and guessed. He and King Hiram, his neighbor, used to sit by the hour and ask riddles, each one paying in money if he could not answer or guess the riddle. The Solomonic navy visited all the world, and the sailors, of course, talked about the wealth of their king, and about the riddles and enigmas that he made and solved; and the news spread until Queen Balkis, away off south, heard of it, and sent messengers with a few riddles that she would like to have Solomon solve, and a few puzzles that she would like to have him find out. She sent among other things, to King Solomon, a diamond with a hole so small that a needle could not penetrate it, asking him to thread that diamond. And Solomon took a worm and put it at the opening in the diamond, and the worm crawled through, leaving the thread in the diamond. The queen also sent a goblet to Solomon, asking him to fill it with water that did not pour from the sky, and that did not rush out from the earth; and immediately Solomon put a slave on the back of a swift horse and galloped him around and around the park until the horse was nigh exhausted, and from the perspiration of the horse the goblet was filled. She also sent to King Solomon five hundred boys in girls' dress, and five hundred girls in boys' dress, wondering if he would be acute enough to find out the deception. Immediately Solomon, when he saw them wash their faces, knew from the way they applied the water that it was all a cheat.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT.

Queen Balkis was so pleased with the acuteness of Solomon, that she said: "I'll just go and see him for myself." Yonder it comes—the cavalcade—horses and dromedaries, chariots and charioteers, jingling harness and clattering hoofs, and blazing shields, and flying ensigns, and clapping cymbals. The place is saturated with the perfume. She brings cinnamon, and saffron, and calamus, and frankincense, and all manner of sweet spices. As the retinue sweeps through the gate, the armed guard inhale the aroma. "Halt!" cry the charioteers, as the wheels grind the gravel in front of the pillared portico of the king. Queen Balkis alights in an atmosphere bewitched with perfume. As the dromedaries are driven up to the king's storehouses, and the bundles of camphor are unloaded, and the sacks of cinnamon, and the boxes of spices are opened, the purveyors of the palace discover what my text this morning announces: "Of spices, great abundance; neither was there any such spices as the Queen of Sheba gave to King Solomon."

THE VOICE OF THE SPICES.

Well, my friends, you know that all theologians agree in making Solomon a type of Christ, and in making the Queen of Sheba a type of every truth-seeker; and I shall take the responsibility this morning of saying that all the spikenard, and cassia, and frankincense which the Queen of Sheba brought to King Solomon is mightily suggestive of the sweet spices of our holy religion. Christianity is not a collection of sharp technicalities, and angular facts, and chronological tables, and dry statistics. Our religion is compared to frankincense and to cassia, but never to nightshade. It is a bundle of myrrh. It is a dash of holy light. It is a sparkle of cool fountains. It is an opening of opaline gates. It is a collection of spices. Would God that we were as wise in taking spices to our Divine King as Queen Balkis was wise in taking the spices to the earthly Solomon.

SPICE NEEDED IN RELIGION.

The fact is that the duties and cares of this life, coming to us from time to time, are stupid often, and inane, and intolerable. Here are men who have been battering, climbing, pounding, hammering for twenty years, forty years, fifty years. One great, long drudgery has their life been. Their face anxious, their feelings benumbed, their days monotonous. What is necessary to brighten up that man's life, and to sweeten that acid disposition, and to put sparkle into the man's spirits? The spicery of our holy religion. Why, if between the losses of life there dashed a gleam of an eternal gain; if between the betrayals of life there came the gleam of the undying friendship of Christ; if in dull times in business we found ministering spirits flying to and fro in our office, and store, and shop, every-day life, instead of being a stupid monotone, would be a glorious inspiration, pendululming between calm satisfaction and high rapture.

IN THE HOME.

How any woman keeps house without the religion of Christ to help her, is a mystery to me. To have to spend the greater part of one's life, as many women do, in planning for the meals, and stitching garments that will soon be rent again, and deploring breakages, and supervising tardy subordinates, and driving off dust that soon again will settle, and doing the same thing day in and day out, and year in and year out, until the hair silvers, and the back stoops, and the spectacles crawl to the eyes, and the grave breaks open under the thin sole of the shoe—oh, it is a long monotony! But when Christ comes to the drawing-room, and comes to the kitchen, and comes to the nursery, and comes to the dwelling, then how cheery become all womanly duties. She is never alone now. Martha gets through fretting and joins Mary at the feet of Jesus. All day long Deborah is happy because she can help Lapidoth; Hannah, because she can make a coat for young Samuel; Miriam, because she can watch her infant brother; Rachel, because she can help her father water the stock; the widow of Sarepta because the cruse of oil is being replenished.

O woman, having in your pantry a nest of boxes containing all kinds of condiments, why have you not tried in your heart and life the spicery of our holy religion? "Martha! Martha! thou art careful and troubled about many things; but one thing is needful, and Mary hath chosen that good part which shall not be taken away from her."

INSIPIDITY IN RELIGION.

I must confess that a great deal of the religion of this day is utterly insipid. There is nothing piquant or elevating about it. Men and women go around humming psalms in a minor key, and culturing melancholy, and their worship has in it more sighs than raptures. We do not doubt their piety. Oh, no. But they are sitting at a feast where the cook has forgotten to season the food. Everything is flat in their experience and in their conversation. Emancipated from sin, and death, and hell, and on their way to a magnificent heaven, they act as though they were trudging on toward an everlasting Botany Bay. Religion does not seem to agree with them. It seems to catch in the wind-pipe and become a strangulation instead of an exhilaration.

All the infidel books that have been written, from Voltaire down to Herbert Spencer, have not done so much damage to our Christianity as lugubrious Christians. Who wants a religion woven out of the shadows of the night? Why go growling on your way to celestial enthronement? Come out of that cave, and sit down in the warm light of the Sun of Righteousness. Away with your odes to melancholy and Hervey's "Meditations among the Tombs."

"Then let our songs abound,
And every tear be dry;
We're marching through Emmanuel's ground
To fairer worlds on high."

SPICE IN TEACHING.

I have to say, also, that we need to put more spice and enlivenment in our religious teaching; whether it be in the prayer-meeting, or in the Sabbath-school, or in the Church. We ministers need more fresh air and sunshine in our lungs, and our heart, and our head. Do you wonder that the world is so far from being converted when you find so little vivacity in the pulpit and in the pew? We want, like the Lord, to plant in our sermons and exhortations more lilies of the field. We want few rhetorical elaborations, and fewer sesquipedalian words; and when we talk about shadows, we do not want to say adumbration; and when we mean queerness, we do not want to talk about idiosyncrasies; or if a stitch in the back, we do not want to talk about lumbago; but, in the plain vernacular of the great masses, preach that Gospel which proposes to make all men happy, honest, victorious, and free. In other words, we want more cinnamon and less gristle. Let this be so in all the different departments of work to which the Lord calls us. Let us be plain. Let us be earnest. Let us be common-sensical. When we talk to the people in a vernacular they can understand, they will be very glad to come and receive the truth we present. Would to God that Queen Balkis would drive her spice-laden dromedaries into all our sermons and prayer-meeting exhortations.

SPICE IN WORK.

More than that, we want more life and spice in our Christian work. The poor do not want so much to be groaned over as sung to. With the bread, and medicines, and the garments you give them, let there be an accompaniment of smiles and brisk encouragement. Do not stand and talk to them about the wretchedness of their abode, and the hunger of their looks, and the hardness of their lot. Ah! they know it better than you can tell them. Show them the bright side of the thing, if there be any bright side. Tell them good times will come. Tell them that for the children of God there is immortal rescue. Wake them up out of their stolidity by an inspiring laugh, and while you send in practical help, like the Queen of Sheba also send in the spices.

TWO METHODS OF HELP.

There are two ways of meeting the poor. One is to come into their house with a nose elevated in disgust, as much as to say: "I don't see how you live here in this neighborhood. It actually makes me sick. There is that bundle—take it, you poor miserable wretch, and make the most of it." Another way is to go into the abode of the poor in a manner which seems to say: "The blessed Lord sent me. He was poor Himself. It is not more for the good I am going to try to do you than it is for the good that you can do me." Coming in that spirit, the gift will be as aromatic as the spikenard on the feet of Christ, and all the hovels on that alley will be fragrant with the spice.

SPICE IN MUSIC.

We need more spice and enlivenment in our church-music. Churches sit discussing whether they shall have choirs, or precentors, or organs, or bass-viols, or cornets; I say, take that which will bring out the most inspiring music. If we had half as much zeal and spirit in our churches as we have in the songs of our Sabbath-schools, it would not be long before the whole earth would quake with the coming God. Why, nine-tenths of the people in church do not sing; or they sing so feebly that the people at their elbows do not know they are singing. People mouth and mumble the praises of God; but there is not more than one out of a hundred who makes a joyful noise unto the Rock of our Salvation. Sometimes when the congregation forgets itself, and is all absorbed in the goodness of God, or the glories of heaven, I get an intimation of what church-music will be a hundred years from now, when the coming generation shall wake up to its duty.

I promise a high spiritual blessing to any one who will sing in church, and who will sing so heartily that the people all around cannot help but sing. Wake up! all the churches from Bangor to San Francisco, and across Christendom. It is not a matter of preference; it is a matter of religious duty. Oh, for fifty times more volume of sound than has ever yet rolled up among these arches. I have been told that sometimes they hear our singing on Fulton Street. I wish we could get in such a headway of praise to God that they would hear us half way to the ferry! German chorals in German cathedrals surpass us, and yet Germany has received nothing at the hands of God compared with America; and ought the acclaim in Berlin be louder than that in Brooklyn?

INVINCIBLE MUSIC.

Soft music, long-drawn-out music, is appropriate for the drawing-room and appropriate for the concert; but St. John gives an idea of the sonorous and resonant congregational singing appropriate for churches when, in listening to the temple service of heaven, he says: "I heard a great voice, as the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunderings. Hallelujah, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth."

Join with me in a crusade, giving me not only your hearts, but the mighty uplifting of your voices, and I believe we can, through Christ's grace, sing five thousand souls into the kingdom of Christ. An argument, they can laugh at; a sermon, they may talk down; but a five-thousand voiced utterance of praise to God is irresistible. Would that Queen Balkis would drive all her spice-laden dromedaries into our church-music. "Neither was there any such spice as the Queen of Sheba gave King Solomon."

Now I want to impress this audience this morning with the fact that religion is sweetness and perfume, and spikenard, and saffron, and cinnamon, and cassia, and frankincense, and all sweet spices together. "Oh," you say, "I have not looked at it as such. I thought it was a nuisance; it had for me a repulsion; I held my breath as though it were a mal odor; I have been appalled at its advance; I have said, if I have any religion at all, I want to have just as little of it as is possible to get through with it.

RELIGION IS SPICE.

Oh, what a mistake you have made, my brother. The religion of Christ is a present and everlasting redolence. It counteracts all trouble. Just put it on the stand beside the pillow of sickness. It catches in the curtains, and perfumes the stifling air. It sweetens the cup of bitter medicine, and throws a glow on the gloom of the turned lattice. It is a balm for the aching side, and a soft bandage for the temple stung with pain. It lifted Samuel Rutherford into a revelry of spiritual delight, while he was in physical agonies. It helped Richard Baxter until, in the midst of such a complication of diseases as perhaps no other man ever suffered, he wrote "The Saint's Everlasting Rest." And it poured light upon John Bunyan's dungeon—the light of the shining gate of the shining city. And it is good for rheumatism, and for neuralgia, and for low spirits, and for consumption; it is the catholicon for all disorders. Yes, it will heal all your sorrows.

Why did you look so sad this morning when you came in? Alas! for the loneliness and the heart-break, and the load that is never lifted from your soul. Some of you go about feeling like Macaulay when he wrote: "If I had another month of such days as I have been spending, I would be impatient to get down into my little, narrow crib in the ground, like a weary factory child." And there have been times in your life when you wished you could get out of this life. You have said: "Oh, how sweet to my lips would be the dust of the valley," and wished you could pull over you in your last slumber the coverlet of green grass and daisies. You have said: "Oh, how beautifully quiet it must be in the tomb. I wish I was there."

I see all around about me widowhood, and orphanage, and childlessness; sadness, disappointment, perplexity. If I could ask all those to rise in this audience who have felt no sorrow, and been buffeted by no disappointment—if I could ask all such to rise, how many would rise? Not one.

A WIDOWED MOTHER, with her little child, went West, hoping to get better wages there; and she was taken sick, and died. The overseer of the poor got her body and put it in a box, and put it in a wagon, and started down the street toward the cemetery at full trot. The little child—the only child—ran after it through the streets, bare-headed, crying: "Bring me back my mother! bring me back my mother!" And it was said that as the people looked on and saw her crying after that which lay in the box in the wagon—all she loved on earth—it is said the whole village was bathed in tears.

And that is what a great many of you are doing—chasing the dead. Dear Lord, is there no appeasement for all this sorrow that I see about me? Yes, the thought of resurrection and reunion far beyond this scene of struggle and tears. "They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat; for the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall lead them to living fountains of water, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." Across the couches of your sick, and across the graves of your dead, I fling this shower of sweet spices. Queen Balkis, driving up to the pillared portico of the house of cedar, carried no such pungency of perfume as exhales to-day from the Lord's garden. It is peace. It is sweetness. It is comfort. It is infinite satisfaction, this Gospel I commend to you.

Some one could not understand why an old German Christian scholar used to be always so calm, and happy, and hopeful, when he had so many trials, and sicknesses, and ailments. A man secreted himself in the house. He said: "I mean to watch this old scholar and Christian;" and he saw the old Christian man go to his room and sit down on the chair beside the stand, and open the Bible and begin to read. He read on and on, chapter after chapter, hour after hour, until his face was all aglow with the tidings from heaven, and when the clock struck twelve, he arose, and shut his Bible, and said: "Blessed Lord, we are on the same old terms yet. Good-night. Good-night." Oh, you sin-parched and you trouble-pounded, here is comfort, here is satisfaction. Will you come and get it? I cannot tell you what the Lord offers you hereafter so well as I can tell you now. "It doth not yet appear what we shall be."

THE TOMB OF AN EMPRESS.

Have you read of the Taj Mahal in India, in some respects the most majestic building on earth? Twenty thousand men were twenty years in building it. It cost about sixteen millions of dollars. The walls are of marble, inlaid with cornelian from Bagdad, and turquoise from Thibet, and jasper from Punjub, and amethyst from Persia, and all manner of precious stones. A traveller says that it seems to him like the shining of the enchanted castle of burnished silver. The walls are two hundred and forty-five feet high, and from the top of these springs a dome thirty more feet high, that dome containing the most wonderful echo the world has ever known; so that ever and anon travellers standing below with flutes, and drums, and harps, are testing that echo, and the sounds from below strike up and then come down as it were the voices of angels all around about the building. There is around it a garden of tamarind, and banyan, and palm, and all the floral glories of the ransacked earth. But that is only a tomb of a dead empress, and it is tame compared with the grandeurs which God has builded for your living and immortal spirit.

Oh, home of the blessed! Foundations of gold! Arches of victory! Cap-stones of praise! and a dome in which there are echoing and re-echoing the hallelujahs of the ages. And around about that mansion is a garden—the garden of God—and all the springing fountains are the bottle tears of the Church in the wilderness, and all the crimson of the flowers is the deep hue that was caught up from the carnage of earthly martyrdoms, and the fragrance is the prayer of all the saints, and the aroma puts into utter forgetfulness the cassia and the spikenard, and the frankincense, and the world-renowned spices which the Queen Balkis, of Abyssinia, flung at the feet of King Solomon.

"When shall these eyes Thy heaven-built walls
And pearly gates behold,
Thy bulwarks, with salvation strong,
And streets of shining gold?"

Through obduracy on our part, and through the rejection of that Christ who makes heaven possible, I wonder if any of us will miss that spectacle? I fear. I fear. The queen of the South will rise up in judgment against this generation and condemn it, because she came from the uttermost parts of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon, and behold, a greater than Solomon is here!

May God grant that through your own practical experience you may find that religion's ways are ways of pleasantness, and that all her paths are paths of peace—that it is perfume now and perfume forever. And there was an abundance of spice; "neither was there any such spice as the Queen of Sheba gave to King Solomon."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE MOODY AND SANKEY MEETINGS IN EUROPE.

A Fortunate Island.—At a Recent Meeting Mr. Jack said: "I will tell a fact which I am sure will gladden the heart of Mr. Deware. We have a nice little girl from the island of Easdale living with us at present, who told my wife that owing to the faithful preaching of the former and the present Free Church ministers of the island, that there is not a single middle-aged or young person within its sea-girt borders who drinks alcohol in any shape, and only a few of the old people who touch it."

As Clever as the Devil.—Mr. Deware said: "I recently met a young man who made a profession of religion, but I was rather doubtful about him, and therefore asked him, 'How do you feel about sin and the devil?' 'Oh,' he replied, 'I am not troubled with that now; I am up to the devil's quirks.' These were his very words. 'How long have you been converted?' I inquired. 'About six weeks.' 'Well; the devil has been practising his quirks for about six thousand years, yet you profess to be up to them in six weeks! Take care that he is not playing one of his "quirks" upon you at present.' I have not seen the young man since, but I would impress upon you the want of feeling about sin is not a sign that we are free from it, but rather that our spirits are not enlightened and made alive and sensitive by the Holy Spirit."

Offering to Sell a Child for Drink.—The Rev. James Scott said: "The power of drink is something which those who have never felt it, or come into close contact with those who are under its influence, cannot realize. It rouses all the evil passions of men and women. Again and again have I heard men say, 'One year or two years ago I could take it or want it, but now I am helpless.' It makes the father forget his offspring, and the mother ready to part with her children. I have been offered by a mother her child for half a crown (sixty cents), and have not a doubt but that she would have sold it had it not been that in her more sober moments she knew that more money could be made by begging on the street with it. Let us by every means bring the Gospel to bear upon these people, who are perishing without Christ."

Two Converted Highlanders.—The Rev. D. Colvin, of Renton, said: "The work is going on with great vigor in the vale of Leven. Not a week but souls are being brought to the Saviour. As many of you know, my work is principally among the Highlanders in the vale; I will tell you of an interesting episode which I witnessed at the close of a meeting of Highlanders in Helensburg. A young friend who was with me waited to see an old companion of his, whom he expected there. When they saw each other they cordially grasped hands. His companion, without preface, put the question in Gaelic to my friend, 'Have you found Jesus?' 'Yes, I found Him last autumn; that is just the question I was going to put to you.' 'I found Him last year also,' was the satisfactory reply. Those whom the Lord has filled with the Holy Spirit must speak about Him."

Expecting the Prince and Princess.—The Rev. M. Ewing said: "When I was a boy, just after the marriage of the Prince and Princess of Wales, it was announced that they were to visit the town in which I lived. On the appointed day a rumor spread among the expectant crowd that their route was changed for some reason, so that it was probable they would not come. I shall never forget the appearance of the streets and houses. The streets were thronged with working-men, shopkeepers, merchants along with their wives and daughters; the windows and the roofs of the houses were filled with anxious people. They wondered whether the royal pair would come or not, but very few went away. Many had stood there for six hours when the word came, 'They are coming in two hours.' Did the crowd disperse? No, they waited long and patiently to see a face bowing from a carriage window. The Prince never did anything for them, nor did they expect him to do anything for them, but still they waited, and when he passed, rent the air with cheer after cheer to show their loyalty. How many Christians are waiting longingly for the coming of their Prince and King? How many watch for Him? I fear that they are very few."

A Surprised Visitor.—"An Hour or Two ago I was visiting, and came to the house of two old ladies, who always welcomed me, and with whom I often conversed about the glory which awaits us. It was getting late when I reached their door, and I took out my watch to see if I had time to spare, and I thought to myself, 'I shall be kept here twenty minutes, or half an hour; shall I ring? I will.' The servant who opened the door was dressed in black, and when she showed me in, said, 'There is a great change since you were here last, sir; both my mistresses are dead!' A lady whom I visited upon another day was very busy, so I, not to detain her, said, 'I will look back again.' I did so, and was just in time to see her breathe her last on earth. Friends! 'In the midst of life we are in death; watch, for ye know not when ye will be called hence.'"

The Minister's First Convert.—Mr. Jack said: "A young minister told me that the first convert he had was a newly-married man, who asked if there was a text on which he could found his faith for the conversion of his wife. 'Of course there is,' he replied; 'to-day has salvation come to this house.' The man went home, and his wife and he spoke about this great salvation until the morning sun broke in upon them. The wife accepted the Saviour, and retired to rest, but the man was so full of joy that he could not sleep, but went to the minister's house and knocked at the door, until the minister opened his window and demanded, 'Who's there?' 'I've come back to tell you that salvation has come to my house.' I can tell you he had a sympathetic hearer, and at that early hour these two mingled their praises to God for His great goodness."

The Worst Woman in Scotland Changed.— Mr. Jack said: "Last Friday night we had a meeting in our little village, in the house of a woman who without exception was the most degraded woman in all Scotland a twelvemonth ago. She had not a stick in her house, nor any clothing, except the few filthy rags she wore on her back. A week ago to-night, twenty-five Christians met in her house for mutual edification. She was respectably dressed, and her house comfortably furnished. I saw three of her children, and more beautiful children I never saw. The eldest girl was sitting listening to the conversation of her elders with a quiet, modest manner which spoke volumes for the change in her mother. I do not believe in anything being so powerful as the grace of God in raising fallen humanity. The Christ who has saved this woman is able to save even unto the uttermost, all who come unto God by Him."

A Conquering Consumptive.—The Rev. Mr. Andrews said: "I was asked to visit a young woman who was dying of consumption. I knew her in Busby, where I had my first charge. Often had I asked her, 'Mary, will you not accept the Saviour, and follow Him?' but never had the pleasure of hearing her say, 'Yes, I will.' Upon entering the house, I noticed that her face was radiant, notwithstanding the pain and weakness. I asked, 'How is it with you, Mary?' 'I am happy in Jesus,' was her reply. I said, 'I am so glad; how did it come about?' 'While I was lying ill, my husband, who is a Christian, was sitting at the fireside singing the hymn, "Will you go to the Eden above?" Just when he was going over the refrain, an inexpressible yearning came upon me. I thought it was the voice of Jesus calling me, and I said, "Yes, Lord, I will go!" Immediately I was filled with delight. The Lord has got me after a long chase.' I went back to see her last night, when she remarked, 'I hope I am not sinning, but I can't help thinking Jesus is a long time in coming to take me to the Eden above.' People, when they are on their dying-bed, generally speak the truth, and this was her testimony. Will you believe it? Will you follow her example, and turn your steps to the Eden above?"

Dying on a Common Stair.—Another Brother said: "It is seven years since I was brought to the knowledge of the truth, as it is in Jesus. I was working in the Saracen Foundry at the time. I once noticed a fellow-workman apparently in the last stage of decline. I pressed upon him the need of giving his heart to the Saviour. He replied, 'Very true; I will see you again,' and parting from me, went up the stairs to his own house, which he never reached alive, for he broke a blood-vessel and bled internally, and was suffocated, thus dying on a common stair. If I had not spoken to that man I would have felt his blood on my head. It was on my conscience to speak to a certain man in the week, but I put it off till the next day. That day he was paid off, and I have never seen him again. Thus I lost my opportunity to speak for the Master. Another man to whom I spoke is a worker in the Townhead Church. Friends, speak out bravely and kindly for your Master."

A Good Leaf to Turn Over.—A Member of the Mizpah Band said: "Some years ago, ere I was converted, one of my children lay sick, and was ready to die, I bent over the bed, torn with sorrow at parting with one of my dear ones. She lifted up her feeble arms and twined them round my neck in a loving parting embrace. My heart seemed to be broken. I went into another room and prayed, unconverted as I was, that the Lord would make my little one better, and promised to turn over a new leaf. God heard the agonizing cry from a father's breaking heart, and soon my child was quite well. For a few weeks my good resolutions remained firm, but when the feeling of gratitude grew dim, and at last faded away, I fell, because I trusted in my own strength, and the new leaf which I had turned was quickly soiled, and worse-looking than the previous page of my history. Now, thanks be to God, for twelve months I have served Him, and He has kept me all the time, and He will keep me, because He is faithful that promised."

WATCHFULNESS.

By Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, Mass.

THE shadow of sin always precedes the substance, to give us warning of its approach. Let us take heed from this premonition, and flee. We have seen the shadow of a flying bird fall on the ground, and instantly have heard the mother hen sounding the shrill note of alarm, and calling her brood about her. Let us seek to have our spiritual instincts equally keen and quick to discern the first approach of sin; for sin always sends out its scouts in the form of milder and more innocent temptations, before making a full advance. If the Spirit of God dwells within us we shall be on the alert, and keenly alive to these first appearances of evil.

We want not only a conscience void of offence, but a conscience sensitive to the least suggestion of wrong-doing. The surface of the body is all covered over with little sentinels which we call nerves, which give warning of the slightest approach of danger. We need not strike a man with a walking-stick in order to wake him up; it is sufficient only to draw a horse-hair across his skin, and instantly he will start from his slumbers. And we are sure that, as Christians, we ought not to wait till we are knocked down by temptation before we can realize its presence. And so beware, young Christians, against the first approach of evil-doing.

We know how accustomed we are to reason about certain things in this way: "What is the harm of going now and then to the theatre, to hear one of Shakespeare's plays? And what is the harm of dancing-parties and card-playing?" Considered by themselves, these things might not be very harmful; but all experience shows that, as a matter of fact, these indulgences lie in the suburbs of the City of Destruction. A converted actor declares that he could not be a Christian and remain on the stage; and that he never could see Christians in his audience without feeling that they were out of place. The real secret of the evil is that the theatre and the dance often start sinful suggestions which result in sinful indulgences: "Then when lust hath conceived it bringeth forth sin; and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death."

"Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments," saith the Scriptures. But sin rarely seizes our garments and tears them from us bodily, as the wife of Potiphar did the vesture of Joseph. It first unravels them about the edge, by slight indulgences and questionable yieldings; and then weaves in, little by little, the filling of worldliness and transgression. Therefore let the young Christian beware of the beginnings of worldly conformity. Black sins and deep-dyed transgressions are never the ones that come to us first. It is the neutral tints of evil which are first presented to us, and often the eye becomes accustomed to them; then that which is still darker is put forward. Therefore, the most wholesome exhortation we can urge is this: "Abstain from all appearance of evil."

SIGNS OF HARVEST.

The Divine Scheme Comprehends—I. The Preservation of All the Chosen People for the Completion of the Design—II. Preparation for Their Part in Its Fulfilment—III. The Preparation of the World: Politically, Intellectually, and Materially.—The Hebrews' Experience during the Past 2500 Years—The Result of It both to Jews and Christians—The Growing Wickedness of the Age—Current Works of Faith and Answers to Prayer—Signs: Political, Commercial, Social and Religious—A Double Harvest Ripening—The Marvellous Preservation of the Jews—The Russian Chief Rabbi's Recent Affirmation—The Land of Palestine—Universal Inability Demonstrated—The Solemnity of the Times.

THE divine scheme is a vast and comprehensive one, involving: 1. The preservation of all the chosen people, by means of whom the design was to be carried out. 2. The preparation of the chosen people, in all essential ways, for their part in the fulfilment of the design. 3. The preparation of the world at large—politically, intellectually, and materially, for the use and possession of the chosen people, when they, and those joined to them, shall be ready for the Kingdom.

PREPARATION FOR THE FUTURE KINGDOM.

Now, inasmuch as the Hebrews showed themselves in every way unfit for their high national position and destiny 2500 years ago, the Lord God has since then been putting them through an experience of discipline and training that shall make them fit and qualified, when the Kingdom and Holy Nation shall be finally and permanently established. This discipline and training are of a compound character; but chiefly and essentially spiritual, according to the principle and power of faith. It has also been political, social, commercial and intellectual. For most of the time, and to most of the people, it has been bitterly painful in every one of these departments—"through many tribulations we must enter the Kingdom"—and to the experience of both Jew and Christian, both nationally and individually, the tribulations have indeed been many. Both Christians and Jews have had full measures of political subjugation, social discomfort and disgrace, trading and commercial disaster and loss, and educational disadvantage and detriment. And now, many of them are enjoying the exact reverse of all this, and to such marked degree that Jews and Christians stand at the head of all mankind in all spheres of human life. This surely is a sign of the times!

THE RESULT OF 2500 YEARS' TRAINING.

Equally significant do we regard what we believe to be the fact, that after all the vicissitudes of religious experience during the same 2500 years, individual spiritual character in both Jews and Christians has attained a higher standard and quality than ever before. It is a natural result of the long discipline of these centuries that faith has reached, in some of God's people, a higher development, and shaped into a more nearly perfect type, than formerly; so that in this respect it is true of many who are last in being called, that they shall be among the first in the Kingdom.

In comparison with the mass of mankind, these will doubtless be very few in number. The present are days of spreading unbelief, infidelity, and libertinism, and answer to the condition implied in the King's words: "When the Son of man cometh, shall He find faith on the earth?" He evidently did not anticipate finding much; but the harvest of faith which He will reap with His own living ones will surely answer to all the pains He has bestowed upon its cultivation, and yield Him fruit, in some thirty, in some sixty, and in some even a hundred-fold.

CURRENT WORKS OF FAITH.

There are works of faith being done, and answers to prayers of faith being received now, which equal and surpass anything of the kind ever before recorded. Many of Christ's people have proved His words true which He said to some who marvelled at His miracles: "Greater works than these shall ye do, because ye believe in Me." Christian ministers, preachers, philanthropists, nurses, and others, can testify to miracles of conversion, of healing, of help, and of deliverance, the record of which, were it all compiled together, would astound even those who believe. The Holy Spirit of God is working mightily in these last days, and fulfilling the Divine promises in such measure as to set many of His people looking for the outpouring, while it demonstrates to them the presence of the hand of God, and the truth of His Word. On the whole, therefore, we are constrained to think that the present times are showing such signs as are indicative of ripening unto harvest.

SIGNS, POLITICAL AND COMMERCIAL.

Politically.—Every system of government possible by man has been tried and found wanting. In no country, and among no nation, is there assured peace, safety, and comfort, much less happiness.

Commercially.—The trading relations of the world are full of all manner both of subtle and open fraud and roguery, forming a system of which the only principle is that supremely selfish and unrighteous one, "every man for himself." The principles of righteousness are absolutely ignored in the great majority of commercial transactions, most of the men engaged in them being filled with the consuming desire to make haste to be rich.

The advantages of mechanical and electrical science have been availed of solely to help to more haste in this effort; and so rapidly now are men endeavoring to get their business done, and their money "made," that the mental and nervous strain is fast becoming greater than human nature can sustain. Numbers of men are daily breaking down under it, and adding to the multitude of drunkards, lunatics, suicides, and the prematurely dead.

SOCIAL AND RELIGIOUS SIGNS.

Socially and Religiously.—Every phase of doctrine, every form of ecclesiasticism, every effort of philanthropy, and every theory of reform, has been exhausted in the effort to amend the world in its social and moral conditions, and they have all miserably failed. The total sum of human misery is no less, certainly, if it is not greater, than it ever was before. Civilization, highly vaunted as it is by many, is seen by others to be a sham, except in so far as it has borrowed from the morals of Christianity some saving truths and maxims.

For five thousand years the cleverest, ay, and many of the best of mankind, have been trying their utmost, in these and various other ways, to remodel the state of human affairs and perfect the conditions of human life. But the world is unsaved by them yet—the efforts and schemes are all failures; and although the world is wealthier and more civilized than ever before, there is also in it more wretchedness and iniquity, inveterate, widespread, subtle, and insidious. There is, in fact, around us—one the crop of good seed, the other the crop of tares. Not only has the mystery of the Kingdom of heaven been gradually developing and ripening, but the "mystery of iniquity" (2 Thess. 2 : 7), or lawlessness, has been working also, and a great harvest for the fire it will afford.

God's nation, Israel of the ten tribes, has been sifted through the world, preserved in most marvellous manner, yet disciplined and taught, by historical, political, commercial, ecclesiastical, and spiritual experiences, for their high destiny. Out of them, by means of the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, He has been taking for Himself, generation by generation, a people of "Israelites indeed," each one personally saved and purified through faith and the Holy Spirit. To these He has joined like believing ones, taken in like manner out of every other nation, and kindred, and tribe, and tongue; for to all these the Gospel has been preached.

THE MARVELLOUS PRESERVATION OF THE JEWS.

He has also preserved, in no less marvellous, yet more open and distinctive manner, the Jews, who are the House, or nation of Judah and his fellows. These have exhibited the effects of their severe discipline and training, in having continued, for a longer period than ever before, true to the worship of the God of their fathers; and they have been punished and blessed according to the Covenant, in proportion to their faithfulness and righteous obedience. In this connection it is significant that the chief Rabbi of the Jews of St. Petersburg, lately charged upon the Russian Jews that their recent dreadful sufferings were, in his opinion, a divine punishment for their general sinfulness, and disobedience of the laws of their God, whom they profess to serve. On the other hand, the more favored Jews in England and Western Europe, having among them some of the most God-fearing men now living, are being blessed under the Covenant, and are the financiers of the world.

THE LAND OF PALESTINE.

God has also kept the land of Palestine from being a profitable or happy possession to any of the nations who have subdued it. Yet in recent years He has restored the long-withheld "latter rain," and is causing the land to revive and show signs of renewed fertility; thus bringing it into readiness for the use and occupation of the people to whom He gave it for an everlasting possession, and to whom it has belonged all the time, although they have been absent from it.

He has given the nations of the world time and opportunity to try every form of government and every mode of philanthropy possible to man, and by their failure has demonstrated the utter inability of man to save himself, or rule aright. He has also let them, and all mankind, have full experience of all kinds of evil, and permitted Satan to test and try them with all his subtle and sensual powers, insomuch that those who were not indisposed to let Satan lead them captive at his will have even become "children of the evil one." On the other hand, these evil powers and influences have also tried and tested the faith and virtue of the children of light, showing them the wickedness of sin, promoting in them an abhorrence of all evil, and a love of all that is good. So the mystery of the Kingdom and the mystery of iniquity have been working side by side; the one to the perfectness of righteousness and holiness by faith, and eternal life; the other to all deceivableness of unrighteousness and eternal death.

THE SOLEMNITY OF THE TIMES.

Because the time of the end of this age is near; because iniquity abounds; because the acceptable year of the Lord is closing; because the day of vengeance of our God is at hand; and because the Kingdom of heaven is nigh—even at the doors; we are constrained to say to each of our readers: "Flee from the wrath that is coming." "Seek first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness." "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved," "There is salvation in none other,"

READERS should understand that when an article published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD bears the name of the writer, that writer must be held individually responsible for the views therein advanced. The ministers whose sermons appear in this journal, and other contributors, must not be regarded as always endorsing views about which there is a wide divergence of opinion, even among Christians of eminent piety and learning.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Postmaster-General has Issued a Regulation by which it is hoped a repetition of the Star Route frauds may be prevented. The chief difficulty encountered by the government in the detection of the frauds consisted in the fact that the routes had been sub-let, and it was therefore difficult to discover the amount actually paid for the service. The regulation now issued requires that contractors must in all cases secure the permission of the Postmaster-General before making a sub-contract on any route. The application to sub-let must be made separately for each route, specifying the number and terminal points thereof. A sub-contract must be executed for service upon the whole route and for a period not less than one year, or for the balance of the contract term when less than one year, and it must be filed by the contractor in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General within thirty days after the time when service is to begin under it. It must be executed in the form prescribed by the Postmaster-General, and must specify the rate to be paid per annum under it in case the service shall be changed. It is believed that if this regulation is honestly enforced there will be no more such cases of injustice as have been brought to light in the cases now being tried.

The Instructions Given by the Civil Service commissioners to their chief examiner and secretary have been published. They are exceedingly minute and thorough. It will, of course, be possible to evade them, but if they are obeyed in the spirit and the letter, absolute impartiality will be secured. The examination of candidates is to be conducted, as far as possible, in writing. The papers are not to be marked with the candidate's name, but a number or letter is to be inscribed thereon which will correspond with a similar mark on a sealed envelope in which the candidate's name is to be placed, and which is not to be opened until the examination papers have been inspected and passed. Minute directions are also given to preclude the possibility of candidates receiving assistance during the examination. It is stated that President Arthur's experience in the Custom House of New York enabled him to render the commissioners valuable assistance in the preparation of the rules.

The Mystery Connected with the Recent raids on the opium dens in New York, which puzzled the public, has been explained. It was a surprise that the police found the dens comparatively empty, although people living in the locality stated that large numbers of young girls and men and women visited them continually. The problem was submitted by a reporter, to a girl who a few nights after the raid was found leaving one of the dens. She quickly solved it by saying, "We all had the straight tip to keep out of the way on that night." No other light was needed, but if any part of the mystery remained it was removed when the reporter, walking on down the street, saw the policeman of the route in conversation with the hag who keeps one of the worst of the dens. It would be difficult to find any city on earth in which the police force is made up of the class of men employed in that capacity in New York and Brooklyn.

The Burning of the Granite State, a Steamer plying between New York and Hartford, Conn., on Friday last caused the death of three persons at least, and it is feared that other passengers must have lost their lives by the disaster. The steamer left New York on Thursday afternoon, and arrived at Godspeed Landing about five o'clock the following morning. She was within two minutes of the landing when the fire was discovered, but as she had on board a number of barrels of petroleum and a quantity of fireworks, her destruction was rapid and complete. The passengers were immediately aroused, and rushed on deck as the steamer was made fast. By that time the saloon and state-rooms were filled to suffocation with the dense smoke. Many of the passengers, despairing of reaching the wharf in any other way, jumped overboard, and were rescued by boats put off by the humane inhabitants. Three were lost in the attempt, but it is impossible to learn whether any of the passengers died by fire or suffocation below deck, as the records were burned with the ship. The hawser holding the boat to the wharf parted as the fire spread, and the Granite State drifted down with the tide and burned to the water's edge.

The Convention of Young Men's Christian Associations, which held its sittings last week at Milwaukee, Wis., decided after a protracted debate to continue New York as the head centre of the international organization, although it was strongly urged by many members that it would be more convenient to have the centre moved to some city in the West. The International Committee's report stated that for the current year the committee has received subscriptions to the amount of $14,648. The expenses of the committee for 1883 to the date of the convention have been $10,791.93. All are paid, and there remains in the treasury $293.65. There is needed for the remainder of the current year the sum of $19,600, for which the convention was asked to provide. The budget for the current year, as made up on careful estimates, calls for an expenditure of $30,000.

Disastrous Storms Raged through the Western States last week. On Sunday, May 13th, several cities in Missouri suffered severely. At Kansas City fifty buildings were blown down, and more than two hundred badly damaged. Three persons were killed and about twenty injured. Reports from Orongo, Mo., describe that town as utterly destroyed. At Macon City five persons were killed and fifteen injured. From all parts of the State come reports of serious damage to crops and buildings. Similar reports come from Indiana and Michigan, but the tornado there appears to have been less destructive than in Missouri. On May 18th another tornado passed over parts of Wisconsin and Illinois. It is described as funnel-shaped and revolving with terrific rapidity. Racine, Wis., suffered seriously. The tornado reached that place at one A.M. on May 19th, passing through the north-western portion of the city, demolishing one hundred and fifty houses and barns, and killing about sixteen persons, besides injuring many others. An eye-witness says: "The tornado struck the earth with a noise which might be compared with the roar and rumbling of railroad trains thundering over a bridge. Brick and frame houses alike collapsed, and their sites are marked only by heaps of shapeless debris. Those in the middle of the storm centre simply fell in ruins where they had stood. Some nearer the circumference were turned around. The tornado, as it moved from the city out upon the waters of Lake Michigan, presented a grand spectacle. The whirling columns of air seemed like monster wreaths of smoke as they flew over the watery expanse, bearing with them spiral columns of water, and no ship that encountered this monster of the air could by any possibility escape destruction."

Ten Dollars were Received Last Week from a lady residing at Newark, N. J., to be used in sending THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to the colored ministers in the South. Testimonies continue to come in of the usefulness of this fund. Ministers who have received the paper write that they have been aided in their work by the Gospel teaching it contains, and that many instances of conversion have come to their knowledge as the result of the blessing of God on its pages in cases where they have lent or given it after exhausting its contents themselves. Our friends, who have kindly placed this fund at our disposal, will be pleased to learn that their money has thus already borne fruit to the glory of God.

A War on the Gambling Houses has been commenced at Nashville, Tenn., and on Thursday last five thousand dollars worth of seized gambling apparatus was burned in bonfires on the public square of the city by order of the Criminal Court. It is asserted that at least 500 gamblers will be driven out of the city by the enforcement of the new act of the State Legislature making gambling a felony.

Reports of Temperance Work in the South are very encouraging. Progress is especially notable in Georgia, where the Legislature recently passed a law which allows a vote on the question of prohibition in any county upon petition of a certain number of inhabitants. This if carried for prohibition is followed by a proclamation by the Governor excluding liquors from the district. It is remarkable that in the counties where there has hitherto been the most drunkenness, large prohibition votes are cast, and one of the most notorious counties in the State has just voted for prohibition by over six to one.

A Sabbath Observing Railroad is the Louisville, New Albany and Chicago Railroad, the president of which is Colonel Bennett H. Young. He has recently issued a stringent order in reference to Sunday trains. He orders that as far as possible no work shall be done, or trains be run on Sunday. The only passenger train that will be run on that day is that carrying mails, and efforts will be made to discontinue it. In cases of perishable goods or live stock, freight trains will run when necessary only. The order further says: "You will in future run no excursion trains of any kind, for any purpose, on the Sabbath. This order applies to camp-meeting trains. I am also informed that a number of the company's employés have conscientious scruples against any work on the Sabbath. There are likely others who do not feel so strongly on this subject. Under no ordinary circumstances must any employé who objects on the ground of his religious convictions be ordered or required to do any service on the Sabbath. If any difficulties arise in the execution of this regulation you will please report them to me for consideration, and you will also notify the employes of their rights on conscientious grounds to be fully protected in the observance of the day of rest."

The Perils of Lake Michigan are Graphically described by a Chicago journal. It states that the lake is more dangerous than any other of the great Northern lakes. This is owing partly to its lack of convenient harbors and sheltering islands or headlands, and partly to the peculiar suddenness and great violence of the gales that sweep over it. Two shipwrecks have already occurred this spring, both of them in the vicinity of that peculiarly dangerous locality, Grosse Point. All the precautionary arrangements for the benefit of mariners do not prevent frequent shipwrecks at that perilous place. On the north the shore is absolutely without bay, inlet, indentation, or protection of any kind against the force of the sea for a distance of fifty miles, with water so shoal fully a mile seaward that the only hope of escape from shipwreck for the vessel which is carried by a north-easter too far west to double the point is in the holding strength of its anchors. The anchorage, however, is nowhere in that vicinity very good. As the Christian reads this description, he cannot fail to be impressed with the completeness of the type this lake is of life in the world without Christ. The suddenness of the gales, the shoal water, and the bad anchorage, all are symbols of the world's dangers. Happy is the young man who, having the voyage before him, takes Christ as his guide, compass, and anchor (Prov. 1 : 33).

The Ruin of a Trusted Clerk in New York was described in the daily journals last week. During the past six years a firm, having extensive business transactions, have employed as confidential cashier and book-keeper a young man, whose family reside in New Jersey. Some time ago he contracted an intimacy with a dissolute woman, and gave her money and valuable presents. That his wife might not become suspicious from his lack of money, he used the firm's funds until he had taken nearly $13,000. Finally he became alarmed, and decided to break off with the woman who had ensnared him. But she had learned from him that he was a defaulter, and she used this knowledge in extorting more money from him. At last he resolutely refused her, and then she revealed to the firm that he had robbed them. At first the clerk denied it, but soon he admitted that her story was true. He was arrested and placed in charge of an officer, who accompanied him to his home, where he confessed to his wife The young man's father, on hearing of his son's arrest, made up the deficiency in his accounts, and the prisoner was then released. Though spared, through his father's kindness, the ignominy of trial and imprisonment, the young man has wrecked his life and brought sorrow and loss on his friends. The incident, which is only one of many such cases, ought to be a warning to young men who are fond of frequenting vicious resorts where they become acquainted with women such as the one who led this man to his ruin (Prov. 6 : 24–26.)

A Blind Sexagenarian's Eyesight has been restored to her in a Philadelphia hospital. A recent number of the Record states that Mrs. Harriet Holmes, a colored woman, who is sixty years old, was blind from her birth until three weeks ago. Dr. L. W. Fox, one of the surgeons at the hospital, was attracted by the peculiarity in the formation of her eyes, and made an examination, which convinced him that her sight might be restored. The old woman's consent to an operation was not obtained without difficulty. After the operation her eyes were bandaged for eight days. At last she was removed to one of the wards of the hospital which looked upon the street, and the bandage was removed. The patient started violently, and cried out as if with fear, and for a moment was quite nervous from the effects of the shock. For the first time in her life she looked upon the earth. Owing to her first impression of distance she was for some time afraid to walk with her eyes open, the ground or floor appearing a "fur way off," in strange contrast with her impression of distant objects. The blaze from a lamp excited the most lively surprise in her mind. She had no idea what it was, and when it was brought near her wanted to pick it up. When night approached upon the day when she first used her eyes, she was in a fright, fearing that she was losing the sight which she had so wonderfully found after sixty years of darkness. It would be well if the Christian, whose spiritual change from darkness to light is as marvellous to him, would also fear lest he should through sin lose even for a moment the light of God's countenance (Isa. 59 : 2).

A Curious Discovery of an Unopened Letter was made recently in New Hampshire. Workmen engaged in repairing an old house in Chester, found a sealed letter in the wall, inscribed to "Mrs. Sarah Taylor, Litchfield, N. H.," and marked "In haste." The letter was folded in the ancient form, without envelope, and closed with red sealing-wax, unbroken. It was dated Rumford, May ye 18, 1748, and was signed by John Taylor. One hundred and thirty-five years that letter had been written before its contents were read, notwithstanding the writer's "haste." The cause of the delay is now unknown, but it may have arisen from the sickness or death of the person to whom it was addressed. We may be certain that only some such serious cause would have prevented Mrs. Sarah Taylor reading what her husband or son had to say to her. Letters from friends are not usually left unread, as too often happens with the Bible, the message of our heavenly Father, which in spite of the treasures it contains is neglected and despised, and in consequence men fall into error and sin (Matt. 22 : 29).

Five Miners were Dashed Headlong down a mine a short distance from Scranton, Pa., on May 15th. They got into a carriage in the morning, and were about to descend, when the engineer, with his hand on the lever, asked if all was right; the men answered, "yes," and the machinery was set in motion for descent. The carriage had gone down about ten feet, when the engineer, noticing that something was wrong, stopped it suddenly. This threw the wire rope from the drum upon which it was coiled, and sent the carriage with its living load down the shaft at lightning speed. Just before it struck the bottom of the shaft, one of the men leaped for life, and managed to get away with comparatively slight injuries. The others remained on the carriage, which struck against the rocky bottom with a loud report like the bursting of a gun, and was smashed to splinters. They were all severely injured, and it is feared none of them can recover. It is impossible to realize without horror what must have been the sensations of the men in that terrible descent, yet that is one of the similes used in the Bible to describe the doom of the impenitent, which men wantonly brave (Isa. 38 : 18).

A Pimple on the Nose Led to a Suicide in Philadelphia recently, according to a Press Association telegram to the New York journals. It stated that on May 13th a young lady employed as a public school-teacher in the city poisoned herself under the following circumstances: A few weeks ago a pimple appeared on her nose. This blemish became such an annoyance that she visited a physician, who advised her to have it burned out. The operation was performed, but left a worse disfigurement than before. This result crazed the unhappy woman. A few days later she left the house and bought laudanum in small quantities in several drug stores. She then drank the entire quantity. Going to an upper room, she said to her mother, "I am going to take a long sleep." She became insensible almost immediately, and though a physician was summoned and did everything possible to resuscitate her, she died the same evening. It is probable that the whole story has not been told in the dispatch, and that there was some other cause beside the pimple to induce the fatal act. It is, however, a fact to be deplored that young people are apt to be proud of their personal beauty, and to dread as the worst calamity anything that would impair it. Parents and teachers ought to earnestly repress this tendency (Jer. 13 : 15).

CERTAIN SINGULAR SUBJECTS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And I gave unto Isaac Jacob and Esau: and I gave unto Esau mount Seir, to possess it; but Jacob and his children went down into Egypt."—JOSHUA 24 : 4.

The Autograph of the Deity—I. History and the Hand of God in it—Precision in Apparent Tangle—The Wrong Side of the Carpet—Traces of the Hand of God — Remarkable Men at Special Periods — In all Great Events — Anecdote of Wellington — What the Sects Fight about — Why Newspapers should be Read—The Hand of God in Personal History—II. THIS passage, though audibly uttered by the mouth of Joshua, is to be regarded as the immediate voice of God. Joshua said unto all the people, "Thus saith Jehovah, God of Israel." Jehovah reminded the tribes, and their elders and judges, of all that He had done, and of all that He had been to them; and from this He challenged their allegiance, requiring that they should henceforth be loyal unto their great Benefactor. Addressing them Himself, His argument became all the more impressive. We have here, not so much a letter dictated by God, as the actual autograph of the great Father. May the Holy Spirit give us eyes wherewith to perceive the treasures which lie before us in these words—"I gave unto Isaac Jacob and Esau: and I gave unto Esau mount Seir, to possess it; but Jacob and his children went down into Egypt."

I. The first thing that I discern here is history and

THE HAND OF GOD IN IT.

See: "I gave;" and then again, "I gave." It is not merely that Esau and Jacob were born of Isaac and Rebekah, but the Lord says, "I gave unto Isaac Jacob and Esau." How plainly does this declare that the hand of God is in human history! At first sight history seems a great tangle, a snarl, a confusion; but on looking at it more closely we perceive that it is only in appearance a maze, but in fact a marvellous piece of arrangement, exhibiting perfect precision and never failing accuracy. Our carnal reason sees the wrong side of the carpet, and it appears to be without design or order; but there is another side to history, and looked at from that standpoint it reveals a pattern wonderful for beauty, displaying wisdom and goodness unparalleled. The histories of nations are, from the human side, little more than a narration of the crimes of kings and the follies of their people; and yet, viewed from another quarter, they are the record of the dealings of God with men, the story of love's labor to reclaim the lost.

We see the hand of God in history very strikingly in the raising up of remarkable men at certain special periods. It is true, as the Lord says, "I gave unto Isaac Jacob and Esau:" children are the gift of God. This is true not only of Isaac but of all mortal men. God gave to a worthy couple, George Washington; to another pair, John Howard; and to a third, George Whitefield. Each of these, in His own special way, was a divine gift to men. Children are born with differing talents, and varied capacities, but all about them which will make them blessings is the gift of God. I shall not tarry to mention great men whose names mark from which men date an increase of light and happiness; but let no man think of these friends and leaders of mankind without admitting the hand of God in their birth, training, disposition, and ability.

When the negro slave had borne long years of bondage, and hope of deliverance seemed far away, it was God that gave an Abraham Lincoln, who led the nation onward till "Emancipation" flamed upon its banners. Long before, when England, free in every corner of it, yet held slaves in its colonies, it was God that gave Wilberforce, and raised him up to plead in Parliament the rights of men. In all such acts of righteousness the coming forth of must be attributed to God's own hand. The men themselves may not know wherefore they have come to power: of them it might often be said as the Lord said of Cyrus, "I girded thee, though thou hast not known me." The mighty ones that contend for wrong, and bind the chains, and forge the fetters of the oppressed, do not know the champions who are predestined to overturn them, but God knows, and that is enough. Tyrants have always just cause to be afraid, for every birth may produce a deliverer. Somewhere in a hovel there may sleep in a rude cradle the boy who shall shake the throne of evil. As yet it has always happened in due season that Pharaoh has been confronted by Moses, and the princes of Midian by Gideon. For every Sisera there is a Jael; and for every Goliath a David. The upas tree may increase its deadly shadow, but an axe is sharpening for the felling of it.

Let us bless and praise the Lord, as we look back in history upon God's manifest interference with the course of events by the singular births of men whom He has used to effect His own divine purposes. Nobody denies that the hand of God is in the coming of men for the hour when the hour calls for the men.

So also is the hand of God distinctly to be seen

IN ALL GREAT EVENTS.

If Esau captures Mount Seir, then the setting up of the Edomite dominion, bad as it may have been, is from another point of view a matter in which God's purpose and design are to be noted, for He says—"I gave Esau mount Seir." In everything that happens, be it small or great, the Lord is present, and His will is done. It is so in all the plottings and manœuvrings of kings and princes and senates, in the stirs of public opinion, in the marchings of armies, and in all that transpires among mortal men. Though the iniquity of a man is seen abundantly, yet the overruling power of God is never absent. The world is not left to itself, given over to the lord of misrule; but in all events the hand of God may be perceived by all who care to perceive it. I reckon war to be a huge crime on man's side, but, when battalions have marched against battalions, the destiny of empires, and possibly of the whole race of man, has turned upon the health of a commander, the clearness of his eye, or the quickness of his messenger; yea, the turning aside of a bullet, or the fall of a horse, or the breaking of an axle, has become the pivot of history, the turning point of ages; and there at the centre the Lord has been surely ready.

It is singular how God is seen, both in dangers and preservations, in connection with crises of history.

WELLINGTON AT WATERLOO

sat on his horse, Copenhagen, all day long. A friend of mine, well known to most of you, said to him, "I suppose your horse must have been very weary." "No," said the duke, "he was so fresh that when I got off from him he threw his heels into the air, and almost struck my temples. I was not in greater danger all through the battle than at that moment." God had preserved the hero all that live-long day, and we little know what had been the result if a chance slug or ball had carried him off, and yet you see when the red mouth of war was growing silent the Iron Duke was still in jeopardy. Had he been suddenly cut off our island might have become an insignificant province of a vast Napoleonic empire; but he was immortal till his work was done. Above the awful din of war I hear the voice of God; even out of such an evil, which makes earth for the while like hell, the good Lord of all produces good.

We think of this poor world with great sadness, when we see all the crime and sin which defile it, and yet we join with Galileo in saying, "It does move though!" Truth makes progress: the right is winning. If we do not see an improvement to-day, or to-morrow, yet take any twenty years, and you will see that the world is moving — moving on to that grand day when the song shall ascend, Hallelujah, Hallelujah; for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth! As the Lord's hand was in Esau's possession of Mount Seir, so is it in the settlement of every tribe and people, and it is to be seen by all observant eyes in all the great epochs of the history of man.

Yet please to notice that whenever we say this —and I say it pretty plainly—we

and folly of man. We speak of predestination and foreknowledge, because we find these truths in Scripture; and they seem to us to be facts in the very nature of things. God knows all that happens; else were He no God, or a poor, blind deity; and if He knows that a certain fact will happen, then it is a fixed and settled thing, depend on that. Nothing happens other than God foreknew would happen, and therefore it is fixed. If I laid aside predestination, yet foreknowledge would be quite enough for me. Yet this fixedness is perfectly consistent with the free agency and responsibility of man. Man thinks, and resolves, and acts as freely, and as much of his own accord, as if there were no foreknowledge and no God. I can join heartily with the advocate of free agency when he talks of man's voluntariness in his acts of sin, his wilful choice of evil, his rejection of Christ and of His grace. No man can too thoroughly believe in the wilful guilt of the wicked; at any rate, I will go all lengths in such a belief.

I couple with what is called Calvinistic doctrine the other doctrine of free agency and responsibility, which seems to me to be equally true; and if this be judged to be an inconsistency the remark does not stagger me, for I see no inconsistency, and do not believe that any exists. My God is not a mere omnipotent being, who can rule dead materialism, and compel insensible atoms to do His will; but He can rule free agents, leaving them absolutely free, and yet effecting all His purposes with them. God's eternal purposes are accomplished, and yet men remain responsible free agents both in their beginning and in their ending. Do you say that you do not understand how this can be? Neither do I, but I believe it. There are ten thousand other things in nature and history which are too high for me to understand their "how" and "why," and yet I see them; can I not also make sure of some matters which I do not see? It is not for me to profess to comprehend the nature or the ways of the Infinite; if we could comprehend the Lord, He would not be the infinite God.

Do you not know that in theology—all the false part of theology—the part on which the sects stand and fight each other—consists of which are intended to bridge the distance between two awful truths which look as if they were divided from each other. The great rocky truths are in effect accepted by both parties, but the battle waxes hot concerning these cobweb-bridges which were never worth a tithe of the ingenuity which has been wasted upon them. I hold it true that God is in history, and in everything; and I read the newspaper that I may see how my heavenly Father governs the world; and this I believe though I most clearly see that men sin wilfully, and wickedly, and voluntarily, and that they are guilty free agents in all their wrong-doing. These thoughts come to me when I remember the character of Esau, and yet read the Lord's words, "I gave unto Esau mount Seir, to possess it."

To us, dear friends, the hand of God is very visible in our own case. No person can deny that our parentage is beyond our own power, and yet to a large extent it colors the whole future of life. Is not the hand of God in it? Why shall one be born of a long succession of drunkards and of thieves, and have within himself an insatiable passion born with him to imitate them; while another inherits a sound constitution from his parents, and, though he has no tendency to the grace of God, yet he has a tendency to morality, and naturally develops self-restraint and gentle manners? Do we not see the hand of God in the parents that He gave us? I cannot be so blind as to deny my own obligation; I shall forever bless God that I was given to a godly couple whose delight it was to lead me in the ways of God.

And do we not see the hand of God, again, in our children? Many of us do. Oh, how some of us bless and praise God that ever such sons fell to our lot; we never think of them without delight, for they are living in the service of the Lord Jesus, spending and being spent in the divine Master's service. Look at your children as the gifts of God, and if they are not yet all that you could desire, yet still believe that God has given them to you, even as He says, "I gave Isaac Jacob and Esau." They are not to be viewed as the unhappy fruit of an unhallowed union, but as gifts of God, to be brought up for Him, and trained in His fear. They come not as the result of uncleanness, but as gifts from the Lord, to whom marriage is an honorable estate. It were a sad thing if the sight of my child made me blush for shame; but it is a joy to look upon him as, like Samuel, asked of God, and given of God. Bring these gifts of God to God, and say, "Here, Lord, are the children which Thou hast given me. Save them of Thy grace, since in love Thou hast given them to me."

II. Secondly, we have another lesson to learn from our text, and that is upon

BIRTH AND ITS DISAPPOINTMENTS.

"I gave unto Isaac Jacob and Esau," twin children born of godly parents. In that birth there was joy, but sorrow came by it as well as joy. What joy there was in Isaac's house that day, for we read that it had been a matter of prayer in the family! See Genesis 25: 21. It had been a grief to Isaac that, married at forty years of age, he had lived twenty years in married life without a child, although he had the promise of a seed. Lo! on a day it happend that Esau and Jacob were born. There was joy; yea, double joy, because two sons had come to build up their father's house. Ah, had they known it, there was grave cause for mingled emotion in that double birth! We read that forty years after Esau married, and he took unto himself two Canaanite wives, "which were a grief of mind unto Isaac and to Rebekah." Yes, we may fondly promise ourselves that children born of godly parents will be an unalloyed comfort to them; and yet it may not be so.

Children are certain cares, and doubtful comforts. They may bring to their parents such sorrow that they may be inclined to think the barren happier than the fruitful. Hence it is well for us to leave our hopes of posterity with God; and if we reckon that in a childless house we have missed a great joy, we ought also to reckon that we have missed a mint of trouble by the same fact. Your children are not born in grace, but they are the children of nature; and that being the case, you may have to see in one of them—God grant it may be in no more!—an Esau, yes, a profane person, who will sell his birthright, and become an enemy of the people of God. Esau was born of admirable parents, and so an Esau may be found to your boundless grief in your own family. It has been so aforetime with others, and it may be so with you; the lion's whelp has been found in the sheep's fold, the vulture has been hatched in the dove's nest.

It is a great advantage to you, my dear young friend, to have been born into a Christian family; but I charge you, do not trust in it as though it were in itself a guarantee of salvation. Isaac, the beloved of God, has Esau for a son. Mind you that. David had to sorrow over Absolom, and Hezekiah over Manasseh. You may be the Esau of your family. Is it so? May God grant that such a dreadful portion may not be chosen by you! And, oh, you that are in the family, and have through divine mercy become a Jacob and not an Esau, ascribe it all to sovereign grace, and give God the praise; but forget not your brother! While he lives have hope of him, and see what you can do that he also may rejoice in the Lord.

We have prayer often at dying beds; why have we not more prayer in the chamber of birth? Surely, when an immortal spirit starts upon its endless career, it is well for us to cry to God and ask others to join with us in the loving, earnest prayer that the Holy Spirit may cause the newly-born to be born again as soon as they are able to know Jesus and believe in Him. There stands the fact; in birth there is joy tempered with godly fear, hope mingled with sacred anxiety, and high advantage which may yet most sadly end in deepened responsibility and increased sin.

III. Thirdly, and very briefly, we have next to view

WORLDLINGS AND THEIR POSSESSIONS.

"I gave unto Esau mount Seir, to possess it." That is to say, Esau, as compared with Jacob, appeared to have the best of it, for he had "mount Seir, to possess it;" but poor Jacob had not a foot of land that he could call his own except the family sepulchre at Machpelah, wherein afterward he slept the sleep of the righteous.

Why does God so often give possessions to ungodly men? Why do they flourish? Why do they have their portion in this life? Is it not, first, because God thinks little of these things, and therefore gives them to those of whom He thinks little? "Why," said Luther, in his day, "the whole Turkish empire is but a basket of husks that God gives to the hogs, and therefore He hands it over to the unbelievers." Something infinitely better is reserved for the Lord's own family. The rich blessing of true grace He reserves for His children and heirs. It shows how little God thinks of kingdoms, and empires, and great riches, for He leaves these full often to the worst of men. How few saints have ever worn crown or coronet! A holy man once said that the kings who have gone to heaven might almost be counted on your fingers. See what small account the Lord makes of store. Do you wish that ungodly men should have less? For my part, I am reconciled to their present prosperity, for it is all they ever will have. Poor souls, let them have as much of it as they may here; they have nothing hereafter. Besides, they have no God; and having no God, it would take a great many fortunes to make a godless man's portion worth a straw. Let those have the treasures of this present evil world who have nothing else. Never quarrel with the Lord for saying, "I gave unto Esau mount Seir, to possess it." Besides, these comforts may lead them to reflect upon God's bounty to them; and at any rate they ought to move them to repentance.

Worldly goods have no necessary connection with ungodliness. There is no infection in harvest stores, nor iniquity in the wealth which comes of commerce. In themselves gold and silver are harmless metals. There have been men who have enjoyed the abundance of this world, and yet have inherited the world to come. Not many great men after the flesh are chosen; but there is a great difference between "not many" and "not any." Pray, therefore, that the rich may be brought to Christ. Why should not that fish be taken which hath the silver shekel in its mouth? There is no evil in having goods; but there is great evil in making those goods our chief good.

Yet, brethren, so it is that the men of this world usually have the most of it; I do not say the best of it. It is, and always will be, a mystery as long as the world stands, that the wicked often flourish and the righteous suffer. Read the Book of Job; read the thirty-seventh Psalm; read the seventy-third Psalm; and see how holy men and wise men have been perplexed and troubled by the method of the divine providence. To see wickedness on a throne and righteousness in a dungeon, pride enshrined in honor, and holiness rolled in the kennel, is a serious trial of our confidence in God, and yet there are weighty reasons why it should be so for awhile. Not without wisdom doth the Lord say, "I gave to Esau mount Seir, to possess it."

IV. Now, comes the fourth point, and a great mystery too. Here are

THE CHOSEN AND THEIR TRIALS.

"I gave unto Esau mount Seir, to possess it; but Jacob and his children went down into Egypt." That is their portion. They must go down into Egypt because of famine, and they must suffer there under a tyrant's iron rod, so that they may become familiar with the drudgery of slaves. Is not this a strange thing? To him whom God loves best He allots the hardest condition. Esau's sons are dukes, but Jacob's seed are drudges. The worldling would read the Scripture as if it said, "As many as I love, I caress and pamper;" but the Lord speaketh not so; His word is, "As many as I love I rebuke and chasten." ("Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth, and scourgeth"—that is a very hard word—"scourgeth every son whom He receiveth." To carnal reason this seems strange; faith alone can explain it.

But Israel and his children went down into Egypt, first, for their preservation. So God brings His people into trial often to preserve them from the world and its evil influences, from themselves and their natural pride, from Satan and his puffings up. By sorrow and adversity the children of God are driven to their knees, brought near to their great Father, and kept in fellowship with Him. Sanctified afflictions are spiritual promotions. The salt and bitterness of sorrow often preserves men from the gall and bitterness of sin.

They went down into Egypt, next, for their improvement; for the family of Jacob was in a mournful condition, and by no means fit to be used of the Lord. The story of Jacob's family is a strangely sad one; perhaps Scripture does not contain a more mournful page. The evil influence of polygamy is clearly seen, blended with the errors of Laban's house, and envenomed by the foul example of the Canaanites among whom they sojourned. It was time that they should shift their quarters; they were neither getting good nor doing good. It looked as if the patriarch would found an ignorant, quarrelsome, vicious race; and so they were sent down into Egypt that trouble might teach them better manners. God often thrusts His people into adversity that He may improve them, arouse them, instruct them, and ennoble them. See to it, brethren, that the Lord's design be fulfilled in you to the full.

They also went down into Egypt for their education. The chosen seed needed teaching; they were getting to be rustic, not to say barbarous, in their manners; acquirements and knowledge were scant among them. They must go down into the seat of ancient learning to acquire arts and sciences, and civilization. The Lord teaches us on and we are often rapped over the knuckles by the stern master. It is wonderful what we learn when we are taken among the thorns. I hardly think that I have learned anything except in affliction; at least, this I know—I owe more to the hammer, and the anvil, and the file, and the furnace than I do to all the green meads and flowing brooks and singing birds that I have ever seen or heard. I fear that I have learned little beyond that which has been whipped into me; and though I am not fonder of the rod than you are, I confess that such sweet fruit grows on the bitter bough of trial that I would fear to be long without it. For future usefulness it is well that we bear present sorrow, and like Jacob go down into Egypt.

And they went down to Egypt, again, that God might display His great power in them. I would not care to be Esau on Mount Seir when once I see Pharaoh's hosts drowned, and Israel marching through the depths of the sea, and when I hear the song of the Israelitish maidens, and the shouts of the men, "Sing ye to Jehovah, for He hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath He thrown into the sea." It is worth while to go down into Egypt to come out of it with a high hand and an outstretched arm. Little boots it that Esau has Mount Seir for a possession; Israel has her God. No foot of land perhaps you call your own; you do not know where your next suit of clothes will come from, and God has kept you on short commons, and multiplied your straits and needs; never mind—yours is the lot of the chosen; for "Jacob and his children went down into Egypt."

That is where the story ends, according to my text; but you know the story does not end there after all; for out of Jacob and his children came the Star, the Sceptre, and the Throne. The Godhead took up the seed of Israel; and now to-day he that sprang of Jacob's loins, according to the flesh, sits on the highest throne of God, and reigns supreme. The Shiloh has come, and it matters nothing what Egypt brought of sorrow unto Jacob's seed, seeing that out of them at the last came the King and Saviour of men. If Jesus be ours, the rest is a small affair. Give me Christ, and I ask nothing else. Having faith in Jesus, I can leave all things else with the great Disposer of events. Christ and a crust; the promise and a parish coat; grace and an almshouse! Cannot a saint be more than content with these?

So have I set before you the varying lots of God's own people and of the wicked. I hope that you are ready to say that you would rather suffer affliction with the people of God than enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season. God help you to make that wise choice, and to make it at once. May His Spirit lead you to take the Lord Jesus to be your all in all. Amen.

THE OPIUM SMOKER'S PROGRESS.

OUR illustrations on the next page represent the downward progress of the victim of the vice which has worked most disastrous results in China, and is fast spreading among the better classes of society in our own land. The first picture depicts the Chinaman at the commencement of the habit. A luxurious, wealthy man who knows nothing of the toil which makes the sleep of a laboring man sweet, procures a small quantity of the drug which he places in the pipe and smokes. He is soon wrapped in delicious slumber. How grateful he is for the drug that brings him the blessing only those understand who have tossed on beds from which sleep has been banished by physical or mental suffering. So far, opium has proved a blessing, and physicians know how great a blessing it is to patients, who, without it, must sink under continuous pain which prevents recuperation of sleep.

But there is another side to the picture. Let the patient be taught how to use the drug himself, either by smoking it, or eating it, or injecting it under the skin, and he has at hand a remedy to which he is apt to fly for every ill, mental or physical. Has he a toothache? opium will give him relief. Has he a headache? opium will soothe the throbbing brain. Is he exasperated and annoyed? opium will calm the perturbed spirit. Is he distressed and anxious? opium renders him equable and philosophical. Is he overworked and weary? opium relieves the strain. The potent remedy for all these ills is sure to be brought into frequent use in a world so full of trouble.

Then comes the revelation to the victim. Opium has become a necessity to him. He can do nothing without it. He needs it to give him nerve for his daily business, and he needs it to give him repose at night. Take away his opium, and he sinks into a poor, trembling wreck. When the hour comes at which he is accustomed to take it, he must have it. His hands tremble, his knees bend under him, his face assumes a deadly pallor, he yawns and gapes and starts, his eyes have an unnatural craving fire in them, and his voice becomes husky and hoarse. Woe to the man who tries to exert his influence then and restrains the victim from recourse to opium. Though the victim be ordinarily the kindest and most genial of men, he will strike his best friend in those moments, or commit any crime to obtain the drug which has become to him the staff of life.

The man is a slave. Self-emancipation is hopeless. His only hope is to place himself under medical treatment and restraint. Then the ordeal is terrific, and many a man has gone mad, and many another has died under it. Few have the courage or physical stamina to endure it, and rather than undertake it they continue slaves to the habit until they die. In the city of New York to-day there are hundreds of men who are doing their work on this wretched support.

The second illustration depicts a later stage of the habit. There the Chinaman has sunk into the debauched condition. He spends his time in sleeping and smoking. He is careless of his affairs, and they have drifted into confusion. Poverty has come upon him like an armed man. He is without energy and is wrapped up in a semi-idiotic stupor. The once wealthy Chinaman is now dependent on charity, and sits openly receiving it, as seen in the picture.

The so-called pleasures of opium do not attend this stage of indulgence. The agent that brought relief and pleasant dreams has cast off the mask, and is now a relentless, vindictive oppressor. Let any who are tempted from motives of curiosity to try the effects of opium, listen to the narratives of the miserable victims, and they will be deterred.

It is time these facts were more fully known, for the empire of opium is rapidly extending. Let the reader stand for an hour and watch the door of an opium-den in New York or San Francisco, or almost any great city, and see the victims of the drug pass in and out, and he will witness a spectacle more distressing even than that terrible one of the victims of alcohol.

RECALLED FROM REASON TO FAITH.

A YOUNG man was sitting in his own room busily engaged with books and papers which littered his table and the floor around his chair. His thoughtful face showed him to be a hard student and one who, if all went well with him, would be likely to make his mark in the world. He was studying medicine, and the time was near at hand when he hoped to receive his diploma and commence practice. He was even now engaged in preparing for his examination. In the midst of his labor a knock had been twice given on his door without eliciting from him any response. Now the door was quietly opened, and a subdued voice said :

"Sorry to disturb you, Mr. Henry, but a lady is waiting to see you. She is in the library."

"All right," said the young man, "tell her I will be down presently." He sighed heavily, annoyed at the interruption to his work, but accepting the inevitable, he rose and went at once to ascertain who his visitor was, and what she wanted.

"Ah! Mrs. Wilson," he said, as he entered and saw the lady who was seated near the open window of the library, "I should not have been vexed at being called if I had known it was for the pleasure of seeing you. How is Alfred? Is he coming home soon?"

"Yes, Mr. Roberts, I am expecting him today. I have come over to the city to meet him. The most delightful thing has happened, which I expect will be as great a surprise to you as it was to me. I know you have not heard of it, for Alfred says in his letter to me that he has not told you, although you are so intimate. He is bringing home his wife, and she is of all the girls I know the very one I should have chosen for him. I want you to come and see them soon, and I thought I would call upon you myself to make sure of your coming, as I so seldom travel away from home now. You will find Alfred a great deal altered, I expect. A blessed change has taken place in him since you saw him. He has given his heart to Christ, and is a very happy young man. It was the father of his bride who was the means God used for his conversion, and I believe his young wife is also a devoted Christian. I cannot tell you how deeply grateful I am that this change has been brought about. Alfred will know now a happiness he could never have enjoyed any other way in the world."

"It is indeed a surprise," said Henry Roberts, "and I am glad that you are glad, but is it not rather premature, Mrs. Wilson, to predict Alfred's happiness so confidently because he has gone in for religion and won a wife? I can understand happiness being the product of the latter arrangement, but as to the former, I do not think, as a rule, that religious people are the happiest people."

"There I think you are wrong, Mr. Roberts. I base my hopes of Alfred's happiness on his religion rather than on his marriage, although I think that will add to it. How can it be otherwise? The man who loves and trusts God is raised above the ordinary trials of life. They come to him as to other people. Indeed, he frequently suffers more than other people, but consider his consolations. He knows that God is watching over him, and that not one of his trials comes without the consent of his heavenly Father, and that every one is permitted to fall upon him for some special purpose. He trusts his whole life into God's hands, and he is content knowing that there is no need for worry, or distress, or anxiety, but that God will do all things well."

"Yes, it is a comfortable doctrine, I suppose, if a man can bring himself to believe in it, but I have generally found that religious men are as anxious about their business and their prospects as other people. I do not think the majority of religious people enjoy such serene peace as you describe. As for myself, I am drifting farther and farther away from faith altogether."

"I am sorry to hear that, Mr. Roberts, for I am sure you are drifting farther and farther from happiness. And, what is still more serious, you can have no hope of heaven. Have you never considered what will become of your soul after death?"

"Yes, that used to trouble me once, and, in fact, it was the starting point from which I drifted to my present condition. I could find nowhere in my anatomical studies any evidence that man possesses a soul. In the dissecting room we can find his brain and all the organs of life, but there is no trace of what you call the soul, and so far as I can discover or men far more learned than I have ever found out, the thing you call soul is but the breath. I am not at all certain that man when he dies will ever live again or has any existence apart from the body. In fact, I think all the evidence points the other way."

"I cannot argue that question with you, Mr. Roberts," said Mrs. Wilson, "but I can pray for you, and I shall do that. If you are seriously seeking for truth, God will take care that you find it. Now you will certainly come to see my boy and his wife, and in the mean time I shall pray that Alfred's influence may draw you in the same direction."

Henry Roberts returned to his books puzzled by the interview. It seemed strange to him that Mrs. Wilson should feel so certain of her faith and should be so anxious that he also should come to feel the same conviction as to himself. She had said she should pray for him; he wondered whether the darkness of scepticism and materialism, so fatally closing around his mind, would be lifted by her prayers. Would he feel any result from them? No, he thought not; it was all superstition, a theory good for women, but not one to be held by men of reason and students of science. It was a pity to disturb such faith; he would not do it for the world, but he could not accept it himself. That, too, was a curious fact, he thought. Here was he in his enlightenment looking down scornfully on the faith of others, yet reluctant to bring them to the position he occupied, and here was this Christian lady so happy and joyous that she desired to draw him into the same happiness she enjoyed. It would seem that her condition was the enviable one. So he puzzled and argued with himself, and his books were forgotten. He had in earlier years prayed at his mother's knee, and read the Bible as God's Book, and it was but lately that he had abandoned faith and trusted his bark on the rapids of reason and materialism. He would certainly see his friend, Alfred Wilson, at the earliest opportunity, and learn from him how religion had affected him.

Henry Roberts' Visitor.

Not many days had passed away before Alfred himself looked him up. He greeted his old friend heartily, and congratulated him on his marriage. For a time they talked of lighter topics, but Alfred Wilson was eager that his friend should come to know of the light that had shone in upon his soul, and persuaded him to go home with him and spend a few days quietly where he would have opportunities for more serious thought. Henry readily consented, and leaving his studies he returned with his friend.

The results of that visit were momentous ones for him. Alfred, like his mother, would not argue with the young philosopher. "I want you to know this joy, Henry," he said, "and that knowledge will not come by argument." He was right. It was by loving conversation, earnest pleading, and agonizing prayer that the light entered Henry's soul. Like the blind man our Saviour healed, he could say, "One thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see." When he left his friend's house he was rejoicing in a peace and joy no doubts could move and no philosophy could have given.

THE COMING TEN-KINGDOMED ALLIANCE.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

THE Triple Alliance of Germany, Austria, and Italy is a straw showing the direction of the wind. The object is avowedly to promote the peace of Europe by a strong offensive and defensive alliance against the aggressiveness of France. The latter Power seems at present to be almost isolated, and therefore unlikely ever to venture on a war against Germany, as the latter would be assisted by Austria and Italy.

Nevertheless we know from Daniel and Revelation that a Ten-Kingdomed (not merely a Triple) Alliance will soon be organized in Europe, as prefigured by the Ten-Toed Image and the Ten-horned Wildbeast in Daniel 2 : 35 ; 7 : 24.

There must soon be a war between France on the one hand, and Germany on the other—resulting in the defeat of Germany and enlargement of France to the Rhine, and formation of Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Austria, Greece, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, and Hungary into a Ten-kingdomed Alliance.

The emblematic representation of Cæsar's Roman Empire in the last days as a wild beast—one corporate body—with ten horns, which are stated to signify ten kings, plainly implies that those future ten Rulers of its entire territorial area will be allied together in one confederacy, forming a diversity in unity. Ten horns on one body cannot be otherwise than organically and federally united, and must move concurrently in the same direction. Where one horn goes, the others must go. One will not be able to act independently of another, as is the case at the present time, when almost all those kingdoms are standing apart from each other; and as regards Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Austria, Turkey, etc., there is actually no formal alliance between any two of them.

The same federal union of the ten kings as component parts of one political corporation is symbolized by their being represented as the Ten Toes of a Human Image in Nebuchadnezzar's prophetic dream. They are all like branches on one trunk—limbs of one body, federated and integral.

Some extraordinary events must ere long come to pass in order to produce such an astounding result as an offensive and defensive Alliance and Confederacy of the ten nations of the Roman Empire. It is puzzling to conceive why they should ever resort to such a step, unless it be for mutual defence against some common foe, and where can there be found an antagonist sufficiently formidable to provoke the uprising against itself of such a ten-kingdomed confederacy, unless it be either North Germany or Russia, or both Powers combined, as they are the only Great Powers in Europe that are outside the Roman Empire, and which therefore will not form part of the Confederacy.

The transformation of all the existing twenty-three countries of Cæsar's Roman Empire into exactly ten kingdoms does not necessarily involve an alliance or confederacy being made between even any two of them. This transformation might be effected, and yet each of the ten might stand aloof from the others in isolated independence, just as at present Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Austria, etc., are independent of each other.

Hence the prediction that the latter-day ten kingdoms are to be compactly allied together so as to form a Ten-kingdomed Confederacy, is a further and distinct fact in addition to the prediction that their number is to be exactly ten. As the thirty-eight States of the American Union under their separate Governors form one United States, so in much the same manner the future Ten Kingdoms under their separate Ten Kings will form one United Confederacy.

PETER BLAKE'S VOYAGE.

A SERIAL STORY BY HESBA STRETTON.

The Pangs of Remorse.

AFTER Arthur Penrose had swallowed the draught he found himself falling asleep, with a strange and pleasant feeling of rest and forgetfulness stealing over him. When he awoke, some hours later, he felt stronger and better, though none the less miserable. He lay still for some time without stirring, brooding over the calamity, with all its agonizing details, through which the Dolphin had been lost. Presently he could bear his solitude no longer, and he sprang up in haste. He was feverishly impatient to see Fleck, for Fleck was the only one who had been saved. He crept down-stairs tremulously, feeling all his nerves unstrung. The house was a large one, and evidently an hotel. As his footsteps made themselves heard, the watchful landlord appeared, and opened the door of a private room.

"I've ordered a fire in here for you, sir," he said; "it's more cheery, though it is not a chilly day. This is a very awkward place to be in in stormy weather. Our communication is cut off sometimes for days together, and there's not much chance of running over to Guernsey at present. Our steamer brought us in the mails yesterday, just before the storm. You'll be anxious to communicate with your friends, I fear, sir?"

"There is no hurry," answered Penrose, mournfully.

"Well, well!" said the landlord. "Fleck, the sailor that was saved with you, sir, says you'd be wanting to charter our Queen of the Isles, cost what it would, and I have been sending out to see if I could find a crew. But not a man in the island will risk his life at present. You'll be forced to stay for awhile."

"I have no wish to leave," said Penrose.

"That's well," he continued; "we're going to bury the poor little cabin-boy to-morrow, and perhaps, if you feel well enough, you'd choose to follow him to the grave. But just as you please."

"Where is he?" asked Penrose, waking up to more interest in his landlord's conversation.

"He's lying up-stairs," he replied; "the crew of the life boat picked him up in the water, but he was quite dead, poor little fellow. It was all over with him when they found him."

"Let me see him," said Penrose.

Victor's body was lying in a westerly room, and the light of the setting sun shone full upon his face as Penrose stood looking down upon it. He asked the landlord to leave him alone with it. The pale placid face, with the eyelids closed over the eyes that had been so bright yesterday morning, wore a smile, partly of surprise, partly of joy. It looked very young and untroubled; there were no hard lines or wrinkles in it. The boy might have been sleeping, and dreaming happy dreams. It was almost as joyous as it had been when he was steering the boat that had gone to the rescue of Penrose.

He sat down beside the corpse, with his eyes fastened upon it, thinking. There seemed to come around the bed the images of those men who had formed the crew of the Dolphin. Strange that he should know all their faces as well as though they had been familiar to him all his life! But they were his father's victims, and he could not forget them. How many more had been hurried away into the same great and silent mystery of death, sinking unseen and unheard into the gloomy and secret depths of the sea? Their number he would never know. All he knew was that a fearful debt of crime against his fellow-men, and against God, lay to his father's charge, and descended to him by a fell inheritance.

He had been daintily fostered and unstintingly indulged upon the proceeds of these men's agonies. He had not eaten a meal or clothed himself with a garment that had not been bought with blood. His whole past life, that merry boyhood and sunny, pleasant youth, which had only ended yesterday, became a loathing to him. He longed to rid himself of it; to change lots with the poorest and meanest of men; to shake off his father's name and his father's claims upon him. In his utter wretchedness of soul he felt that he could never bear to look into his father's face again.

Why had he not died a few years ago while he was like this pale, quiet, smiling boy beside him? If he had but gone away while he loved and trusted his father, and knew no wrong in him! There was no one else in the world whom he had loved so much—no one who loved him so much. Yet he shrank painfully from going back to him, or of entering into any communication with him. No! he would never return to England. It was a good thing that he had been cast upon the coast of Alderney, whence he could pass either to Guernsey or France, and fade away from his father's ken, leaving no clue behind him by which he could be traced. He would never taste another morsel of his father's bread, nor set his foot across his father's blood-stained threshold.

The sun went down while he was still brooding over his despair. All night long the same thoughts and memories haunted him. When he was following Victor's rough coffin to the grave, he walked behind it as in a painful dream. He listened absently to the funeral service read over it, hearing little except the words, "In the midst of life we are in death; of whom may we seek for succor, but of Thee, O Lord, who for our sins art justly displeased." Yes! God was full of anger against sin, and what fearful sins had not his father committed against God! sins that must be visited upon himself, which were already being visited upon him!

He lingered behind, after every one else was gone away. The stormy sky was dark with clouds drifting rapidly before the westerly wind. The low and ceaseless roll of the waves breaking all along the rocky coast sounded mournfully in his ears. Scuds of rain followed one another at short intervals, and if the sun gleamed out for an instant, it shone through a mist upon the coffin which would hide forever the face of Victor from those who loved him, and who were still watching for him to come home to them, unconscious of their loss. Penrose lifted up his hand, and, as if addressing a crowd of witnesses, he said aloud, though in a low and awe-stricken voice:

"I swear to God that I will never look upon my father's face again, nor touch a penny of his money, until he repents, and makes what restitution he can for these crimes!"

After that he left the open grave with the autumn raindrops falling into it. He felt a miserable sense of satisfaction in his own fixed resolve. It seemed to him that he was doomed to be the avenger of blood against his own father, and that he was entering upon his doom, to suffer and to inflict a wretchedness that would in some measure meet the demands of justice. Human laws, at least in his own country, took no cognizance of such crimes, but divine laws did. His father had filled many a home with misery; now his own home should be desolate. He had robbed mothers of their sons, and he would never hear again his son's voice call him "Father." Many a heart-sickened woman was looking still for the return of those who could never come back; it was only just that his father's heart should sicken, and long in vain to know the fate of his only son!

That night Penrose matured his plans for the sad future that stretched before him. He found that he had nearly 50*l.* about him, besides a valuable watch and some jewelry. Half of his little fortune he must intrust to Fleck for the use of Victor's destitute family; and Fleck, too, must carry the news of his miraculous escape to his father. That should be all; he should not even know where he was going, so that no clue might be afforded for following him. As soon as the steamer began to ply again between Guernsey and Cherbourg, he would go to one place or the other, and then cut off every trace of his future steps.

Several days passed before there could be any communication with the outer world. The sea boiled like a great cauldron all about the island, and the strong westerly winds blowing over it from the Atlantic were charged with heavy rains. Fleck loudly declared his determination not to trust himself aboard any vessel again, as long as there was a chance of foul weather. It was his secret intention never to trust himself at sea again in the best ship afloat, after he had once reached England in safety. How he should get his living he could not tell; he had been bound to the sea from his boyhood, and he was now too old to learn any other craft. But he would rather beg his bread in lanes and by-ways, when he was out of sight of the police, than face the perils of the sea again.

At length came a partial calm. The little steamer made its way across to Guernsey, carrying a few passengers who had been weather-bound in Alderney, on their way from Cherbourg. But neither Penrose nor Fleck went in her. The young man, so lately the happy, prosperous son of a wealthy father, was suffering from a terrible fit of despondency, which had completely overmastered him. For Fleck the sea still wore too stormy a surface; besides, he did not care to stir until the owner's son was ready to go home. He was very anxious to keep in with young Mr. Penrose, who could put him into many a snug and safe berth on shore. So he made himself as attentive and necessary as he knew how to the broken-spirited gloomy young man, who did not seem in the least grateful that his own life had been spared.

The steamer brought back, among other things, fresh newspapers from Guernsey. Penrose sat down to read them listlessly. There was a long catalogue of casualties at sea, as there always is when the weather breaks up suddenly and autumn gales set in. His eye ran over these, but found no mention of the Dolphin. But as he turned the paper over, he caught sight of a paragraph headed, "Loss of a Ship and Crew in the Channel." He read it mechanically, and almost tranquilly, till he came to the closing sentences:

"The steamer Ellen, of Portsmouth, has picked up the mate of the ship Dolphin, outward bound to Algiers. He was found in an insensible condition, firmly lashed to the mizzen-mast. He states that the Dolphin was caught in a sudden squall in the Middle Channel, on the night of the 18th instant, and driven violently on the rocks surrounding the Channel Islands. There was no time to lower the boats, and the crew, numbering twelve men, besides captain and mate, must all have perished. There was also on board at the time the only son of James Penrose, Esq., a wealthy shipowner and wharfinger, well known in the London shipping trade. This gentleman, upon suddenly hearing the sad intelligence, was seized with an access of disease of the heart, to which he has long been subject, and is now lying in a hopeless condition at his residence in Onslow Square."

For a few minutes Penrose sat stunned and bewildered. This possibility had never entered his thoughts. He had not even known that his father was suffering from any disease, though he knew that he always lived a very moderate, careful life, sharing in none of the luxuries and splendors his wealth could purchase. He had harbored the idea of his father mourning over himself, either as dead or as lost to home in voluntary exile; but it had never crossed his mind that a man, who could quite tranquilly send crew after crew afloat in rotten vessels, could not bear the shock of hearing that his only son had been cast away, and had perished at sea. A sudden revulsion of tenderness toward his dying father came over him. It could not be true what Captain Norcott and the crew of the Dolphin had asserted. Surely he knew his father better than any one of them.

He lost no time in chartering the little steamer to run over again with him to Guernsey, whence he could sail the next morning for Southampton. Fleck was thrown into perplexity by this sudden decision. The water was still too rough for him to venture on it without an almost intolerable dread, yet he must stick close to young Mr. Penrose. He could not let him leave him behind in Alderney. But as he set foot upon the deck of the little boat, which tossed to and fro in the short chopping sea, he vowed that starvation itself should never drive him to a seafaring life again, let him once land in England in safety.

It was nearly midnight the next day when Penrose and Fleck reached London, after a tempestuous passage across the Channel. Even now Fleck would not part from his young master, as he called him; but, like a faithful though humble friend, he climbed up to the box beside the cab driver who took them up at Waterloo Station. Penrose was too preoccupied to notice him. All day long, sitting silent and comfortless on the paddle-box of the steamer, he had been pondering over, in his troubled brain, what he should say to his father, and how he could find out the truth or falsehood of the statement made by the captain of the Dolphin.

He had asked Fleck what he knew and thought about the ship, and Fleck had declared that he could say nothing against the Dolphin, and he had never been told that her owner was Mr. Penrose. He had sailed many a time in Penrose's ships, and right good ships they were, with good skippers in them, and the best of grog. The best times he had known as a seaman had been in Penrose's ships; that was true, if they were the last words he ever spoke in this world.

Fleck's assertion had cheered his spirits, though it did not perfectly reassure him. As he drove toward Onslow Square, he resolved to say nothing about his sad suspicions, until his father had quite regained his usual health. No doubt entered his mind that he would not recover, as soon as he found his lost son again, safe and sound.

There was no light about the house when they reached it; and he sprang out of the hack to ring the bell himself, softly, lest it should disturb his father. He felt very tenderly toward his father, whom he had been wronging by his suspicions. It was a long time before the low though continuous ringing, brought any answer. Then there came a gleam through the fanlight, and the door, with the chain on, was opened by the old butler.

"Let me in, Simmons," he said.

"Who is it?" asked the old servant, cautiously.

"Who is it?" he repeated. "Don't you know me, Simmons? How's my father?"

"It can't be Master Arthur!" exclaimed Simmons.

"It is," he answered; "I was saved from the wreck. Be quick, and let me in."

AT ANTIOCH IN PISIDIA.

S. S. Lesson for June 3, Acts 13: 13-16 and 43-52. Golden Text, ver. 32. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Progress of the Work—Mark's Fickleness—Paul's Sermon—Limits to the Power of Persecutors—The Touchstone of Doctrine—Glad Tidings Proclaimed—A Company of Inquirers—The Result of a Gospel Sermon—Persecution Stirred up.

THE work of the two evangelists in Cyprus was done, Sergius Paulus was left behind to care for the disciples who had been made there. Their next move was to Perga in Pamphylia, a province of Asia Minor, and here John (or Mark), the evangelist, (in the house of whose mother prayer was made for Peter on the night of his liberation) "departing from them, returned to Jerusalem." This young man had not counted the cost of a missionary's life, he was not yet entire for God. Their next station was Antioch in Pisidia (quite another than that Antioch in Syria where the disciples were first called Christians). Guided, doubtless, by God, they went into the synagogue on the Sabbath day, and sat down waiting for Him to open a door for them.

Perhaps some rumor of them had preceded their visit; in any case, "the rulers of the synagogue sent unto them, saying, Ye men and brethren, if ye have any word of exhortation for the people, say on." Paul was the spokesman, and led by the Holy Ghost, he took the Jewish audience back to their early history, and the way by which God had led them as a nation; His choosing of their fathers, His exalting them "when they dwelt as strangers in the land of Egypt" and bringing them out with a high arm, His suffering their manners in the wilderness, and after destroying seven nations in the land of Canaan His dividing their land to them by lot. Thus Paul drew the eye of these Asiatic Jews to God s dealings in faithfulness and love with His chosen people as told in the books of Exodus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, and Joshua. He then showed how after the time of the Judges, four hundred and fifty years, they denied a king, and after Saul's reign God "raised up David to be their king, to whom also He gave testimony, and said, I have found David, the son of Jesse, a man after Mine own heart, which shall fulfil all My will." Now Paul gets to his point, "Of this man's seed hath God according to His promise raised unto Israel

A SAVIOUR, JESUS."

Paul was preaching to a Bible-knowing and Bible-loving people, and it was necessary that he should prove his testimony to Jesus from the Scriptures themselves. The fulfilment of the promises of God seems to have been his strongest argument. How far his hearers had heard of Jesus, we know not. Doubtless news had gone abroad throughout the then known world about the sect of the Nazarenes, but probably the rumors which had reached them contained more of error than of truth. Thus, it may be they listened to Paul with no small curiosity. He spoke of John the Baptist as though he expected them to know to whom he was referring, and said how he had testified to Jesus, and then made his appeal, "Men and brethren, children of the stock of Abraham, to you is the Word of this salvation sent." God had raised up to Israel a Saviour, had fulfilled His promises in doing so, the Saviour had come and brought with Him salvation: now how would they treat both the Saviour and His salvation? Oh, we cannot, we may not get away from our responsibility. If God has raised up for us a Saviour, then in every sense of the word. If He has wrought for us salvation, then we ought to be in possession of His salvation, and if we are not so, we are guilty. In whatever way the Lord reveals Himself, we are bound by that very revelation to accept Him as that which He reveals Himself to be, whether it be as He who pardons, He who cleanses, He who anoints with the Holy Ghost, or He who heals the body. God never meant us to speculate about or to discuss His truths, we are responsible to accept them; "to you," He says, "is the Word of this salvation sent."

Paul went on boldly stating the facts which had happened, "For they that dwell at Jerusalem, and their rulers, because they knew Him not, not yet the voice of the prophets which are read every Sabbath day, they have fulfilled them in condemning Him." Oh, how mad are those who oppose themselves to God! He had before determined the length to which the enemies of His Son should go. And even now no wicked man can go one inch farther than God permits him, in working any injury to His children, the wicked are never really they are but instruments permitted to work out some purpose of God in trying His children.

Paul continued, "And though they found no cause of death in Him, yet desired they Pilate that He should be slain. And when they had fulfilled all that was written of Him, they took Him down from the tree and laid Him in the sepulchre." Paul most carefully noted that all which happened to Jesus had been foretold. Probably he pointed out the very Scriptures which spoke of His sufferings and death. Ps. 22, 69; Isa. 53, etc. Thus he spoke of the resurrection, "But God raised Him from the dead, and He was seen many days of them which came up with Him from Galilee to Jerusalem, who are His witnesses unto the people." The resurrection was always both with Jew and Gentile. If it could be proved that this Jesus of Nazareth had risen unaided from the dead, He must be God, and they could no longer consistently disbelieve in Him. This Paul knew, and after having asserted that there were witnesses to the fact, he applied it to his audience, proving still from Scripture all which he asserted, "And we declare unto you glad tidings, how that the promise which was made unto the fathers, God hath fulfilled the same unto us their children, in that He hath raised up Jesus again."

Perhaps the Antiochan Jews had looked upon all which they had heard of Jesus, and the sect of the Nazarenes as a curious item in the news of the day, but which had no way to do with them. But now, this strange teacher established a connection between themselves and this Jesus. Many are ready to discuss any religious doctrine with all the facility with which they would pronounce on anything in science which was a favorite matter of study. But what babbling it is, when they have not the experience! Men will talk about holiness, a clean heart or entire sanctification, judging and condemning right and left those who know by experience the plague of their own hearts, and who have learned the blessed secret of their own nothingness, and of a real absolute counting upon God to cleanse and keep them clean. They will condemn as sinful or fanatical those who abandon their bodies to the Lord as their Healer, and who find thereby precious spiritual and physical blessing; and all the time they are speaking of things which they know not, and to which their very spirit shows they are strangers.

Paul gave two Scripture proofs of Christ's resurrection, "Thou art My Son, this day have I begotten Thee" (Ps. 2: 7), and "Thou shalt not suffer Thine Holy One to see corruption" (Ps. 16: 10); and Paul thus argued, "For David, after he had served his own generation, by the will of God, fell on sleep, and was laid unto his fathers, and saw corruption; but He, whom God raised again, saw no corruption." Here was proof positive that the Holy One referred to was Christ, proof positive also that that Holy One, being dead, was not subject, as other human beings are, to the ordinary law of corruption and decay, that His death was the fulfilment of Scripture which prophesied, "The Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all" (Isa. 53: 6), and therefore the salvation of man was an accomplished fact. This was which Paul proclaimed, pressing it on their acceptance, and saying, "To you is the word of this salvation sent." Reader, be you Jew or Gentile, Mahommedan or pagan, to you is the word of this salvation sent, to you has God sent His only begotten Son to forgive and to deliver you from all sin. If you are not forgiven and delivered, it is because you do not, will not receive God's Son as your Saviour, you will not have to do with Himself, and unless you do you cannot be saved. "Be it known unto you, therefore, men and brethren, that is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins, and by Him all that believe are justified from all things, from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses." Through this Man! Prayer, repentance, confession, offerings of all kinds were familiar to them, but salvation through God made flesh, they had never understood. No credit could accrue to them from a salvation of this kind, they must be nothing, and Jesus all. What should become of all their righteousness, their keeping of the law, their position as children of Abraham, had they no claim to be justified thereby? No, it was only "through this Man."

The Jews went out of the synagogue, but the Gentiles, who had not so much reputation to maintain, begged that these words might be preached to them the next Sabbath. But when the congregation was broken up, there came round the preacher

A COMPANY OF INQUIRERS,

Jews and religious proselytes, i.e. Gentiles who had embraced the Jewish faith. Paul and Barnabas had no prejudice against inquiry meetings, they spoke with them, and persuaded them to continue in the grace of God. This made a great stir in the place; and the next Sabbath almost the whole city turned out to hear the Gospel. This was too much for the Jews, they never had such congregations; envy took possession of them, and they spoke against those things which were spoken of Paul, contradicting and blaspheming. It was no personal feeling, but a solemn burden of the Lord which made him say, "It was necessary that the Word of God should first have been spoken to you; but seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles, for so hath the Lord commanded us, saying, I have set Thee to be a light of the Gentiles that Thou shouldest be for salvation unto the ends of the earth." Oh, how the hearts of the Gentiles rejoiced, how they glorified God, believed and "published throughout all the region the glad news which had made them free." So much for the results of a single sermon full of Scripture and of the power of the Holy Ghost. Of course persecution followed, the Jews stirred it up, and they expelled Paul and Barnabas, but the disciples far from being injured, "were filled with joy and with the Holy Ghost."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

An Address has been Sent by the Pope to the Roman Catholic bishops in Ireland, which is expected to produce a marked influence on the National League agitation. The circular is couched in explicit and imperative language. In it the Pope says: "While it is lawful for the Irish to seek redress for their grievances and to strive for their rights, they should at the same time seek God's justice and remember the wickedness of illegal means in furthering even a just cause. It is the duty of the clergy to curb the excited feelings of the people and to urge justice and moderation. The clergy are not permitted to depart from these rules and join and promote movements inconsistent with them. Collections to relieve distress are permitted, but subscriptions to inflame popular passions are condemned. The clergy must hold aloof when it is plain that by such movements hatred and dissension are aroused or distinguished persons insulted, and when crimes and murders go uncensured and when patriotism is measured by the amount subscribed, for the people are thereby intimidated. Therefore the Parnell fund is disapproved, and no clergyman should recommend subscriptions thereto or promote it." The Irish leaders are exasperated by the Pope's circular, and are appealing to the people to boycott the Pope by cutting off his supplies of Peter's Pence. They declare that the circular has been obtained from the Pope by misrepresentation, and urge that the people should take their religion but not their politics from Rome.

Two of the Phœnix Park Murderers were hanged last week in Dublin. Joe Brady was executed on Monday and Daniel Curley on Friday. They were respectively the actual murderer of Lord F. Cavendish and Mr. Burke, and the commanding officer of the gang who did the bloody work. Both of them displayed firmness at the scaffold, and the ghastly office of the executioner was so mercifully performed that death was instantaneous. A large crowd assembled outside the jail at the time of the execution, and when the black flag rose above the walls in token that the drop had fallen, the immense throng simultaneously uncovered and commenced reciting the Popish prayers for the dead. They afterward dispersed in an orderly manner, but showing clearly that in the struggle between the government and the criminals their sympathies went with the latter.

The Release of James Carey, the Man who was one of the leaders in the Phœnix Park assassinations, and who turned informer and was the principal witness against his companions during their trials, was released from custody on Saturday. Carey declares that he intends to remain in Dublin, and, further, that he will vigorously prosecute those of the tenants occupying his premises who have refused to pay their rent since he became an informer. Ever since Carey turned informer his house has been guarded by policemen, and on his liberation the guard was doubled. It is announced by the press in Dublin that Carey's return to his home is only temporary, and that the Crown still holds him as a witness to testify in other cases. The Crown proposes to distribute the reward offered for the detection of the Phœnix Park murderers among the informers. It is believed that it will also send abroad forthwith all informers who desire to leave the country. It is doubtful whether Carey in giving his evidence to save himself at the expense of his colleagues has earned more detestation from Irishmen or Englishmen.

Another Nihilist Plot has been Discovered by the Russian police. A St. Petersburg cable dispatch says: "The police have been informed of the existence of a plot to frighten the horses of the Czar at some favorable opportunity during the procession at Moscow on his coronation, and in the confusion which would no doubt follow to kill the emperor. An officer of the Erivan regiment, who was recently arrested on suspicion of being engaged in the revolutionary movement, was subjected to a severe examination, during which he mentioned the names of several officers of the guards who, he declared, belonged to a revolutionary club. He stated, however, that the club pursued special objects and had no connection with the terrorists. The Czar on learning of this confession decided to postpone the date of his coronation, but was dissuaded from so doing."

A Treaty of Peace between Chili and Peru, it is reported, in a telegram from Valparaiso, has been made. The details are not given, and the account is so vague as to have occasioned doubts of its being genuine. It is, however, stated that the treaty has been signed by General Novoa and General Iglesias, and is said to have been confirmed. Peru cedes Tacna and Arica for ten years. At the end of that time a plebiscite is to be taken to determine to which country those provinces shall belong. The country acquiring them will pay indemnity.

The Malagese are Actively Engaged in strengthening their position to resist the expected attack of the French. The Times says: "The French on their part appear to be hanging back from any actual commencement of hostilities, 'their forces being inadequate to cope with the natives.' In this respect the experience of Russia in the Caucasus, of Holland in Sumatra, and of France herself among the Algerian mountains, is anything but encouraging. The warlike Malay race now inhabiting Madagascar will find formidable means of defence in its dense forests and pathless swamps, the deadly malaria of which will be a terrible weapon against the invader. Moreover, the north-western sea-board, which France wishes to seize, is under the sway of half a dozen independent kinglets, who will not be affected by any reverse of the Hova Government now presiding at Antananarivo."

The Throne on which the Czar and Czarina of Russia will take their seats at the coronation is the subject of an elaborate description sent by the St. Petersburg correspondent of the New York Herald: "In the right corner rises a throne of carved black oak, its roof supported, for it is almost a building in itself, by four pillars and raised on three steps. The whole is covered with crimson plush, backed with draperies of cloth of gold and ermine. A small table, which is also covered with crimson plush, stands before the imperial seats. On it their Imperial Majesties will be served with the first glass of champagne by the Grand Marshals and the highest dignitaries of the Court. The Byzantine frescoes on the walls, which have been restored from designs from illuminated manuscripts by native artists, represent scenes in the career of Joseph and his brethren."

Social Democracy in Prussia.—The Annual Busstag, or day of national fasting, prayer, and penitence, was announced in Prussia to be held on April 18th, but there were few signs of its observance in the way originally appointed. The churches seemed to be the very last place of public resort, while all the beer-gardens drove a roaring trade. Moralizing on this day, which was intended to give the Prussian people an annual opportunity for religious self-examination, the Kreuz Zeitung remarks: "If we look at the moral condition of our country, must we not be horrified in our inmost soul? What an increase of coarseness and bestiality! Every newspaper tells us of murder, of suicide, of terrible derangement in houses and families, of unheard-of atrocities, of a moral degeneracy which must fill us with horror. And turning to our social state we see ourselves going downward on the path of destruction. Our social institutions are in course of dissolution. Nihilism, it is true, may not be impudent and shameless, as in Russia and France; but we are on the road to a similar state of things. Our Social Democracy is not very far removed from Nihilism. And how is it with our political life? How much has the old feeling of loyalty disappeared! Revolutionary thoughts fill the minds of many. How few still look upon authority as by God appointed! And then as to our Church affairs. How great is the falling away from the living God and estrangement from His Church! How many men literally live without prayer, without God's Word, and think they have made great progress in being able to live outside the shadow of His house! Materialism and Paganism dominate only too many, and that, too, among the educated; but still more among the half-educated classes." The North German Gazette is also moved by this religious occasion to comment in a horrified tone on "the demoniac spirit of destruction which now possesses large classes of the population of all countries."

An American Lady Physician is Reported to be receiving high honors in China. Dr. Mary Howard attended the mother of Prince Li, Hung Chang, and although she did not save her life, she showed so much skill that she was called in to treat the wife of the great minister. From all parts of North China letters from the wives of mandarins and high officials are pouring in on her intreating her to come to them or to "send other wise women from America." Eastern women of rank die with obscure diseases rather than submit to operations performed by male surgeons. An American physician who spent some time in Turkey was called in to prescribe for the wife of the Bey ill with typhoid fever. The patient was wholly covered with a sheet in which one hole was cut large enough for him to put his fingers in to feel her pulse, and another through which she thrust her tongue. Dr. Howard has been loaded not only with fees by her grateful patients, but jewelry, furniture, and priceless curios in profusion as gifts.

Mr. Spurgeon in a London Fog.—A Fog Settled over the Tabernacle during the morning service on Sunday, February 25th, rendering the aid of artificial light indispensable. Mr. Spurgeon remarked that, as the weather was very dull, they would cheer their hearts by singing the hymn commencing "Thou whose almighty word." Mr. Spurgeon went on to observe—by way of a hint to the person in charge of the gas—that before proceeding to sing it would be necessary to have a little more light. Here came a pause; but, strange to relate, instead of the officer turning the gas up—a glimmer having been left on—he actually turned it completely out, with the exception of a few burners. This unlooked-for incident or accident occasioned a general smile, but the hymn was heartily sung through, despite the semi-darkness. Happily, the fog lifted shortly afterward, and when giving out the next hymn, Mr. Spurgeon said: "Our friend who was asked to give us more light misunderstood us, and gave us none at all. Now, however, in the providence of God, we shall be able to do without him."

WHEN ten years ago the distressing news of the wreck of the Ville du Havre reached New York, there were many words of gratitude offered to God in prayer, that among the few lives that were saved was that of M. Emile Cook, who was returning to France in the ill-fated vessel, after having attended the meetings of the Evangelical Alliance as a delegate from his native land. M. Cook during his short visit to this city made many friends who will be interested in reading a brief sketch of his eventful life, and a narrative of the events of that terrible night when two hundred and twenty-six men and women found a watery grave.

Emile Cook was the son of a French Protestant missionary, and was born in 1829, at Congénies, a small village of considerable beauty in the south of France. Though the strictness of Emile's parents amounted almost to severity, yet the home appears to have been a very happy one.

The house itself was unique. It was nearly all taken up with a great stone-paved chapel, open from the ground to the roof, and furnished with rush-bottomed chairs and a high pulpit. It was here that Emile's father preached the Gospel, and the influence of this chapel seemed to pervade the whole house with an air of solemn joy.

Emile and his brother Paul and sister Marie grew up merry, light-hearted, as all healthy children are, yet early self-restrained, performing kindly offices for one another, and the poor.

Next to the Bible stories, Emile loved to hear his mother tell about the missionaries who had gone to preach the Gospel of Christ to the heathen. He was never tired of asking questions about them, and his young mind was full of thoughts which his mother's stories awakened.

A CHILDREN'S PRAYER-MEETING.

Emile's character, though exceedingly gentle, was full of strength, and from the very beginning exerted a strong influence upon others. One evening, when the three children had been playing in the garden with a little friend, the mother noticed all at once an unwonted quiet. It was growing dark, but they had surely not come into the house. She looked through all the rooms for them in vain. As she passed along the upper corridor, she thought she heard voices in the chapel, and opening a door which led into a little gallery above the pulpit, she stepped in. The chapel was quite dark, but some one was speaking in the darkness below. She listened; it was Emile praying earnestly that God would give him a new heart, and make him fit for heaven.

When he ceased to pray, Paul began, and then Marie, and then the little boy who had been playing with them. The mother listened silently, joining in their prayers in her heart. When their prayers were finished they came quietly out of the chapel, saying nothing on the subject to any one. But Mrs. Cook noticed that every evening, as it was growing dark, the children went softly into the chapel. When their father returned from an evangelistic tour, she told him of this little prayer-meeting, and, though they never spoke of it to the children, evening after evening these happy parents went silently into the gallery and united their prayers with those which the dear little ones were offering in the dark chapel below.

REMOVAL TO NISMES.

When Emile was seven years old the family removed from Congénies to Nimes, or Nismes, which is a large city in the south of France, not very far from their first home. Nîmes is one of the oldest cities in France, having been founded by the Greeks before the Christian era, and is full of interesting ruins and relics of ancient times—more full than any other city in Europe except Rome. Emile learned much of history from the stories his father and mother told him in their walks to the ruined Tour Magne and the temples and porticos, and especially to the amphitheatre, which still exists in a state of marvellous preservation.

Not only ancient history, but many a story of modern times, the father told his children in this amphitheatre—stories of cruel persecutions of the Huguenots; stories of the valiant struggles for religious liberty which had taken place among the mountains of the Cevennes, which could be seen from the topmost step of the amphitheatre where they sat. Telling them how, after of trial and hardship, the Protestants lost their cause, and vast numbers of them were taken and put to horrible torture in this very city of Nîmes. Many a time, in Emile's walks, he trod the Place de la Boucarie, where those terrible instruments of torture had done their worst upon the bodies of Protestants, and his whole soul burned with an unquenchable desire to preach the Gospel for which the brave Huguenots had suffered and died.

Emile infused his own spirit of love for souls into his companions. The missionary stories which his mother would relate by the hour already began to bear fruit. He told them again and again to his playfellows, until, not satisfied with seeking their own conversion, these children longed to do something for the heathen. They talked it over among themselves, debating many different plans of earning money; and at last, after many grave deliberations, they formed themselves into

A SOCIETY OF BOOTBLACKS.

For a whole year the little fellows carried on their amateur trade, blacking the boots of their parents, and of such friends as would employ them. People of that country and in that time were not lavish with their money. They would have thought it extravagant to pay to children as much as they would have given a man for the same service, and it needed a whole year of patient toil to collect, sou by sou, the sum of twenty-five francs, or about five dollars. This sum they joyfully brought to Mr. Cook for the evangelization of the heathen.

In the midst of all his zeal for Christ and love for souls, Emile was not at rest. No doubt he already loved the Saviour, but he ardently longed for a more perfect sense of forgiveness. For a time his anxiety was extreme. As his health became more delicate, his solicitude for a thorough and conscious submission to the divine will became greater. One day his anxiety was so overwhelming that on his return from a prayer-meeting he was seen to be in a high fever, and was put at once to bed. But he could not rest there; he felt that he must seek the Lord until he found Him.

He only waited until his mother, having gently smoothed the coverlet and laid a cool, perfumed handkerchief upon his forehead and drawn the curtains, had softly left the room. Then, rising from the bed, he knelt beside it, and saying to the Lord, "I will not let Thee go until Thou bless me," he literally agonized in prayer. Soon a sweet peace stole over him, and, returning to his bed, he slept quietly, with the happy faith that he was at last the child of God through faith in Jesus Christ. Though little more than a boy at this time, he always believed this to have been the day of his conversion, and from this period he lived the life of a true and devoted Christian soldier.

HIS SCHOOL-LIFE.

In 1842 Mr. Cook was called to Lausanne, in Switzerland, and removed thither with his family. In May, Emile and his brother Paul arrived. The academy of that city is one of the most celebrated Protestant institutions of learning on the continent of Europe, and Emile made rapid progress in his studies. His influence was felt to be most powerful for good, and he had not been long in school before, as in Nîmes, and in Congénies, he began to feel that his companions were his parish. He talked with them about the love of God in Christ, and finally, with the help of Paul, he began a little series of prayer-meetings somewhat like those they had held in other places. He also took a class in Sunday-school, in which he displayed a sagacity and zeal which, in one so young, were really marvellous.

BEGINS TO PREACH.

At the age of eighteen Emile Cook began to preach the Gospel of Christ. At Meauzac, a village not far from Montauban, lived an uncle of his, who was pastor of the Reformed Church. It was this uncle who first invited his nephew to preach for him, and the Sunday of his first sermon appears to have been a most momentous day to him. He says: "When I went into the pulpit I trembled with fear. I began, however, to speak with considerable freedom upon the words: 'Enter ye in at the strait gate,' but presently there was a moment when I did not know what I was saying. I suffered horribly, having forgotten what I meant to say next, and even what I was talking about. However, God had pity on me, and restored me my senses, so that I was able to finish without breaking down. I felt fatigued and quite overcome until the second service, when I was enabled to speak with considerable freedom upon the sacrifice of Isaac."

RESCUES A MAN FROM DROWNING.

One day, as Emile was walking on the bank of the river Tarn, at Montauban, he heard a loud cry for help. It came from a man who was struggling in the water. Emile was a noted swimmer, and in an instant he had thrown off his coat and was swimming toward him. Sustaining the man with one arm, he tried to swim back with the other, but the current was rapid, and the man's weight far too great for his strength. Emile felt that both must perish unless he made some new effort. A thought suddenly occurred to him. It needed but a moment to explain it to the man, who, fortunately, had not lost presence of mind. Summoning all his strength, Emile gave the man a vigorous push in the direction of the shore. The reaction sent Emile to the bottom, but he came up again, and near enough to the man to repeat the experiment. A third strong push brought the man to where he found standing-ground, and his life was saved. (See frontispiece picture on the left of portrait.)

In January, 1848, having resolved upon serving the Lord in the ministry, Emile Cook commenced a three years' course of study at the theological seminary of Richmond, England. He was nineteen years and a few months old when he arrived there. He began preaching at once as he had opportunity, and had been but a few months at Richmond before his labors had met with such favor that he was called upon to preach regularly, and sometimes two or three times on a Sunday. At the close of his college curriculum, Emile was appointed to labor for Christ at Vigan, in the Cevennes, France. Nearly twenty towns, villages, and hamlets were included in the district to which he ministered, and he was expected to visit them with a certain regularity. Such a life, active, varied, full of adventure, in which study alternated with journeyings to and fro, suited the young minister perfectly, and he conducted his work with a holy and deepening enthusiasm.

As the result of the divine blessing resting on his preaching, of religion commenced, and the whole district was aroused. People forsook the cafés, the billiard-saloons, the wine-shops, and other places of low resort, and thronged the places in which the services were held. The loss of custom infuri-wife came home after eleven o'clock, having been out since ten in the morning; she was raving drunk, and would have killed her baby outright if her patient husband had not taken it from her. As he snatched the child from imminent danger, she in her frenzy lifted a heavy instrument and struck him with it so severely that this morning the magistrate declared that a more heart-rending story he never heard before. What a demon must inhabit a woman's heart before she can be brought to do so monstrous a thing!"

A Stone to be Rolled Away.—The Rev. James Scott, speaking of the necessity of each individual giving up drinking for the sake of others, said: "I know a case just now where the wife is exceedingly anxious about her husband. She asks Christian friends to speak personally with him, and takes him to meetings. Yet she shrinks from taking the first step toward his reformation, that is, to become a total abstainer herself. Why? Because when she mixes with her friends and is offered wine, as is customary, she knows that if she refuses, they will ask the reason, and she fears to expose her husband by saying 'I am doing it for the sake of my husband.' I think she is wrong in so acting; every one should roll away the stone which prevents the dead being raised, for though we cannot raise the dead we can roll away the stone."

A Prayer in a Stable.—"On Wednesday last a member of the Band who is here to-night came to my meeting to return thanks to God for His merciful kindness to him that day. He was out in a field during the cold east wind, and was numbed and stiff. His comrade tempted him, saying, as he handed the flask, 'Take a sup, man; it will warm you.' The temptation was terrible; it rushed into his innermost soul, until his flesh shook, and his knees trembled with the struggle to overcome the fell destroyer. Fortunately, there was an open stable near at hand, and to that place of shelter he ran, and falling on his knees, prayed that God might take away the desire which was in him. That man testified that if he had not prayed, he could not have been true to his colors, but would have fallen. Verily, God is the hearer and answerer of prayer."

A Despairing Death-Bed.—"I Remember a meeting where a young married man was awakened, the Holy Spirit strove mightily with him, but the devil and the flesh prevailed, so that he did not decide for Jesus. Months after he fell ill, and sent for the minister, to whom he vowed, 'If I recover from this dreadful illness I will be a Christian.' He recovered, but did not repent. Twelve months after he lay dying. His wife came to the minister, saying, 'He does not want to see you, but come.' When the minister spoke to him, the dying man said, 'It's no use, my damnation is clear. I might have been saved; it's too late now.' 'I will pray with and for you; do join, I intreat you, in a cry to God for mercy on your soul.' When the hand of death tightened on him, his wife bent over and listened to the last words which in fearful anguish he whispered, 'The—harvest—is—past—the—summer—is—ended—and—I—am—not—saved.'"

A Worldly Young Lady was Brought to Christ in a singular manner. She feared that a minister in the house would speak to her about religion, but for some time he said nothing. One day he said, 'Don't they often bother you about religion?' 'Oh yes, they do.' 'You had better put it off for forty years yet.' 'Oh no, not so long as that; I may not live till the end of that time.' 'Put it off for thirty-five years then.' 'But I may not live all that time.' 'For twenty years then.' 'I don't know that I may life for that time even.' 'For a year then.' 'No.' 'For a month; surely you can put it off for so short a time as that.' 'No I can't, I may be dead.' 'For a day then.' 'No, not for ten minutes, I may not live till then.' 'Well, settle it now.' In a minute they were on their knees praying that the Lord who had opened the eyes of the blind might open her eyes. God heard the prayers, and gave her a sight of Christ as her Saviour, and He became to her the supreme joy of her life."

THE LORD'S COMING: THE GRAND CONSUMMATION.

The Power of Faith in the Truth of the Lord's Coming—The Practice of the Thessalonians—The Day-Star of Christian Hope—The Practical Results of Holding the Truth—A Stimulus to Fidelity and Diligence—The Three Great Topics of Gospel Testimony—Excuses for Neglect—Reasons for Urging Them.

WE find in the Scriptures that the Holy Ghost not only calls our attention to the fact of the coming of the Lord, but also urges us by it to the performance of every duty, the endurance of every trial, and the forsaking of every sin. Thus is this grand motive continually before the Church and the world. This is the warning to be uttered; this is the exhortation to be spoken; this is the comfort to be administered; this is the Gospel to be preached. Nowhere in the Bible are we bidden to prepare to die. The Gospel recognizes death as a universal fact, "but after this, the judgment." The resurrection, the coming of the Lord, the everlasting glory, and the eternal doom, are the objects to which it directs our gaze.

The Thessalonians "turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God, and to wait for His Son from heaven, ... even Jesus which delivered us from the wrath to come." The grace of God taught primitive Christians to "live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world," and to look for "that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ." The Hebrew Christians were taught that "to them that look for Him shall He appear the second time without sin unto salvation." And the Apostle Paul declared that there was a crown laid up for him, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, should give him in that day, and not to him only, "but unto all them, also, that love His appearing."

THE DAY-STAR OF CHRISTIAN HOPE.

And to the succeeding Church in every age and every land, the appearing of the Lord has been the day-star of their souls in hours of darkness, and the morning of their joy beyond this night of tears. It has roused the slumbering, quickened the tardy, cheered the disconsolate, strengthened the weak, and cast the sunshine of eternal glory upon the sorrows of the Church, and the shadows of eternal doom upon the mirthful madness of a sinful world. Thus this great thought touches and pervades Christian life at every point, and applies itself to all the needs and interests of the Church of God.

Are strifes and grudgings to be done away? It is written: "Grudge not one against another, brethren, lest ye be condemned: behold, the Judge standeth BEFORE THE DOOR." Would the apostle warn his Corinthian brethren against judging and evil speaking? He says, "It is a very small thing that I should be judged of you, or of man's judgment. Therefore, judge nothing before the time, until THE LORD COME, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts; and then shall every man have praise of God." Is brotherly love to be fostered and encouraged? The apostle prays: "And the Lord make you to increase and abound in love one toward another, and toward all men, even as we do toward you; to the end He may establish your hearts unblamable in holiness before God at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all His saints."

A STIMULUS TO FIDELITY.

Are brethren exhorted to fidelity and diligence in the work and worship of God? It is said: "Let us hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering; for He is faithful that promised; and let us consider one another, to provoke unto love, and to good works, not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is; but exhorting one another; and so much the more as ye see the day approaching." Does the apostle give his brethren caution against all rashness and excess? He says to them, "Let your moderation be known to all men. The Lord is at hand." Would the Saviour encourage His Church to stedfastness in His service? He says, "Behold I come quickly; hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown." Thus every Christian duty is enforced by this great and solemn consideration.

And what other motive can take the place of this? Much as men pride themselves on the improvements of these latter days, I fear that every alteration of the Gospel of God will prove a dire mistake. Three things form the burden of the Holy Spirit's work in convincing the world; sin, righteousness, and judgment. Three topics formed the burden of that testimony which made the haughty Felix tremble, as Paul "reasoned of righteousness, temperance and judgment to come." And no preaching can be apostolic in its character, or profitable in its results unless, with the other facts and doctrines of divine revelation, it presents the solemn verities of

A COMING JUDGMENT AND A COMING LORD.

We know the excuses that men frame for neglecting these momentous themes. But their excuses will not save sinners here, or justify their own unfaithfulness in the day of doom. Men may shrink from opposition; but when was God's Word known to be palatable to a wicked world? Said the holy Fletcher of Madeley, "I know many have been grossly mistaken as to the years; but because they were rash, shall we be stupid? Because they said 'to-day,' shall we say 'never?' and cry 'peace, peace,' when we should look around us with eyes full of expectation? Let us not judge rashly, nor utter vain predictions in the name of the Lord; but yet let us look about us with watchful eyes, lest the enemy take advantage of us, and we lose the opportunity of rousing people out of their sleep, of confirming the weak, and of building up in our most holy faith those who know Him

IN WHOM THEY HAVE BELIEVED."

The old path is the good way, and we are persuaded that good and not evil, would be the result of learning, like the Thessalonian Christians, to serve the living God, and to wait for His Son from heaven. No doubt such a faith and hope might interfere with some of the ambitious schemes and plans of worldly men in Church and in State. No doubt it would draw the line between a world doomed to destruction and a Church waiting for redemption. No doubt it would disquiet formalists and disturb hypocrites to be warned that "the coming of the Lord draweth nigh," and "the Judge standeth before the door." No doubt the votaries of the world, the flesh, and the devil, besotted amid the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, would be displeased to hear that the world is to pass away and the lust thereof. No doubt the servant who says and smites his fellow-servants, and eats and drinks with the drunken, would be angry to know that his doom was impending, and his Lord was near. No doubt pride, ambition, honors, titles, and fame, for which men seek, would shrivel in the light that flashes from the great white throne, or crumble into dust at the mention of impending wrath; but though wood, and hay, and stubble perished, gold, silver, and precious stones would remain. Men would not grudge one against another while beholding the Judge standing before the door; they would exhort one another as they saw the day approaching; they would be full of mercy and good fruits, as they realized the solemn certainty and nearness of that day when the Judge shall say, "I was hungry, and ye fed Me; I was thirsty, and ye gave Me drink;" they would warn sinners to "flee from the wrath to come," and would labor with a zeal too little known, to save men "with fear, pulling them out of the fire, hating even the garment spotted by the flesh."

"MY LORD DELAYETH HIS COMING,"

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President's Appointment of Mr. Walter Evans, of Kentucky, to be Commissioner of Internal Revenue, was made on May 21st, after a prolonged delay. Mr. Evans is a native of Kentucky, and is about forty-six years of age. He is a lawyer by profession, and although he has at times taken an active part in politics, he has never before held any office. In 1878 he was a candidate for Congress and was defeated; in 1880 he was again defeated, being then the Republican candidate for Governor. In 1876 Mr. Evans was a warm advocate of the nomination of Secretary Bristow for the Presidency. In 1880 he was a delgate to the Chicago Convention and, it is said, was among those who voted for General Grant on every ballot. By one who knows Mr. Evans well he is described as a lawyer of ability, a man of pure character, of high integrity and of great firmness and determination—one who will perform the duties of the office with vigor and intelligence. His appointment, it is said, will not, probably, be very satisfactory to the whiskey interests of his own and other States, but that is a result which will be learned with equanimity by the public.

The Opening of the Great Brooklyn Bridge last Thursday was the occasion of a general holiday in both cities. President Arthur and his Cabinet, and Governor Cleveland took part in the ceremonies, and general enthusiasm prevailed. Dr. Richard S. Storrs, who spoke on behalf of Brooklyn, closed his eloquent oration with the following suggestive remarks: "Surely, we should not go from this hour, which marks a new era in the history of these cities and which points to their future indefinite expansion, without the purpose in each of us that so far forth, as in us lies, with their increase in numbers, wealth, equipment, shall also proceed, with equal step, their progress in whatever is noblest and best in private and in public life; that all which sets humanity forward shall come in them to ampler endowment, more renowned exhibition; so that, linked together as hereafter they must be, and seeing 'the purple deepening in their robes of power,' they may be always increasingly conscious of fulfilled obligation to the nation and to God; may make the land at whose magnificent gateway they stand their constant debtor; and may contribute their mighty part toward that ultimate perfect human society for which the seer could find no image so meet or majestic as that of a city, coming down from above, its stones laid with fair colors, its foundations with sapphires, its windows of agates, its gates of carbuncles, and all its borders of pleasant stones with the sovereign promise resplendent above it: 'And great shall be the peace of thy children.'"

The Reorganization of the Republican Party in New York State is a work which, it is stated, will shortly be consummated. Probably there is no State in the Union in which at present the division between the two sections of the party is so wide, or in which there have been stronger manifestations of hostile feeling. The immense Democratic majority which swept the State at the November election was a sufficient evidence of discontent which Republicans could not afford to ignore. The Tribune, however, announced on May 23d that a plan for reorganizing the party had been adopted by the Committee of Eighteen, which was generally approved by Republicans. Even the machine men, who might be considered as surrendering under it the privileges they now enjoy, spoke favorably of the plan, and expressed the belief that the Executive Committee of the Republican Central Committee would recommend to the latter body the adoption of the report without change.

The Arguments for the Defence in the Star Route trials were closed on May 25th, when Colonel Ingersoll finished his long speech. It is the fashion to speak of the notorious infidel as a clear and cogent reasoner, but neither by the secular nor religious press is that opinion indorsed in this case, which would naturally call forth his best effort. The New York Times, which certainly must be considered as not biassed against the colonel on religious grounds, thus comments on the speech: "Colonel Bob Ingersoll's remarks in the Star Route trial indicate that he has only one dialectical method, whether it is the Christian religion or the testimony of witnesses for the government that he happens to be assailing. The force of Peorian agnosticism, as anticipated by Tom Paine and expanded by Bob Ingersoll, is rather rhetorical than logical. It may amuse the jury to be told that Colonel Ingersoll 'abhors slimy things that crawl in the dark,' that the witness Moore 'had the claws of his avarice in the persons of a United States Senator and an Assistant Postmaster-General,' and that 'the worst thing he could say about another witness was to call him Mr. Rerdell,' seeing that 'the worst thing said after that would have the taint of flattery.' But, regarded merely as sarcasms, they do not seem to be withering, while their probative force is very small indeed. They have no traceable bearing upon the question which Colonel Ingersoll is ostensibly discussing, whether Dorsey did or did not enter into a conspiracy to defraud the government."

Mr. Moody's Presence at Cooper Union on Sunday evening, May 20th, attracted an immense audience. The eminent evangelist made an earnest appeal to the Christians present to labor to bring the masses under the power of the Gospel. He said that Christians must go into the cellars and garrets of the people and bring light into their homes by hard, courageous work. Laymen should take the cause in hand, for it was by laymen rather than by ministers that the masses would be eventually reached. "We want heart, and God will give us the qualifications." "If some reporter," he said, "had been around the Temple and had seen the poor widow drop in her mite, he would have said it didn't amount to anything, and 'I won't put it in the Jerusalem Times,' but the Lord sat opposite the Treasury and took note of it." Mr. Moody expressed his conviction that the world was ripe and ready for the lay workers. "We must not be disheartened at the loss of our helpers," he said, "and although Thurlow Weed, Mr. Morgan, and Dr. Bishop have gone since I was last here, there are others to take their places." He advised the opening of theatres, circus tents, and every place of amusement for the religious instruction of the people, and said that religion was the only thing which would keep our city from communism. Mr. Moody announced that $5000 had been subscribed to enable Mr. Sawyer to continue the Cooper Union meetings by ten gentlemen present, and that they required yet more for the work to be performed.

Mr. Robert Balmer, the English Temperance orator, whose work in Massachusetts has been so remarkably successful, is now visiting New York, where he will remain for two or three weeks before returning to England. Any Temperance organization desiring to avail itself of his services prior to his departure may send letters of application to the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and they will be forwarded to him.

A Great Poet's Opinion of Prohibition may be learned from the following letter received recently from Mr. John G. Whittier by one of his intimate friends: "In answer to thy note let me say briefly and decidedly that I have never swerved in my hearty approval of the labors of the friends of temperance, especially the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, for prohibition, the ballot for women, and the waking up of the people to the danger of intemperance and the sale of intoxicating liquors. I know of no instrumentality more potent than the Union in rendering prohibition practicable by educating the masses of the people, and especially the young, preparing them to not only vote for prohibition but to enforce it when it becomes a law. Of the right and duty of prohibition I have never doubted, but we can only have it effectual when the people are made to see and feel its necessity."

The Programme of the Socialists, as Defined by Herr Most deserves the notice of every citizen. The doctrines he is preaching in our great cities tend directly to the overthrow of government and social order. To a St. Louis reporter, he said last week: "Every city in America has now its English-speaking section of the Socialists' party. They are not forward or demonstrative, in fact they hardly appear upon the surface, but they exist, and are at work. They are thinkers and quiet workers, and will be heard when the time comes. That time will be when Socialism prevails. That will mean when the wealth of the world belongs to society and is worked for the common good, when hunger and want are no more, when concentrated capital is no more. It will be brought about by the spread of the doctrine of Socialism; by the spread of the doctrine of Communism in its true sense, peacefully if possible, forcibly if must be—anarchy if you will." The existence of such teachers as Herr Most and the formation of the societies which support him, are an evidence that we are living in the closing years of this dispensation.

The Useful Work of the Society for the Suppression of Vice was described by Mr. Anthony Comstock on May 3d, at a meeting in Boston, Mass. He said that during the past ten years the society had destroyed over twenty-five tons of villainous literature and over seven tons of gaming instruments. In New York last year over 450 boys and girls were arrested for felony, most of whom had been educated for a criminal life by reading sensational stories.

Waiting for Death.—Miss Louisa M. Alcott, in a recent letter to Prof. Russell, of Waterbury, Conn., writes of the condition of her father, A. Bronson Alcott, saying: "Six months have about spent his vigor, great as it was for his age, and any change may be expected now, the doctor says. He does not suffer except from weariness, and often says, 'I am so old, so tired; let me go.'"

The Capture of a Train Wrecker in Pennsylvania, on May 19th, has led to an astonishing confession of depravity. It was found shortly after the accident on the Reading and Columbia Railroad, in which Mr. Hain was pinned under the engine and slowly roasted to death, that the disaster had been caused by a plank securely fixed across the track and weighted with stones. The police obtained a clue to the perpetrator of the horrible deed, and after a fierce struggle in which they were forced to use their revolvers succeeded in arresting him. When lodged in prison, the prisoner made a full confession of his guilt. He said to the officers that he put the plank on the track, and then went and stationed himself on a bridge near by and waited for the fated train to plunge into the obstruction. He says he did it for spite, as he was put off the train and was going to have his revenge for it. He said when he saw the plank the idea came to him that it would be a good plan to have some fun, and at the same time pay back the train hands for what they had done to him. He took the plank and swung it across the track, and then fastened it securely with heavy stones. We are appalled by such depravity. The prisoner is one of the class Solomon describes (Prov. 10 : 23). As we see men decking places of temptation in our great cities and rendering them attractive with music and other allurements, we may well ask ourselves whether they who are trying to wreck souls are not far worse than the miscreant. (Luke 17 : 1, 2.)

The Life Preservers were Forgotten by the passengers on board the steamer Granite State when the catastrophe occurred, which we described in these columns last week. A Hartford journal, in reporting the disaster, says: "One singular fact in connection with the loss of the steamer Granite State is that in the excitement of the moment, when the peril of death was imminent, not a person on board, so far as evidence shows, secured a life-preserver; yet fifteen or twenty people who found themselves cut off from escape by the stairway and gang-plank plunged into the river, and those who went in first and foremost could not swim. And yet the boat was provided with these necessary helps. In every state-room there were at least two, and upon every door leading thereto were printed directions how to use them. Even when the alarm was given at the state-room doors by the officers of the boat, no attention was called to the life-preservers." The fact is remarkable, because the life preservers are generally the first objects sought by alarmed passengers in a steamboat disaster, but in this case neither at the critical moment nor before then, do the passengers appear to have thought of them. Probably no one expected there would be any need of life preservers, or their location and the directions for use would have been carefully noted. In such case no one would have acted as men too often do in spiritual matters, who, knowing that death is certainly before them, do not avail themselves of the salvation offered them. (Heb. 2 : 3.)

A Pitiful Spectacle was Witnessed in a Philadelphia court on May 25th, when a white-haired man was placed at the bar for sentence, he having been convicted of embezzlement. The prisoner approached the bar with faltering steps. He said that he had never been in a court-room before except as a spectator. The judge began to make some remarks before imposing sentence. Before he had finished, the prisoner, who had been trembling violently, fell in a swoon. Two officers carried the old man out into the freer air of the hallway, and when he revived he was told that the judge had decided to defer the sentence until another day. The old man, however, with tears in his eyes, begged to have the matter over at once; he said that he was quite strong again, and would try to bear up. The court decided to gratify him, and he was brought to the bar a second time. He trembled, however, in spite of himself, and as the court imposed upon him a sentence of nine months' imprisonment and a fine of $100, he fell again into the waiting arms of a tipstaff. He was not unconscious, but so affected that he could not stand, and when, after a little time, he was led to the rear of the court-room, the tears were rolling in big drops down his cheeks. One could have wished that if it had been possible consistently with justice, some mercy might have been extended to the old man, but doubtless there were reasons for the infliction of the sentence. If pardon had been offered to the poor creature before his trial, how eagerly would he have accepted it, and then he might have looked on the judge without trembling. Yet pardon is offered now to people who one day will stand in greater terror before the Judge of all the earth, and they neglect it. (1 John 4 : 17.)

A Brave Woman's Heroism Involved the Loss of her life at a fire in New York last week. She was a manufacturer of artificial flowers and fruit, and occupied the first floor of a house in Greene Street. When the fire broke out there were a number of her own employés and the employés of two lodgers in the house. She was one of the first to discover the fire, but thinking nothing of the risk to her life or of saving her stock in trade, which was of considerable value, she ran up-stairs and, rushing through the passages, alarmed all the inmates. They were all saved, but the woman to whose courage they owed their lives fell down on the staircase overcome by her exertion and the smoke she had inhaled and was burned to death. It was a sad termination to an effort for the benefit of others, and caused general lamentation among the rescued. This self-sacrifice the brave woman, of course, could not have foreseen, but her care for the safety of others before herself reminds us of the voluntary sacrifice of Christ, who gave Himself to die that we may have eternal life. (Mark 15 : 31.)

Death was Chosen Rather than Blindness by a New Jersey lady last week. A local journal states that a lady well known in society died on May 17th, from the effects of a dose of corrosive sublimate which she had taken in dread of the calamity of blindness. About a year ago her eyesight began to fail, and her physician finally told her she would become totally blind. Thereafter she had fits of despondency. She went to a drug store, purchased the corrosive sublimate, saying she wanted it for rats, and then went home and swallowed the poison. Three physicians were called, and she told them what she had done. They tried all the resources in their power, but failed to save her life. The poor lady had probably suffered her mind to dwell on the impending calamity until she lost her reason, and was insane when she made her fatal choice. It is difficult to believe that any one in the possession of their reason would deliberately prefer death to blindness. Nevertheless, we know that thousands are daily by their actions saying that they prefer eternal death to endless life in heaven. (Ezekiel 18 : 23.)

A Destructive Torrent has Swept away one half of the Town of Deadwood, Dakota, destroying houses, mines, and causing the loss of many lives. A leading journal, commenting on the occurrence, says: "The destruction of a large part of the city of Deadwood is a costly lesson to those who fixed the site of that thriving town at the intersection of two narrow gulches, thus placing the settlement at the mercy of the resistless spring floods that pour down almost without warning from the hills. Houses might be placed with as little promise of safety under the dam of some huge reservoir known to be insecure. But miners seeking for gold and silver have no time to waste in choosing safe places for their dwellings. Mushroom settlements spring up around the mines, and the disadvantages of the location are not thought of until the floods come and wash away in an hour the accumulations of many years. The remarks are very true, but the editor need not have confined them to miners. Other people seeking gold and silver in our stores, exchanges, stock markets are also in too great haste for wealth to care for their far more precious souls. (1 Tim. 6 : 9.)

THE TENT DISSOLVED AND THE MANSION ENTERED.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."—II. CORINTHIANS 5 : 1.

PAUL ranks among the bravest of the brave. We note also with admiration how the hero of so many dangers and conflicts, who could glow and burn with fervor, was yet among the calmest and quietest of spirits. He had learned to live beyond those present circumstances which worry and disturb; he had stolen a march upon the shadows of time, and entered into possession of the realities of eternity. He looked not on the things which are seen, but he set his whole regard on the things which are not seen; and by this means he entered into a deep and joyful peace which made him strong, resolute, steadfast, immovable.

I would to God that we had all acquired of being "always confident"—his habit of having the inward man renewed day by day. Paul's life was rough and stormy, yet who might not desire it? Had there been no life to come, he would have been of all men the most miserable, for he was one of the poorest, most persecuted, most despised, most slandered, most wearied, and most suffering of mortals; and yet if I had to put my finger upon happy lives I should not hesitate to select among the foremost the life of the Apostle Paul, for whom to live was Christ.

It is also to be specially noted as to his happiness that he had a reason for it. My text begins with the word, "For." Paul is always argumentative, the leaning of his mind is in that direction; hence, if he is cast down he has a reason for it, and if he is calm he can show just cause for his peace. Some religionists are deliriously happy, but they cannot tell you why. They can sing, and shout, and dance, but they can give no reason for their excitement. They see an enthusiastic crowd, and they catch the infection; their religion is purely emotional; I am not going to condemn it, yet show I unto you a more excellent way. The joy which is not created by substantial causes is mere froth and foam, and soon vanishes away. Unless you can tell why you are happy you will not long be happy. If you have no principle at the back of your passion your passion will burn down to a black ash, and you will look in vain for a living spark.

I see in the text before us, first of all, a catastrophe which Paul saw to be very possible—"If our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved:" secondly, the provision which he surely knew to be made should that catastrophe occur—"We have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens;" and thirdly, I shall dwell for a minute or two upon the value of this knowledge to Paul and to the rest of us in our present trying condition.

I. First, then, consider

which Paul saw to be very possible: "1. our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved." He did not fear that he himself would be dissolved; he had not the slightest fear about that. The catastrophe which he looked forward to is known among us by the name of "death:" but he calls it the dissolving of the earthly house of his tabernacle; the taking down of his tent-house body. He does not say, "If I were to be destroyed," or "If I were to be annihilated;" he knows no supposition of that character; he feels assured that he himself is perfectly safe. There is latent within the text an element of deep quiet as to his real self. "We know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God." The "we" is all unharmed and unmoved; if our house were dissolved we should not be undone; if we were to lose this earthly tent we have "a building of God, eternal in the heavens."

Paul was not absolutely sure that his body would be dissolved. He hoped that he might be alive and remain at the coming of the Lord, and then he would be changed and be forever with the Lord, without passing through death. Still, he was willing to leave this in the Lord's hands, and when he saw it to be possible that he should be numbered among the blessed dead who die in the Lord he did not shrink from the prospect, but bravely found a metaphor which set forth the little fear which he entertained concerning it.

The apostle perceived that the body in which he lived was frail in itself. Paul was accustomed to make tents. I do not suppose he ever manufactured any very large or sumptuous ones — probably he did not own capital enough for that, but he was a tent worker and mender. When a tent is newly placed it is but a frail structure, very far removed from the substantiality of a house; in that respect it is exactly like of ours, which is crushed before the moth. Paul felt that his body would not need any great force to overthrow it; it was like the tent which the Midianite saw in his dream, which only needed to be struck by a barley cake, and lo! it lay along. A house of solid masonry may need a crowbar and a pick to start its stones from their places, but feebler tools will soon overturn a tent and make a ruin of it.

The body is liable to dissolution from causes so minute as to be imperceptible—a breath of foul air, an atom of poisonous matter, a trifle, a mere nothing, may end this mortal life. When we think of the brittle ware whereof our bodies are made it is not strange that they should soon be broken. Is it not a wonderful thing that we continue to live? much more wonderful than that we should die? Dr. Watts has wisely said:

"Our life contains a thousand springs,
And dies if one be gone;
Strange! that a harp of thousand strings
Should keep in tune so long."

Some small affair interferes with a minute valve or organ of secretion, mischief is engendered by it, the whole current of life is hindered, and by-and-by death ensues. It is a very delicate process by which dust remains animated; a thousand things can stay that process, and then our body is dissolved. Paul, therefore, because he saw his body to be frail as a bubble, looked forward to the time when the earthly house of his soul would be dissolved.

When he was writing this epistle he had many signs about him that his body would be dissolved. His many labors were telling upon him; he was worn down with fatigue, he was spent in his Master's service. He was so full of the heavenly fire that he could never rest; after he had evangelized one city he was forced to hasten to another; if he was driven out of one village he hurried to the next, for he was eager to deliver the message of salvation.

HE WORE HIMSELF OUT

with labor, and he felt, therefore, that the day would come when his body would give way under the intense excitement of his life-agony. He felt that one of these days in all probability the house of his tent would come down through the violence of his persecutors. Once he most touchingly spoke of himself as "such an one as Paul the Aged;" and aged men cannot get away from the consciousness that their body is failing. Certain crumbling portions warn the old man that the house is dilapidated; the thatch which has grown thin or blanched tells its tale. Hence, then, Paul was led to feel that both from the natural frailty of the body, and also from the injuries which it had already sustained, there was before him the evident probability that the earthly house of his tabernacle would be dissolved.

Besides, Paul's frail body had been subject to exceeding great perils. I saw the other day an encampment of gypsies out upon the common; many of this wandering race were sitting under a coarse covering sustained by sticks, I should exaggerate if I called them poles; and I could not help feeling that such an abode was all very well on a warm day, but not at all desirable when the east wind was blowing, or a shower of sleet was driving along, or a deluge of rain descending. The apostle's body was a tent which was subjected to great stress of weather. God had not screened him; though one of the most precious men that ever lived, yet he was exposed to more danger than almost any other of the Lord's servants. Well might he reckon that ere long his poor shepherd's shanty would give way under such rude blasts.

THE ART OF BEING IMMORTAL.

Besides, Paul knew that so many others whom he had known and loved had already died, and he gathered from this that he would himself die. There used to sit in this house a brother who has often assured me that he should not die, and that if any Christian man did die it was because he grieved the Lord. I am sorry to say that I have missed that brother for many months; I hope he has not yet disproved his own theory; but I am sure that he will do so sooner or later unless our Lord should hasten His advent.

Whenever I meet with an enthusiast who boasts that he shall never die, I find it best to let him wait and see. One fine old Irish clergyman has frequently sought to instruct me in the art of being immortal, and he has been grieved and angry because I never set much store by the long life which he offered me. Though an old man, he assured me that he should never die; he expected in a short time to throw out all the infirmities of his years in the form of a rash, and then he should be as vigorous as ever. Alas! the good rector is buried, and his crazy brain is at rest. It is appointed unto men once to die. This earthly house of our tabernacle will be dissolved; all things unite to warrant the belief.

Now, brethren, this was all that Paul did expect on the sad side; and truly it is not much. Is it? Certain not very long ago were feeding their flocks on one of the lofty upland valleys. On one side of the pasturage stood a number of châlets or wooden huts, in which they were accustomed to live during the summer, poor shelters which were left as soon as the winter set in. One day they heard a strange rumbling up in the lofty Alps, and they understood what it meant; it meant that a mass of rock or snow or ice had fallen, and would soon come crushing down in the form of an avalanche. In a brief space their fears were realized, for they saw a tremendous mass come rushing from above, bearing destruction in its course. What did it destroy? Only the old, crazy châlets: that was all. Every man of the shepherds was safe, and untouched; the event was rather to them a matter which caused a Te Deum to be sung in the village church below than a subject for mourning and sorrow. They said, "The avalanche is terrible, but it has not slain the aged mother, nor crushed the babe in its cradle; it has injured none of us, but only buried a few hovels which we can soon rebuild."

Their case is a picture of ours. The avalanche of death will fall; but O ye saints, when it comes this is all it will do for you—your earthly house will be dissolved! Will you fret over so small a loss? No evil will come nigh to you; the poor hut of the body will be buried beneath the earth, but as for yourself, what will you have to do but to sing an everlasting Te Deum unto Him who delivered you from death and danger, and raised you to His own right hand? Death, as it pulls away our sackcloth canopy, will reveal to our wondering eyes the palace of the King wherein we shall dwell forever, and, therefore, what cause have we to be alarmed at it? I have set out the whole catastrophe before you, and surely no believer trembles in view of it.

II. So now we pass on to the second head, of which the apostle Paul most surely knew. He knew that if his tent-dwelling was overthrown he would not be without a home; he knew that he would not have to open his eyes in a naked condition, and cry, "Woe's me, whither am I to fly? I have no dwelling-place." No, he know that if this tent-house were gone he had "a building of God." Paul was not afraid of going to purgatory; though of late some even among Protestants have in a modified form revived that grim fiction, and have told us that even believers will have much to bear before they will be fit for eternal happiness. The apostle held no such opinion; but, on the contrary, he wrote, "We know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God." He did not expect to be roasted alive for the next thousand years, and then to leap from purgatory to Paradise; but he did expect to go, as soon as ever his earthly house was dissolved, into his eternal house which is in the heavens.

He had not even the thought of lying in a state of unconsciousness till the resurrection. He says, "We know that if the earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have [we have already] a building of God." He says not "we shall have it," but "we have it;" "we know that we have it." The picture seems to me to be as though one of you should dwell in his garden in a tent for a while. Somebody inquires what would happen if a gale of wind should blow your tent away in the night. "Oh," say you, "I have a house over yonder; I should go within doors and live there." What a comfort to know that, whatever occurs to our temporary gear, we have a fixed and settled abode to which we can at once repair. This makes us feel independent of all dangers, and helps us joyfully to welcome the inevitable, come when it may.

What did the apostle mean, however? for this text is said to be a very difficult one. He meant, first—the moment his soul left its body it would at once enter into that house of which Jesus said, "In My Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you." Do you want to know about that house? Read the Book of the Revelation, and learn of its gates of pearl, its streets of gold, its walls of rarest gems, of the river which windeth through it, and of the trees which bear their fruit every month. If after that you desire to know more concerning this house, I can but give you the advice which was given by John Bunyan in a similar case. One asked of honest John a question which he could not answer, for the matter was not opened in God's word; and therefore honest John bade his friend live a godly life, and go to heaven, and see for himself. Believe no dreams, but bide thy time, believing in the Lord Jesus, and thou shalt shortly know all about the house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

Paul, however, did mean that in the fulness of time he would again be clothed upon with a body. He regarded the waiting time as so short that he almost overlooked it, as men forget a moment's pause in a grand march. Ultimately, I say in a body; the tent-house which was blown down and dissolved would be developed into a building, so rich and rare as to be fitly called "a building of God, a house not made with hands." This also is our prospect.

Let us pass on to consider how Paul could say he knew this. This wonderfully enlightened nineteenth century has produced an order of wise men who glory in their ignorance. They call themselves "Agnostics," or know-nothings,

When I was a boy it would have seemed odd to me to have met with a man who gloried in being an ignoramus, and yet that is the Latin for that Greek word "Agnostic." Is it not singular to hear a man boastfully say, "I am an ignoramus?" How different is our apostle! He says "we know." Whence came this confidence?

HOW DID HE KNOW?

First, Paul knew that he had a Father in heaven, for he felt the spirit of sonship; he knew also that his Father had a house, and he was certain that if ever he lost the tent in which he lived he should be sure to be welcomed into his own Father's house above. How do our children know that if ever they are in need of a house they can come home to us? Did they learn that from their tutors at school? No, their childhood's instinct teaches them that our house is their home, just as chickens run under the mother-hen without needing to be trained. Because they are our children they feel that as long as we have a house they have a house too; Paul, therefore, unhesitatingly said, "We know;" and, brethren, we know the same through like confidence in our Father's love.

Paul knew, again, that he had an elder brother, and that this brother had gone before to see to the lodging of the younger brethren. Paul remembered that Jesus had said, "I go to prepare a place for you, and if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto Myself, that where I am ye may be also." So Paul had no question whatever. Doubtless, Paul also thought of the Holy Ghost, that blessed One who deigns to live with us in this frail house of clay, which is in many ways an uncomfortable and unsuitable abode for Him by reason of the sin which has defiled it. He condescends to dwell in these mortal bodies, and, therefore, when we leave our earthly house He will leave it too; and and we are persuaded that a place will be found where we may still abide in fellowship.

Besides, let me tell you something. Paul knew that when he died there was a Paradise prepared, for

HE HAD BEEN THERE ALREADY.

You remember how he locked up that story till he could keep it no longer, and, then, fifteen years after its occurrence, he let out the blessed secret. Let me read his words, "I knew a man in Christ above fourteen years ago, (whether in the body, I cannot tell; or whether out of the body, I cannot tell; God knoweth;) such an one caught up to the third heaven. And I knew such a man, (whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell; God knoweth;) how that he was caught up into paradise, and heard unspeakable words, which is not lawful for a man to utter." He says he was taken up to the third heaven; it was, therefore, idle to tell Paul that there was no home for him hereafter, for he had seen the place.

Yet, again, dear brothers and sisters, you and I know that when this earthly tabernacle is dissolved there will be a new body for us, because our Lord Jesus Christ has risen from the dead. In my mind the ultimate answer to my deepest unbelief is the fact of the rising of Jesus from the dead. No matter of history is anything like so well attested as the fact that our Lord was crucified, dead and buried, and that He did upon the third day rise again from the dead. This I unhesitatingly accept as a fact, and this becomes my anchorage. This we are also sure of, namely, that if our Lord Jesus be alive and in a place of rest He will never leave His chosen and redeemed ones without house or home. Where He has found a throne His people shall find a dwelling. Delightful is our old-fashioned ditty:

"And when I shall die, Receive me, I'll cry,
For Jesus has loved me, I cannot tell why;
But this I do find, we two are so joined,
He won't be in glory and leave me behind."

There is such an attachment between Christ and the believer; yea, more, such a vital, essential, indissoluble, tender marriage union that separation is impossible.

"Ah," says one, "but

that he has an interest in all this? Suppose I do know that the children of God are thus favored, how am I to know that I am one of them?" I invite you to self-examination on this point. Dost thou believe in the Lord Jesus Christ with all thine heart? Then it is written, "He that believeth in Me though he were dead yet shall he live. He that liveth and believeth in Me shall never die." Having believed in Christ the apostle knew that he was safe; for the promises are to believers, and if any man be a believer every promise of the covenant belongs to him. We obtain further assurance of this by our possessing the new life. Dear friend, have you entered into a new world? Do you feel within you a new heart and a right spirit? Have old things passed away, and have all things become new? Are you a new creature in Christ Jesus? Then it is all right with you; that new life cannot die, your new-born nature must inherit everlasting bliss. These are the ways in which believers know that they are believers, and then by the Word of God they know that all things are theirs, so that if their earthly house should fail they would be received into everlasting habitations.

III. Lastly, as to the value of this knowledge to us. To be sure that when this body dies all is well, is not that worth knowing? Secularists twit us with taking men's minds away from the practical present that they may dream over a fancied future. We answer that for the present is to live in prospect of the eternal future. Paul's confident belief that if his body should be dissolved he would be no loser, kept him from fainting. He knew what the worst would be, and he was prepared for it. Great storms were out, but the apostle knew the limit of his possible loss, and so was ready. All we can lose is the frail tent of this poor body. By no possibility can we lose more. When a man knows the limit of his risk it greatly tends to calm his mind. The undiscoverable and the unmeasured are the worst ingredients of dread and terror; when you can gauge your fears, you have removed them.

The prospect of his heavenly house made his present trials seem very light; for he felt like a man who sojourns for a night at a poor inn, but puts up with it gladly because he hopes to be home on the morrow. If we were trying tent life for a season we should probably cry out, "A fearful draught comes in at that corner! How damp it is under foot! How cramped up one feels!" Yet we should smile over it all, and say, "It will not be for long. We shall soon be in

OUR HOUSE AT HOME."

Ah, brethren, an hour with our God will make up for all the trials of the way. Wherefore, be of good courage, and press on. This changed for Paul the very idea of death; death was transformed from a demon into an angel; it was but the removal of a tottering tent that he might enter into a permanent palace Some of God's own children are much troubled through fear of death, because they do not know what it is. If they were better taught they would soon discover in their present source of sorrow a subject for song. I would like here to say that I have known some of my Master's doubting and fearing servants die splendidly. Do you remember how Mr. Feeble-mind, when he crossed the river, went over dry-shod. Poor soul, he thought he should surely be drowned, and yet he scarcely wet the soles of his feet. I have known men of God go like Jacob all day long weary and faint, feeling banished from their Father's house; and yet when they have laid their head down for their final sleep they have had visions of angels and of God. The end of their journey has made amends for the rough places of the way. It shall be so with you, brother believer.

As I have thought of some of my dear brothers and sisters that I have seen die very sweetly, and I have remembered that they were, in life, lowly and self-distrustful, I have compared them to persons who, when they drink their tea, forget to stir the sugar at the bottom of the cup. How doubly sweet the drink becomes as they near the bottom; they have more sweetness than they can well bear. Would it not be wise to stir the tea at once and enjoy the sweetness from the brim to the bottom? This is the benefit of faith as to the future, for it flavors the present with delight.

In Martin Luther's time, and before his era, men who had lived evil lives were often in great fear when they came to die, and in their terror they would send to a monastery and procure a monk's dress in which to be buried. What

A FOOLISH FANCY!

Yet so it was that they hoped to fare better in the day of judgment for being wrapped in brown serge, and covered with a cowl! Be ours a better garment. Here is a wish of holy Rutherford: "His believed love shall be my winding-sheet, and all my grave-clothes; I shall roll up my soul, and sew it up in the web of His sweet and free love." Is not that your idea! It is surely mine! If we are laid to sleep in such a cerecloth, there will be no fear of our waking. It will happen to us as to the man who was laid in Elisha's grave, and at once arose as soon as he touched the prophet's bones. No man can lie dead if wrapped up in the love of Christ, for His love is life. He that has touched the love of Christ has touched the heart of the life of God, and he must live. So let us give ourselves up to that Divine love, and trusting in our Lord, let us go onward to eternal bliss till the day break and the shadows flee away; let us triumph and rejoice that there is prepared for us a "building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

A CONVERTED CHINESE PRIEST.

PASTOR LIN, of T'ai-chau, a missionary evangelist connected with the China Inland Mission, has sent to Mr. Hudson Taylor the following interesting narrative of the conversion of a native priest, who has recently died happily in the Christian faith:

He was born, his mother informs me, in the year 1828, in the city of Sien-ku, and was the eldest of eight sons. His father was a schoolmaster, and superintended his education until he was eighteen years of age, when his father died, and the family was left destitute. He was not old enough to teach a school, had no trade, and had never done any work, so did not know what to do for a living.

Being of a religious turn of mind, he made up his mind to become a Buddhist priest, and at once commenced the necessary preparation. He first went to a temple outside the south gate, where his head was shaved and he assumed the priestly garb; there he taught the young priests, and helped to cultivate the ground belonging to the temple. In 1852 he went to a temple at Hwang-yen, where he received some money as well as his rice and clothing for his services. Here he saved his money that he might be able to go to the sacred island of Pu-du, and be installed a priest of full orders. This he did in 1860. After the usual examination he took the vow of perpetual consecration, and then six spots were burned on the top of his head, and a paper was given him bearing the seal of the abbot of the temple, which gave him the right of lodging and food in any Buddhist temple which he might visit in any part of the empire.

The diploma cost him about fifty dollars. He returned to his place at Hwang-yen, where he was promoted, and remained there until the year 1868, when he came to this city (T'ai-chau) to take charge of the temple of the God of Medicine. His salary was worth about six dollars a week. Although a priest professes to have no relations, or to take no notice of them if he has, this man out of his income frequently helped his widowed mother.

Street Preaching in India.

In the seventh moon of 1875 I was one day passing the temple, and went in. He met me just inside the inner door, and received me very politely, asking me to take a seat. I accepted and entered into conversation with him, and there and then told him of salvation through the blood of the Lord Jesus. He listened attentively, and seemed pleased to hear. From that time I often visited him, and spoke to him about the way of salvation. The next year he came now and again to the chapel, and there heard more of the Gospel, and after a few months became a regular attendant at the week evening meetings as well as the Sunday services.

In the year 1877 he had a dream, doubtless the result of his meditations on the preaching and conversation of his Christian acquaintances, in which he saw that all those who worshipped God were in the light, but that the worshippers of idols were all in darkness. This made him very sad, but he did not like to give up all for Christ. At the end of the next year, however, he made up his mind to give up all connection with the temple and idolatry, and to give the rest of his life to preaching the Gospel. He became very diligent in reading the New Testament, and he gave notice to the heads of the temple, asking them to relieve him of the responsibility of his post. They tried to persuade him to remain, but he was not to be deterred. He left the temple, and maintained himself by cooking rice for some students, until his hair was grown long enough to wear a queue, when he changed his dress, and commenced selling candies on the streets. (See illustration.)

He then went to Sien-ku to fetch his mother to live with him, anxious that she should hear the Gospel; but she only stayed a few days, and returned to her home.

A few days after this he was taken with ague, which soon turned to dysentery, and he grew weaker daily. He asked the Christians to pray for him, and was very earnest in prayer himself. We saw that he was not likely to get better, and sent for his mother, who soon came, but his brothers would not come near him. His mother wanted him to go to her home, but he was unwilling, as he knew she would have but one remedy for his sickness and that a superstitious sacrifice to the idols, and if he should die, would practise idolatrous rites at his funeral; so he preferred to stay among Christians. He became worse, and could hardly speak, but even then he exhorted his mother to believe in Jesus.

One morning he sent for me early, and when I arrived he told me he should not get better. We knelt by his side and prayed. At four o'clock next morning he fell asleep in Jesus.

STREET PREACHING IN INDIA.

(See Illustration.)

OUR picture on this page represents a scene often witnessed by the Christian missionary in India, and in which he takes a prominent part. To win the stolid Hindu and the fatalistic Mohammedan to accept the verities of the religion of Christ, is a matter which requires the most skilful tact and consummate ability. From the recent report of a Baptist missionary, we learn the method which experience has justified for securing an audience to listen to the preaching of the Gospel. The missionary begins thus:

"Suppose you were down in a deep pit, stuck fast in the mire, and your brother by your side said, 'Never mind, brother, I will get you out of the pit.' You would reply, 'How can you do it? You are as badly off as I am; get yourself out of the pit first, and then you may be able to get me out.'

"Just so; we all are in debt to God, and we need some one who is not himself in debt to God to free us; we all are stuck fast in the mire of sin, and we need a deliverer who is not stuck fast in it. In other words, we are all sinners, and we need a sinless Saviour. Where shall we find one? Where shall we find the sinless one?" Then he speaks of Christ's life, character, teaching, death, resurrection, ascension, and says, "This is just the Saviour that you need."

Hereupon a man in the crowd interposes with a question, "Sahib, you say that Jesus was sinless, and yet that He died; how can that be?" Such a question comes very opportunely. To answer the question why Jesus, a sinless Being, had to die, the missionary must preach the Gospel, and taking this question of the objector as his text, the people listen with the more attention because it is an answer to an objection.

Hereupon another man interposes, with a malicious look on his face: "Sahib, you say that the true religion is known by its effects?" "Yes." "And that Christianity is proved to be the true religion by its saving men from sin?" "Yes." "Then how about the Christians that get drunk, and do all sorts of bad deeds?"

This is an awkward question, because the bad lives of nominal Christians is one of the greatest obstacles in the way of Christianity. The missionary replies: "In a certain village there were two sick men; the doctor went to them and gave them medicine. They thanked him, and said they would certainly take it; but, as soon as the doctor had left, one man drank the medicine and recovered; the other man threw away the medicine and died. Whose fault was it—his or the doctor's?' 'His.' 'Why?' 'Because he only pretended to take the medicine.'

"Just so; and these 'Christians' as you call them, who get drunk only pretend to take the medicine; they are not real Christians."

THE VICAR'S STRANGE HEARER.

(See Illustration.)

A LOVELY summer morning in the village of Cleethorpe. It was Sunday and the old gray stone church was filledas usual with the farmers and their families, the farm hands and the few store-keepers of the village.

This morning, however, in a pew farthest away from the pulpit sat a stranger. She was attired in deep mourning and seemed desirous of avoiding the inquisitive looks of the people. She kept her veil down during the earlier portion of the service, but the vicar could see that she was weeping bitterly. Who could she be? The vicar asked himself the question, not in idle curiosity but because he felt drawn toward her in a strange unaccountable manner. He did not give the question a second thought, however, but resolved that if a wounded heart had come there for comfort he would with the help of the Holy Spirit endeavor to administer it.

Mr. Fairbairn's sermons were not of the polished carefully-prepared type. His hearers would not have understood them if they had been anything but what they were, the simple exposition of the word and the offer of salvation made in the plainest and most homely language. It cost him no effort to lay aside the sermon he intended to preach and leaning forward on the cushion as his manner was when very much in earnest he spoke from the words "Come unto Me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." But a few words had been spoken when the vicar noticed that the strange lady put aside her veil and looked at him steadily drinking in every word.

Earnestly and pathetically he pleaded with the sorrowing and despairing preaching Jesus as the Redeemer the panacea for all woe. He preached no theory, no doctrine; it was the Saviour who had comforted his own heart in many a bitter hour that he held up before his people, and urged them to apply to the same source for relief as he had himself found unfailing.

The service concluded, Mr. Fairbairn waited in his vestry until all the congregation had left the building hoping that his strange hearer might confide to him the story of the sorrow he felt sure filled her heart. But she did not come, and at last he rose to return to his home.

As he passed through the churchyard he looked a man whom one might well confide in. A refined, gentle face, his white hair telling of ripe experience, and his bent form speaking of years that had not been passed without their tale of trouble. Yes, he was a man who would sympathize with the despairing, and one whose heart was breaking watched him as he wended his way between the gravestones and vaguely hoped that he might sympathize with her.

He had been at home some two hours when he was informed that a lady desired to speak to him. He at once divined who was his visitor, and entering his library he found there the hearer whom he had seen in his church that morning. She rose as he entered, and he, extending both hands in cordial greeting, said, "I am glad to see you; you were in church this morning, and I feared you were suffering under some bitter sorrow."

"I am indeed, sir," she answered; "it is too deep for healing, but I thought I would like to tell my story to you before I die. I meant to have carried my secret to the grave untold, but your sermon this morning drew me toward you and I should like to confide it to you."

"I wish my sermon had drawn you toward Jesus, my dear lady; 'He has carried our sorrows.' I can do little for you but if I can lead you to Him you will find peace."

"There is no hope of that, sir, there is no peace in this world for such as I. I do not deserve it if there were. But you will hear my story?"

"Assuredly, but it can contain no evil that the Saviour will be unable to relieve."

She told her story, one of the saddest this world of sadness sees, but which it sees only too often. It was one of a deserted home, she had left loving parents, tempted by a wicked fascinating man; she had enjoyed the pleasures of sin for a season and then had drunk to the very dregs the bitter cup of shame, humiliation and remorse. In her agony she resolved on suicide but determined once more to look on the home she had deserted seven years before and if possible see her father and mother again before she died. Travelling on wearily on foot for her money had been exhausted in the long journey, she had passed through the village of Cleethorpe on her way and had rested for an hour on the bank of the deep swift river. Arrived at her village home she found the farmhouse where she was born closed, and learned that both father and mother were dead. Then her heart broke utterly and she travelled back to Cleethorpe drawn by the recollection of that river by which she had rested. That she resolved should be her grave. She arrived on the Sunday morning and had entered the church that she might hear a prayer before she died, feeling herself too sinful to pray for herself.

It was in truth a pitiful story and the sorrow of it was that she had returned too late. Her father and mother could never know now that she had been sorry and had come back. Mr. Fairbairn listened attentively and with much sympathy. He knew that the balm of consolation would not be readily received into a heart so torn by unavailing sorrow. He must have time. Gently he pleaded with her and finally induced her to remain for a few days as his guest at the vicarage she giving her solemn promise not to make any attempt to commit suicide.

The few days stretched to weeks, and Mr. Fairbairn saw with gratitude a more hopeful spirit springing up within her. His wife grew to love her as a daughter and in the quiet atmosphere of that Christian home the girl's soul thawed from its icy bonds. It was long before she would admit that there was a possibility of forgiveness for her but at last the light broke upon her and she was melted in a flood of grateful tears. Mr. Fairbairn succeeded in procuring employment for her in the village and he had to the end of his life no more devoted friend than she whose soul had been given him from the verge of the grave.

PETER BLAKE'S VOYAGE.

A SERIAL STORY BY HESBA STRETTON.

Sorrow and Treachery.

THE door of Arthur Penrose's home was opened to him as quickly as the man's shaking hands could unfasten it; and he stepped across the threshold with eagerness.

"Good heavens, Master Arthur!" cried the old servant. "We gave you up for lost; and the poor master's gone too. He's dead, sir!"

It was all over then, and he had reached home too late. The words of his vow, taken so rashly at Victor's grave, flashed reproachfully across his memory. He never now would look upon his father's living face, though he would give worlds to see it smile once more upon him.

"He died yesterday," said the servant, in a low voice.

A few days ago such a shock would have bewildered and unnerved Arthur Penrose; but now it served to make him more master of himself and those about him. He bade Simmons discharge the cabman and take Fleck down into the kitchen; and then he turned into the dining-room, where he and his father had so often sat together, chatting pleasantly. He could not remember a single harsh or cold word that he had ever spoken to him, and yet he had made up his mind to forsake him! He sank down on his usual seat, opposite to the high-backed comfortable chair where his father always sat. How vividly he could see him sitting there now, with the smile upon his mouth, and the pleasant glow of contentment on his face!

After awhile Penrose dragged himself slowly and silently up-stairs to his father's room. A low light was burning there, for the dead are seldom left in darkness before they are laid in the utter darkness of the grave. He turned down the covering which hid his father's face. It looked suddenly aged and worn, beyond anything he could have thought of. The hollow cheeks and temples bore plainly the traces of great anguish. Victor had looked as if he had been sleeping, and dreaming happy dreams. This face was the face of the dead, cold and hard as marble, bearing only the mysterious and inviolable seal of death.

True or false what the crews of many ships charged the dead man with, he had gone at last to his account. There was neither punishment, nor repentance, nor self-vindication possible for him now. His accusers might say what they would, his tongue could frame no answer. If troops of shipwrecked men and weeping wives and orphans came about him, his ear must be deaf both to their curses and their cries.

Were the widows and orphans of the Dolphin's crew now cursing the dead ship owner? Some of them did not yet know of the disaster. As yet even in Peter Blake's home there was peace and hope.

For three or four days after her husband had left her, Bessie, in spite of the anxiety caused her by the desertion of two of the crew, was almost as content and happy as she ever felt while he was away at sea. He and Victor would soon be at home again, for the voyage was not a long one, such as some he had undertaken; and as long as the wind was fair, and the river smooth, her spirits were good. The old mother was always in a gayer mood than Bessie, being naturally lighter-hearted and more hopeful; and she sang ancient Norman ballads to little Nan and the baby, as he lay placidly listening in his great old cradle. It was a happy little household, in spite of the old French woman's rheumatism, caught amid the English fogs.

But when the calm weather was gone, and the river ran by in a swollen, sullen tide, driven and pressed by the hurrying winds, which moaned and wailed around the bow-window, and along the passages and store-rooms of the sailmaker's old house, and thick clouds were driven across the sky in dark troops—then Bessie's heart sank, and the old mother's voice faltered, as she still sang her merry songs to please little Nan. Nan herself often stood with folded hands, and a grave little face, looking up to the black clouds which hid the blue, and at the stormy gusts of rain that beat against the window-panes. It was a good thing that the father and Uncle Victor were in the "hollow of God's hand" now, and that He was holding them there safely for her and her mother. The little child was not troubled by a moment's doubt.

The news of the utter wreck of the Dolphin quickly spread through Wapping, as soon as it was brought by the rescued mate. There were two other Wapping men in her, besides Fleck, and Peter, and Victor Blake; thus somewhat more than ordinary excitement was aroused by the calamity. The people in Wapping dwell in a little world of their own, shut off from London by the great docks, and the sluices leading up to them; and the sense of neighborhood is deeper among them than in other parts of the great city. It was not yet known that Fleck was saved; and his wife and children were loud in their lamentations, proclaiming themselves everywhere as a desolate widow and orphans. On the other hand, Bessie Blake kept her grief to herself, shrinking from every expression of sympathy; and she was left pretty nearly alone in her trouble.

The blow fell, as all such blows fall, as if it had been altogether unforeseen, unthought of. Though Bessie had never let Peter leave her for a voyage without the sorrowful prediction that he was going away forever, and though she had dreamed hundreds of times that he was drowned, yet, now that the thing she had dreaded had come upon her, she could not believe it. The mate had been saved; and why should not Peter, her own good, loving, God-fearing man? Surely, surely God had take care of him! Not a step sounded on the staircase that did not make her heart leap with a hope that was as full of pain as of pleasure; for beneath the hope there lay a secret lurking dread that she dared not face.

When Fleck came home at the end of the second week, her dying hope sprang into new life. A great stir was made about him in Wapping, where he was received as one come back from the dead. Everybody who had seen the Dolphin as she sailed out on her fatal voyage held his own opinion, and was eager to hear it confirmed by Fleck. But Fleck swore confidently that the ship was as good as a ship could be, and was neither overladen nor undermanned. All men's minds had been softened by old Penrose's sudden and unhappy death, and they were reluctant to speak damaging words against the dead. Fleck's steady asseverations concerning the loss of the Dolphin stopped the mouths of the few, who were still ready to cast blame on the owners; and it was admitted to have been one of the unavoidable accidents of the sea.

Late on the evening of his reappearance in Wapping, Fleck made his way to Bessie Blake's dwelling-place. She had been waiting for him in feverish impatience, anxious to have her hopes confirmed. Little Nan and the baby were fast asleep; but the old mother was sitting up to hear the news, with a flush of color on her withered cheeks, and a bright light in her sunken eyes.

The Dutch clock struck twelve before Fleck came; then he slunk into a seat by the low fire, burning down to embers, and hung his head, as if he could not look either of them in the face. He fancied he saw Victor hesitating to climb the tottering mast, and he heard himself saying, "Up, up, lad!" The words would not leave off ringing through and through his brain.

"Only tell me Peter was not lost!" cried Bessie, with parched lips that could hardly speak.

"No, no, my poor lass!" answered Fleck, shaking his bowed head; "he went down with the rest of 'em, poor fellow! I did my best for Peter, for old shipmate's sake; but, bless you! we ran on a rock as sharp as any needle, and the Dolphin broke through amidships. Most of 'em were aft, lowering the quarter-boat, and there wasn't a chance for e'er a one of 'em Me and the young master we e in the forecastle; that saved us and Victor."

"Victor!" said the old mother; "is my son Victor safe?"

"No," said Fleck, with a troubled voice, "we did all we could for him; if it was the last breath I said it in, we did all we could for him, young Mr. Penrose and me; and we gave him a good funeral in Alderney; for the boat picked him up, only he was dead. Young Mr. Penrose followed Victor to his grave; and he'll do everything he can for you all. He's sent you a pound by me, and he'll come and see you himself some day."

Bessie's white face was hidden in her apron. The house was very quiet, with an awful death-like stillness. There was no noise from the street, where all labor had long ago ceased, and there came no sound from the silent river. Even the wind, which had been moaning restlessly and incessantly for the last few days, was hushed. Fleck's words rang in her ears, as if he had been shouting them at her through the din of a storm. She shuddered when he stretched out his hand, with the sovereign in it, and touched her.

"Money!" she said with a wild, confused air; "what's that for?"

"Mr. Penrose sent it to you," he answered.

"Penrose!" she repeated.

"Ay! young Penrose," he said. "Old Penrose is dead, you know, and he's come into everything. He's promised to take care of you, and madam here, and the children; and he's sent you this."

"Did old Penrose's son send that?" she asking, pointing to the gold coin that glittered on Fleck's open palm.

"Ay! to be sure," he answered.

"Tell him, then," cried Bessie, "I'd rather starve to death in the streets than touch it with only the tip of my finger! Tell him God's curse rests on him and his ill-gotten gold. It's bought with the lives of men; of men like my Peter! Tell him his money is no better than the thirty pieces of silver that Judas threw away before he went and hanged himself."

"Chut! chut!" said the old mother softly and tremblingly.

"Mother," said Bessie, in a sharp, shrill voice of agony, "send him away! Why is he here, instead of my husband? Oh, why did God save him, and leave my poor Peter to be drowned? Send him away; and pray God I may never, never see him again, or I shall go mad!"

"And you won't take the money!" exclaimed Fleck, scarcely believing that he had heard aright.

But the old Frenchwoman was already holding the door open, and beckoning to him to leave Bessie to herself, and go away. His finger closed cautiously over the sovereign, and he slunk down-stairs and into the open street, glad enough to get away from the sight of the women's grief.

But the question came to him what he must do with the money? It was mere folly to return it to Mr. Penrose, who had already more than he knew what to do with. Besides, he could not return it to him without delivering Bessie Blake's terrible message; and that would be downright cruelty and ingratitude. Young Penrose was almost broken-hearted; and the only comfort he seemed to take was in the thought of seeking out and relieving the families of the lost crew of the Dolphin, especially that of Peter and Victor Blake. He appeared to feel an extraordinary interest in Victor, and he had been very earnest in impressing upon him that he must take that money at once.

There was nobody in the world to tell young Penrose where to find Bessie Blake but himself; unless, indeed, which was most unlikely, he made very diligent inquiries after her about Wapping. It would be very hard for him, hard and harsh and cruel, to hear such bitter words as Peter Blake's wife had just uttered. Would it not be better if he never saw her at all?

Slowly a dim idea was forming in Fleck's cunning brain. He turned away from the door of his own house to take another stroll through the deserted streets. Bessie had been a proud hussy, always holding herself aloof from her natural neighbors, like his wife. He would not harm her; but if she would rather die than take charity from Penrose, what a pity it would be for such kindness to be spurned and refused! Could no way be hit upon to save him from the trouble her conduct would cause him? It would do nobody any harm if he could only think of some plan to spare Penrose the pain, and reap a little benefit himself.

There was his own wife, about Bessie's age, and there were his two youngest children, and his wife's mother; why should not they take up the part Bessie Blake refused to fill? With a little care and contrivance there would be no risk of young Penrose discovering the scheme; and it would be a relief and consolation to him to believe that he was supporting Victor's people. For himself he was resolved never to go to sea again, and how his family were to be kept he could not tell. But if they played this game well there would be no need for him to trouble himself as long as they could keep it up. Penrose would see that none of them came to want.

The idea had not occurred to him until after Bessie had refused to accept the money; though it had been burning in his pocket all day long, and he had been longing to appropriate it. Now as he rambled about the quiet streets, turning over his plot, and arranging all its details, his fingers played with the gold coin, till all was settled in his busy, crafty brain. It was a clever dodge, he said to himself, and with very little risk in it; and Bessie Blake had only herself to blame for it.

For the first few days Bessie seemed stunned and paralyzed by her trouble. After her few household duties were done she would sit in the bow-window, looking out with a wan, set face upon the vessels passing to and fro, up and down the river. Never more would she, and Peter's mother, watch for his ship sailing homeward; never more would she bid the children clap their hands and shout "Father!" as if he could hear them call amid the noises on deck What was there left for her and them but to die, as her husband had died, to swell Penrose's riches?

But before the week was over a fresh calamity aroused her from her despair. The sailmaker handed over his stock and house of business to his creditors, and she had notice to quit as soon as she could find another dwelling-place. It was high time to wake out of the dull stupor of grief, for their stock of money was well nigh spent; and she had a helpless, ailing old woman, and two little children, all looking to her for the bare necessaries of life.

AT ICONIUM AND LYSTRA.

S. S. Lesson for June 10, Acts 14: 1-18. Golden Text, ver. 15. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

A Terrible Direction Obeyed—The Visit to the Synagogue—Wherein Paul's Success Lay—Persecution Invariably with the Awakening—Paul and Barnabas Awaiting Orders—No Reservation in Paul's Consecration—No Man's Work Indispensable—The Christian's Returned Lessons—His Travel Prolonged—A Crisis in Iconium—The Cripple at Lystra—Personal Faith Indispensable—Faith Put to the Test—Worship Tendered.

PAUL and Barnabas, in leaving Antioch, obeyed the direction of their Master to His apostles, "Whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear you when ye depart thence, shake off the dust under your feet for a testimony against them" (Mark 6: 11). "They shook off the dust of their feet against them, and came unto Iconium." But their persecutors had miscalculated; the truth of God would not die out with the departure of Paul and Barnabas, it was not tied to apostles; the disciples whom they left behind, instead of falling into discouragement and despondency "were filled with joy and with the Holy Ghost." What could Paul and Barnabas want more?

The two missionaries on their arrival at Iconium went, as they usually did on their arrival in a new city, into the synagogue, if there happened to be one; and in each city they gave their testimony to the Lord Jesus. Here at Iconium they that a multitude both of the Jews and also of the Greeks believed." Paul was perhaps the greatest preacher, judging by results, that the world ever saw; yet this man "came, not with excellency of speech or of wisdom" (1 Cor. 2 : 1); the critics of his time declared his speech "contemptible" (2 Cor. 10 : 10). Wherein then lay his unparalleled success? Let him speak for himself, "And I, brethren, when I came to you, came not with excellency of speech or of wisdom declaring unto you the testimony of God." Here is the first element of his success: he was declaring "the testimony of God," and no ideas of his own; his subject-matter was God-given, he was "a man sent from God." "For I determined not to know anything among you save Jesus Christ, and Him crucified." Here we see he did not admit of distraction, he had one thought, one message, one aim, which was all-absorbing, "Jesus Christ, and Him crucified." "And I was with you in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling;" no personal power or influence, he saw only nothingness in himself; "And my speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power; that your faith should not stand in the wisdom of men but in the power of God" (1 Cor. 2 : 1–5). In Paul's ministry there was nothing to exalt man, and to attract people to himself; all tended to attract every eye to Jesus, to occupy every thought with Jesus, not with Paul; with the message, not the messenger. Here then was the secret of his success.

But there never was an awakening yet, where the element of persecution was absent. "The unbelieving Jews (the professors of that day) stirred up the Gentiles." Thus it is always; those who make an outward profession without having the real thing, are more bitter than any others in persecuting those who have an experimental knowledge of God. Those who have little or no experience of the grace, and power, and love of God, take the greatest pains to prove that no one else has any more experience than they have, and that those who speak of real experience are either hypocrites or self-deluded. Those who have the deepest experience of spiritual things are always stretching out for more, and they never condemn that which they have not examined, lest they should lose some unfolding of the grace of God. Prejudice and shallowness go together, and so do depth and teachableness.

What should Paul and Barnabas do? A spirit of suspicion had been stirred up against them by the Jews, and it prevailed among the Gentiles also; should they leave so unpromising a field of labor? We find that many of our officers in the Blue Ribbon Gospel Army, as soon as they meet with a little unkindness and suspicion on the part of the people, want to be moved to another station. We want men such as Paul and Barnabas among us.

LONG THEREFORE ABODE THEY, working against wind and tide, not moving an inch until they had orders from Headquarters, a distinct intimation from God that they were to go. Was it pleasant? Perhaps not, but when Paul said to his Lord on the way to Damascus, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" he had never appended a codicil to that will of his which made himself over to God, stipulating that nothing unpleasant should happen to him. Paul knew what a living sacrifice meant, and he never backed out of all which it involved. He and Barnabas spoke boldly in the Lord, and our faithful Lord, on His part, bore witness to these two apostles. He "gave testimony unto the Word by His grace, and granted signs and wonders to be done by their hands."

We must not forget that while our Lord lovingly condescends to make use of us for His service, He can just as we are by no means indispensable to Him; and while He uses us, He is carrying on our education and preparing us for Himself. Had He removed Paul and Barnabas to a more promising field of labor as soon as the Jews had stirred up the Gentiles against them, very probably there might have been a great awakening in their new sphere of labor; but the precious lessons of dependence upon God, and of patience and forbearance toward man might not have been learned, and thus they would be short of much which would not only fit them for future labors, but also for eternal companionship with God. Oh, how much workers for God need to learn Moses' lesson who "endured as seeing Him who is invisible" (Heb. 11 : 27).

We should not get so many returned lessons as we do, if we invariably accepted everything which happens from the hand of God. He has to take us, like the children of Israel, the long way instead of the short way into the promised land, forty years instead of a few days, because, in our unbelief we measure all which happens by ourselves instead of measuring it by God. Things may be indeed beyond our resources, but are they beyond God's? Demands may be made upon us far beyond our strength, but if it is a settled matter with us that the Lord is our Strength and we know by experience that "they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength," then it becomes a simple matter to refer all to Him, and then, when we are clear about His will, to go forward mounting up with wings as eagles, running without weariness and walking without fainting (Isa. 40 : 31). When we learn to see God in everything, we learn, too, that nothing is impossible to us (Matt. 17 : 20). Oh, for more confidence in our God, that He doeth all things well, that He makes all things work together for good to them that love Him (Mark 7 : 37; Rom. 8 : 28).

At last things came to

"When there was an assault made both of the Gentiles, and also of the Jews with their rulers, to use them despitefully, and to stone them, they were ware of it, and fled unto Lystra and Derbe, cities of Lyconia, and unto the region that lieth round about." "When they persecute you in this city, flee ye into another," was the Lord's own command, and we see how implicitly these two dear men of God obeyed Him. They did not run away when things were disagreeable, uncomfortable, or inconvenient, they waited until there was danger to their lives, and then only fled at the command of Jesus. But would they persist in preaching the Gospel, when, instead of being appreciated, honored, and sent away with presentations of money and flattering speeches, the ungrateful people sought their blood? Yes, a thousand times yes; for these men were real, for life or death, for joy or sorrow, for ease or pain, for success or for persecution, these men were the Lord's. We do not hear of their complaining because somebody had complained of them; no, with their lives in their hands and their reputation in their hands too, "there they preached the Gospel." What that Gospel was is proved by the results. There is no doubt that Paul preached full salvation, full enough to take in spirit, soul and body, and no doubt he preached entire sanctification for the whole being as he afterward did by letter to the Thessalonians. "The very God of peace Himself sanctify you wholly; and may your spirit and soul and body be preserved entire, without blame at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."

We are not told whether there was a synagogue at Lystra, nor yet, if there was not, how and where they gathered a congregation, but we are told something of one of their auditors: "There sat a certain man at Lystra, impotent in his feet, being a cripple from his mother's womb, who never had walked; the same heard Paul speak; who, steadfastly beholding him, and to be healed, said with a loud voice, Stand upright on thy feet." We find practically that the larger number of those who write to us at Bethshan concerning faith-healing shrink from all personal responsibility, and are almost offended and ready to rank us with impostors, if we tell them the truth, that it is only as they yield to God, and themselves exercise faith in Him, that they can be healed. The majority seem desirous rather to deal with man than with God, and they seem to think some talent, or power, or property dwells in those who can only lead sick souls and bodies to Him who is the Saviour and the Healer of His people. Salvation by faith lies between God and the sinner, no minister or evangelist saves any man's soul; sanctification by faith lies between God and the believer; He may use one of His children as a finger post in both instances; exactly so, faith-healing lies between Jehovah Rophi, the Lord that healeth thee (Ex. 15 : 26), and the sick one, we may again be finger posts but nothing more, just to direct the sick one to the Healer.

Paul did not either see or feel in himself the power to heal the impotent man at Lystra, but "perceiving that he had faith to be healed, said with a loud voice, Stand upright on thy feet." Up to that moment, the lame man had only been drinking in the glorious news of full and free salvation; now was his he must choose whether to act according to what he felt, and had always felt and experienced, or whether according to the glad news which he had heard. Losing sight of himself, filled only with the consciousness of God with him, he acted faith, for "he leaped and walked." But how could he? How could you, believer, first lay hold of Christ as a Saviour? how could you leap into eternal life? You believed, and you found yourself in a new world. So with this man. He knew now what the life of God was both in soul and body. We should like to ask the many who declare that it is wrong for invalids to desire healing, whether this man most showed forth the glory of God in his crippled state, or when walking on both feet he praised his God, and showed in his outward man, as well as in a changed heart, the greatness of the love of God?

The people of the city, seeing what was done, immediately concluded that Paul and Barnabas were their gods, Jupiter and Mercury; and were about to offer sacrifice and divine honors to them. This was terrible to these men of God, who "ran in among the people, crying out, and saying, Sirs, why do ye these things? We also are with you, and preach unto you that ye should turn from these vanities unto the living God, which made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all things that are therein." Paul wanted to bring the people in contact with God, and to turn them away from helpless men such as he and Barnabas were. And truly we can say that this is our aim at Bethshan. Oh, how it grieves our hearts when letters come to us asking for "advice," as though we were doctors, and offering us a fee! with no recognition of the Lord Jesus our great Physician—letters again which say, "Do what you can for me," as though we could do anything! Some there are who appear to have the impression that there is some special efficacy in our prayers, as though there were a magic or charm about them! Poor souls, the virtue is not in the prayer, but in the answer, which the Lord is waiting to bestow upon all who look to Him, through that blessed One who was wounded for our transgressions, bruised for our iniquities, who took our infirmities and bore our sicknesses (Isa. 53 : 5; Matt. 8 : 17). O Lord attract the eyes of Thy sick ones to Thyself, and glorify Thyself in them.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Czar Entered Moscow for the Coronation ceremonies on May 20th. He was received with unbounded enthusiasm and the city was gorgeously decorated and brilliantly illuminated in his honor. The special correspondent of the New York Herald thus describes the appearance of the streets and public buildings: "All the first hotels and public edifices have special decorations. The palace of the Governor of Moscow is covered with garlands and sweet fir leaves festooned from the windows to the ground. In the centre is a monogram of the initials 'A. M.,' ten feet high, in rose blossoms. Every detail of door or window is picked out in colored lamps, which at night will transform the façade into bowers of brightness, while the portico is of forest fir boughs and flowers. Every shop is resplendent with huge gold letters on a black ground, the characters being in Russo-Greek or antique Slav. These add something cabalistic to the magic of the whole, while the resplendent profusion of the church porches and the fretwork of light iron canopies over every hotel door vary the outlines until the whole scene becomes a marvel of novelty and varied attraction." The Emperor's procession was a strange and picturesque sight, as it comprised representatives of the Asiatic dominions of Russia, who were clad in splendid robes and sparkled with glittering jewels. "The Czar and Czarina were received with deafening shouts by the loyal crowds. Alexander looks very noble, happy and satisfied. His dress was the dark green uniform of a Cossack general, with a black wool cap on his head. He was followed by his staff of 200 men of every regiment, nation, and uniform it is possible to imagine. Eight white horses, veiled in cascades of gold fringe and ridden by postilions, draw the splendid vehicle in which the handsome young Empress is seated in her imperial robes. She wears the Russian tiara. Her carriage is worthy of note, not only for the detail and lavish decoration in crimson velvet of the roof and painted panels, but because it was built for the great Catherine and used at her coronation." The expenses of the coronation will, it is expected, amount to nearly seven million dollars.

The Pope's Circular to the Irish Bishops forbidding them to collect money for the Parnell fund or to aid the Land League agitation is still causing bitter feeling in Ireland. Archbishop Croke, who has recently returned from Rome, after vainly endeavoring to enlist the Pope's sympathies on behalf of the Parnell cause, was received with enthusiasm by the people of his diocese, who illuminated the hills and villages of Limerick County in his honor. The Archbishop, replying to an address of welcome presented to him at the Wicklow depot, said it was the Pope's great love for the Irish people that caused him to be so solicitous for their welfare. He was confident that when the Pope understood the situation better the efforts of the priesthood and of himself for the Irish would be crowned with success. Time would prove the correctness of his representations to the Pope. Meanwhile he urged the people to submit to the Vatican.

Difficulties Between the Pope and the European courts are again reported. The European press is full of rumors of ruptures between Rome and France, Rome and Germany, and Rome and Ireland. The Soleil and other French anti-republican papers hint that there are impending difficulties which may place the Elysée in the same position in relation to the Holy See as was the Court of Berlin after the promulgation of the laws of May.

The French Forces have Already Commenced hostilities in Madagascar by bombarding the town Majunga. The engagement lasted six hours, when the French troops landed and occupied the place. The Hovas suffered great loss. A Paris dispatch says: "Advices have been received from Madagascar that a French detachment landed and carried several military posts which had been erected by the Hovason Sakalava territory in defiance of French rights. It is also stated that Admiral Pierre has occupied the Custom House at Majunga, thus securing the road and waterway leading to Tananarivo, the capital of the island." It is semi-officially stated in Paris that the object of the French expedition to Madagascar is to obtain the payment of sums due the French government from Madagascar by holding the custom-houses there as security for the amount. France will surely suffer retribution for this iniquitous attack.

The Governor-Generalship of Canada, the English newspapers say, has been offered to the Marquis of Lansdowne and accepted. It is expected that the Marquis of Lorne will return to England in October or November next, and that his successor will immediately undertake the duties of the office. Lord Lansdowne takes from the peerage of Ireland the titles by which his family is best known. He is credited with great wealth, but the depreciation of Irish estates may have largely reduced his resources. He is thirty-eight years old, and has several times held office under the liberals. He was a Lord of the Treasury from 1869 to 1872, Under Secretary of War from 1872 to 1874, Under Secretary for India in 1880. He married the youngest daughter of the Duke of Abercorn.

Queen Victoria's Injured Limb is Pronounced well by her physicians, but cable dispatches aver that she has been a prey of late to fits of deep depression, which neither her physicians nor the members of her family have been able to alleviate. The former have strenuously opposed her going to the Highlands, as likely to be followed by the worst results, but she refuses their advice abruptly, and sits in gloomy contemplation. Her condition causes a great deal of anxiety, owing to the fact that her grandfather, King George III., suffered from insanity.

Martin Luther's 400th Anniversary.—Great preparations are already being made to celebrate the 400th anniversary of Luther's birth, in next November, when, among other things, tableaux vivants, representing the chief events in the great German Reformer's life, will be exhibited at Erfurt, his birthplace. At the beginning of August there is to be a preliminary celebration in the shape of an historical procession, representing the reception of Luther on his way from Weimar to Worms, by the citizens and University of Erfurt; and this will be followed by an excursion to the neighboring Wartburg, and popular festivities.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey appear to have commanded increasing confidence and love during their recent evangelistic campaign in Great Britain, and their return in October or November is anticipated with prayerful and sanguine anticipation. It is said that in Liverpool alone there is fruit enough to refute a thousand times the suspicion that the work eight years ago was evanescent. The Free Breakfasts, the Carters' Mission with its two thousand professing converts, the Cocoa Palace Company with its forty thriving establishments, all rose out of the 1875 Mission; and, according to the testimony of many ministers and superintendents of Christian work, the evangelistic and other agencies connected with these and with many chapels, churches, and missions, are largely manned by the converts of that year. Mr. Moody, before leaving for America, visited Edinburgh, and laid the foundation-stone of new buildings for Carrubber's Close Mission, the site for which adjoins John Knox's house.

A Rival Lecturer in India.—A Missionary recently returned from India mentioned at a London meeting an incident which shows that the more thoughtful classes in that country are awakening to the truths of Christianity. He said: "It was our custom in Masulipatam to have Sunday morning lectures on different aspects of Christianity, attended by 200 or 300 intelligent hearers. Of course this provoked opposition, and after my first lecture a native barrister advertised a rival lecture for the following Saturday. In a clever speech, he discarded all book revelations. This led to a discussion at the close, and the next day his chairman, who also presided for me, said with much earnestness, 'I wish to take this opportunity of saying that I entirely disagree with the lecture of yesterday. Christianity has its Bible, Mohammedanism its Koran, the Hindoos their Vedas. It is not for us to say that all are alike false, but to read and search in order to know which is the true revelation of God.' He concluded with the wonderfully pathetic and solemn words, 'My friends, we devote far too much time to the consideration of things of this life. Let us devote a little more to the things of eternity.' At the end of the course of lectures, fifteen or twenty persons were found willing and eager to join a class for the study of God's Word."

The Mission of a Shop-Window.—The Window of the Bible Society's depot in Warsaw, Poland, has been made very attractive; it has a mission of its own. A gentleman was one day noticed standing for above half an hour reading all the different passages exposed to view. He then entered to inquire about these "interesting story-books." The depositary was surprised that one who seemed a well-educated gentleman should make the frequent mistake of common people. "You mean a Bible or New Testament?" he asked. "No," he said; "who would think of reading the Bible in the nineteenth century? I mean the interesting books in your window. They remind me of things told me in my youth." A serious conversation followed. This gentleman had attended no divine service for above thirty years. The Bible had become to him like a long-forgotten dream, and he was drawn to it again by the shop-window! Not long afterward he was led by the Holy Spirit to accept Christ as his Saviour.

Losing a Lover for Christ's Sake.—In Connection with the effective ministrations of the Waldensian Mission, nearly five hundred conversions have been secured during the past year, and these mainly from the Church of Rome. A young lady, a catechumen in the church at Turin, Italy, was engaged to a young man, a Roman Catholic, who could offer her a good position in life. Feeling sure of the girl's strong affection, he thought it would be quite easy to induce her to renounce the Gospel, and used by turns entreaties and threats, but all in vain. His betrothed resisted all, saying, "I love you, but I love my Saviour much more." Irritated by a resistance which he did not expect, he offered her the alternative: "If you remain in the Roman Catholic religion in which you were born I will marry you; but if you persist in becoming an evangelical, all is at an end between us." The young girl nobly decided to be a servant of the truth as it is in Jesus, and in her decision showed that like Mary, the friend of Christ, of Bethany, she had chosen the good part which shall not be taken away from her.

Volume V. of the Christian Herald and Signs of our Times is now ready, bound in cloth, containing all the numbers for 1882 with complete index. Price $3 including postage. Ten per cent less to ministers and the trade.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

THE REV. J. P. CHOWN,

President of the Baptist Union of Great Britain.

Born in 1821—First Pastorate at Ravensthorpe in 1844—Enters Horton College in 1846—Becomes Minister of Sion Chapel, Bradford in 1848—Succeeds Dr. Brock at Bloomsbury in 1875—His Popular Personal Qualities—Important Services Rendered—Interest in Temperance Work.

JOSEPH PARBERRY CHOWN, the President of the English Baptist Union, whose name is well known in Baptist churches on this side the Atlantic, is the popular and beloved minister of Bloomsbury Chapel, London. He is now in the sixty-second year of his age, having been born in December, 1821, at Kingsthorpe, Northamptonshire, England. At a very early period he devoted himself to Christ as his Saviour and Lord, and his natural gift of oratory, combined with fervent and consistent piety, marked him out distinctively for the work of the Christian ministry.

HIS FIRST PASTORATE.

Without a higher intellectual training than was supplied by a fair school education, and an early love of literature, especially of a poetic and imaginative kind, Mr. Chown, at the age of twenty-three, accepted the pastoral oversight of the Baptist Church, Ravensthorpe, situated about seven miles from his birthplace. At that period Ravensthorpe could not boast of a population far above six hundred people; but, small as it was, it certainly showed the young pastor that he had need of all the intellectual and spiritual strength he could acquire, to discharge the responsible duties belonging to a Christian minister's position.

ENTERS COLLEGE.

Mr. Chown's labors in his first pastorate were very brief, not exceeding a period of two years. The very success of his ministry among the villagers had awakened within him an intense desire for yet higher qualifications of a mental character, and therefore, in the year 1846, he resigned his pastorate to the grief of the people, and entered Horton (now Rawdon) College, Bradford, as a student and a stranger; little imagining that he had actually reached the town where he was destined to spend so many of the most fruitful years of his life.

His college course was brief, but marked with characteristic energy. The ordinary curriculum in those days extended over four years, and Mr. Chown has since regretted that he was not permitted to avail himself of the provision to the fullest extent. In after years he said that he had seriously suffered all his life long through the too-successful importunity of the church of which he became the minister to accept its generous invitation.

SION CHAPEL, BRADFORD.

The Baptist Church at Sion Chapel, Bradford, having been left destitute by the resignation of its esteemed pastor, the Rev. Thomas Pottenger, sought the services of the eloquent Horton student, and in June, 1848, he accepted the pressing call of the Church to become its pastor, and sustained the important charge for twenty-seven years. This long period of service came to a close when he removed to London to succeed the late Dr. Brock, at Bloomsbury Chapel, in 1875.

The field of ministerial operations in connection with Bloomsbury Chapel is extensive, its agencies are multifarious, and the labor involved arduous; the minister, therefore, who can there perform successfully the functions of his office must have the advantages of a good natural physique, great bodily vigor, and lengthened experience, as well as power of heart and brain. These advantages Mr. Chown certainly possesses in an eminent degree, as the result of his many years of labor in Bradford proves.

POPULAR PERSONAL QUALITIES.

In addition to his pulpit labors Mr. Chown is exceedingly active and attentive in the discharge of private pastoral labors in which he has shown how true and tender the Christian pastor can be. No public work with him has ever been an excuse for the neglect of the poorest or most obscure in his congregation. He takes a perpetual delight in proving himself to be the friend, the comforter, and the helper of all. In connection, too, with larger and public interests, he has exemplified the truth that a Christian pastor may take his part in the community, not as a priest, but as a man, and while regarding as of paramount importance the spiritual concerns of men, is also mindful of secular interests, and, like his Divine Master, cares for the bodies as well as for the souls of men.

IMPORTANT SERVICES.

Mr. Chown's great power has lain from the first in the pulpit and on the platform. In Bradford he was one of the very few men who, single-handed, could fill the colossal St. George's Hall. Several times he has preached the great anniversary sermons of the Baptist societies, as well as for the London Missionary Society, and the Wesleyan Methodist Society. But, whether before enthusiastic thousands, in the metropolitan pulpit, or away in some rural village, he has always the same message to deliver, in the same frank, manly, energetic style. Jesus the one and only Saviour and salvation by Him alone he proclaims on all occasions. The audience invariably feel that they are in the presence of an earnest man, speaking of living realities; and the power which belongs to the Word of God, so uttered, never fails.

INTEREST IN TEMPERANCE WORK.

Independently of his exacting pulpit labors and numerous pastoral engagements, Mr. Chown has always lent the weight of his influence on the platform and elsewhere to the advancement of the Temperance cause, and in this way, also, has been the means in God's hands of effecting a large amount of good. He has been an abstainer about forty years, and takes considerable interest in the work of the Baptist Total Abstinence Society. He was one of the speakers at the special meeting convened by the National Temperance League, and held on February 20th last, in Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle, for the purpose of directing "attention to the progress of temperance in English Christian churches of all denominations."

THE REV. WILLIAM LANDELS, D.D.

Born in 1823—Conversion and Early Studies for the Presbyterian Ministry—Becomes a Baptist—Pastoral Charges—Becomes President of the Baptist Union in 1876—Noble Efforts on Behalf of Poor Ministers.

DR. W. LANDELS, whose portrait appears on the preceding page, is an ex-President of the Baptist Union, and is one of the foremost and most deserving men in the Baptist denomination in Great Britain. He has just removed from London to accept an important pastorate in Edinburgh. He is sixty years of age, having been born in 1823 at Eyemouth, in Berwickshire.

Dr. Landels owed little to external advantages in his youth; and the story of his early years would furnish a touching and impressive example of the pursuit of knowledge under difficulties. Having been converted to Christ among the Presbyterians in his youth, he felt himself called by God to devote himself to the ministry, and became a student under the Rev. Dr. James Morison, of Kilmarnock, more recently of Glasgow. It was, we believe, before the close of his curriculum at the Theological Hall in Kilmarnock that he was led to believe in the tenets of the Baptist denomination, and at once identified himself with that body, of which he has since become a conspicuous ornament.

PASTORAL CHARGES.

His first pastoral charge was at Cupar-Fife, and so attractive and successful was his early ministry that overtures were frequently made to him from churches in different parts of Great Britain who had heard of his worth and fame. Eventually he was induced to remove to Birmingham, where he became pastor of one of the largest congregations in that important town, the institutions associated with the Circus Chapel flourishing under his genial superintendence. Occasional ministrations in London subsequently led to his being asked to take the oversight of Regent's Park Chapel.

WORK AT REGENT'S PARK.

It was in 1855 that Dr. Landels commenced his work at Regent's Park Chapel, and as the late eminent judge, Sir Robert Lush, who was one of the deacons of the church, stated some little time ago, "No one can estimate the amount of blessing which has radiated from this centre of light and activity." The fact that the late Sir Robert Lush was for years one of the deacons at Regent's Park, and that Principal Angus, of Regent's Park College, one of the members of the New Testament Revised Company, was also a member of the church, is sufficient of itself to establish both the high culture and the superior character of the congregation to which Dr. Landels ministered with the best results for about twenty-seven years.

PRESIDENT OF THE BAPTIST UNION.

In 1876 Dr. Landels was elevated by his brethren to the Presidency of the Baptist Union, and his term of office was distinguished by the most practical piece of work which any Chairman, Moderator, or President has ever accomplished. He canvassed England, and raised the splendid sum of $250,000 as a fund for the sustenance of poor ministers and their widows and orphans. His brethren in the ministry, in the spring of 1877, presented Dr. Landels with a testimonial expressive of their gratitude for his self-denying and most arduous labors in their behalf.

Dr. Landels is the author of many religious volumes, and as a lecturer he has enjoyed a large measure of popularity in England and Scotland. His oration on "The Covenanters" was one of the most eloquent ever heard in Exeter Hall.

"HOW MEN ARE MADE"

is the title of another lecture he delivered, which has probably done more good in the development of mind and character among young men than any other lecture. It has been published, and its circulation is enormous. To students for the ministry, and young men generally, he is a true and stanch friend. His very name is reverenced by the poor, to whom the members of his late church, at Regent's Park, dispensed the fruits of the noble generosity which their minister's words and example evoked.

THE REV. C. H. SPURGEON'S ENCOMIUM.

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon recently said on the occasion of the presentation ceremonial referred to: "We shall all rejoice to see you spared for many, many years among us. What you have done the ages shall know. You have by your disinterested effort in Christ's name, brought the Baptist denomination into a more thorough unity, for we are never united except we have some grand practical object in view. You have proved that those who lead the way in the larger spheres do care for the poorer men."

BIBLE DISTRIBUTION STANDS.

The Origin of the Scheme—The Original Stand at the Great Exhibition of 1862—The Aggregate of Five Months' Work—Growing Success—Illustrations of Good Done: A German Roman Catholic Converted; A Dutch Jew and His Family Baptized; A Frenchman Led to Christ; An Infidel Converted—Transference of the Stand to the Crystal Palace, Sydenham—The Paris Exhibition of 1867—Agents Employed—The Naples Bible Stand in 1871—The Second French Exhibition in 1878—Last Year's Work at the Crystal Palace, Sydenham.

A WORK with which both the ministers, whose lives have been briefly sketched on this page, are in hearty sympathy, is that of Bible Distribution at places to which the travellers of all nations are attracted by exhibitions, artistic and industrial. The scheme originated in the mind of Mr. William Hawke, an earnest Christian, who in 1862, while dwelling on the project of the great exhibition in London, was led to see in it an opportunity to disseminate the good seed of the Kingdom. He promptly sketched a plan upon paper for a Bible stand, from which the Scriptures in different languages might be circulated, and although there was no money that he could command for the furtherance of this work of faith and labor of love, yet he induced two or three gentlemen, together with others who voluntarily contributed, to contribute a necessary fund for starting operations. The work proceeded very quietly, and with God's most manifest blessing. The following small books, chiefly portions of the New Testament, were given away from June 9th to November 1st, 1862: English, 81,806; French, 21,349; German, 13,355; Italian, 11,494; Hebrew, 3625; Spanish, 3555; Swedish, 1991; Dutch, 242; Portuguese, 100; Danish, 101. Also 2,364,000 Scripture cards in seven different languages, and 715,000 leaflets in English.

THE ORIGINAL BIBLE STAND, which is now in the Crystal Palace, Sydenham, and is shown on page 364, is of Gothic design, divided into seven compartments, and over each was painted on gilded glass panels the words "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved and thy house." Beneath each quotation of this passage, which was translated into the different languages, was the name of the country, and above it the flag and arms of the particular nation. In the centre was the flag of England with an open carved Bible, on which was written the texts, "Thou God seest me," and "Because I live, ye shall live also," and over the Bible the quotation "Search the Scriptures." On each side of that standard were those of France, Italy, Germany, Sweden, and then over the compartment farthest on England's right there was a blank, and above that a flag upon which was written in Hebrew the word "Israel," under which, on the gilded panel, was the Gospel promise in Jewish characters. Israel has no country; and in the gathering of the nations, the most ancient of them all could only be known by the name which, of old time, God Himself gave them, viz., "Israel." And that one word "Israel" was enough. Without coat of arms, or banner, or name of fatherland, it caught the eyes and hearts of the scattered ones, and drew them to the spot.

MORE THAN TWO THOUSAND JEWS, from almost every part of the world, called at the Hebrew division of the "Bible Stand," and asked for copies of the Word of Life, and, having received it, many generously contributed their mite toward this Christian effort for their own evangelization. It was pleasing to see how God was by this means employing this extraordinary people as missionary agents—Jews from France, Italy, Germany, Hungary, Holland, Russia, Palestine, Africa, Australia, India, and even from China, took away portions, and in many cases the whole of the New Testament, and thus conveyed them to regions where probably no missionary had ever penetrated. On the facia running from end to end of the "Bible Stand" was the text, "Glory to God in the Highest, on earth, peace, good-will toward men," while on the frontispiece to the covering of the stand was written, in bold gold letters, the text from Revelation, "Behold He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see Him; and they also which pierced Him," the word "pierced" being in blood red, under which, "Surely, I come quickly. Even so, Come Lord Jesus." Two large flags towered above all, one at each extremity of this covering.

GROWING SUCCESS OF THE WORK.

This work and labor of love increased as it became known, the distribution in August exceeding that of July, September considerably that of August, while October surpassed them all. The Word of Life was received by the foreigners with thankfulness and seeming gratitude, as well as by the English generally; but in many instances, and to the extent of some thousands, the Scripture cards were torn up and strewed on the pathway near the stand. Among the many instances of blessing to individuals, the following cases may be mentioned.

INCIDENTS OF THE WORK.

A German Roman Catholic, after much hesitation, came up to the stand and received two separate Gospels; a fortnight after he returned and had another one, and wished to be pointed to a Christian place of worship. He was taken to a German Church in the Strand, and there recommended to a Protestant minister; after this he wrote a letter, in German, saying he was so very happy, for he had found Christ in a foreign country, through the reading of God's precious Word.

A Dutch Jew, after having received the gift of "The New Covenant" for the first time in his life, in a few days returned and said he had been reading it with his wife and two daughters; and they were struck with the beautiful things contained in it, and with the good and holy words which Jesus taught the people, and that he was fully convinced of the truths of Christianity and desired to be baptized.

A Frenchman was found earnestly reading the second chapter of the Book of Revelation under a lamp in the neighborhood of the Haymarket, between ten and eleven o'clock at night, on a leaf which had been torn out from one of the little books, which he picked up. He was presented with a Gospel in French, which he gratefully received, and there was reason to believe he was brought to the knowledge of Jesus as his Saviour.

AN INFIDEL LED TO CHRIST.

A poor woman, once a fallen sister, but brought to Jesus before the opening of the Bible Stand, received a few of the Scripture cards, and gave one of them to an infidel friend of hers. The truth upon that card was brought home with saving power to his soul. Soon after receiving it he was taken ill, and when on his death-bed he sent for his sister, and as a last request entreated for that very card to be buried with him in his coffin. He fell asleep in Jesus, and the poor body and card lie quiet together in the grave.

A paper, signed by more than fifty Italians, resident in England for many years, was received, offering their grateful acknowledgments for the interest felt in their salvation, as evinced by the gratuitous distribution of the Scriptures among them; and expressing a hope that their brothers might carry back the "Word of God" with them into Italy, and that it might be the means of enlightening their countrymen who were in such gross darkness.

But the International Exhibition has passed away, yet the work of Bible distribution has not ceased; for the Bible Stand, and the distribution of the Word of God to foreigners, in seven different languages, still continues in

THE CRYSTAL PALACE,

Sydenham, and although the distribution of books and cards is much smaller than at the Exhibition of 1862, or any subsequent Exhibitions, yet there is a steady daily application on the part of nearly all the foreign visitors for the "Bread of Life," which they receive with thankfulness and gratitude, expressing, in many instances, their surprise and astonishment that the English people should take so great an interest in their welfare as to give them the Scriptures gratis.

BIBLE STAND AT THE PARIS EXHIBITION OF 1867.

The success, so far exceeding the most sanguine anticipations of those engaged in the work, which attended the distribution of the Word of God at the English Exhibition of 1862, induced Mr. Hawke and his friends to endeavor to obtain and employ a similar opportunity in connection with the Exposition Universelle of 1867. The commodious and picturesque building was in due time erected by the Committee of the Crystal Palace Bible Stand.

The Committee were happy also in the selection of their agents, for on their fitness for their work and devotion to it much depended. A pastor from Italy; a student from Germany; a prisoner, for conscience' sake, from Spain; an officer from Russia; a devoted Christian from Sweden; a missionary to the Jews from Algiers; a civil engineer who had labored much in Spain; "an Israelite indeed," from Poland; a medical student from Dublin. These all labored in connection with men of like precious faith, French, Dutch, and English, during the seven months the Exposition lasted. Such were the working bees in this busy hive-like building. Such was the united company of brave soldiers of the Cross of Christ encamped beneath this tent-like roof. (A picture of the Stand is given on our frontispiece.)

MARVELLOUS DISTRIBUTION.

These men, officered by Mr. Hawke, gave to the multitudes, sometimes so thronging them on every side as to require a barricade to resist the pressure, upward of two millions and a quarter of copies of God's Word; chiefly the Gospels and the Epistle to the Romans, in seventeen different languages. The proportion of these as to language was something like the following: 2,000,000 French; 55,000 German; 20,000 Italian; 15,000 Spanish; 10,000 Russian; 7000 Hebrew; 3000 Arabic; 1000 Turkish; 50 Chinese. Not fewer than 80,000 French soldiers received Scriptures and tracts. Many a Spanish soldier, too, carried back to his own land a copy of God's Word, and probably some other Christian book. Thus, in the knapsacks of some of her own army did Spain, whose rulers proscribed and refused all entrance to the Book of Truth, receive that precious gift within her frontiers.

THE NAPLES BIBLE STAND.

In 1871 a Bible Stand, under the same auspices, was erected at the Exhibition at Naples, on which occasion, though the work was exceedingly difficult, and had to be conducted with the most exemplary prudence, no fewer than 141,800 Gospels were distributed. (A representation of the Stand used is given in the upper portion of our frontispiece.) In 1878, again, when the second French Exhibition was held, Mr. Hawke and his friends, Christian representatives and laborers of different nationalities, once more engaged in the work of giving to the visitors, who would accept them, tidings of the Divine mercy in Christ, in the language in which they were born. The number distributed at this time was 1,411,648 Gospels and portions of Scripture, in twenty-two languages.

LAST YEAR'S WORK AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

The year 1882 was one of great activity in the work of distributing the "wonderful words of life." From the Bible Stand, Crystal Palace, there were issued, in fifteen languages, 5501 Gospels, 17 Bibles, 78 New Testaments, and 200,018 Text Books, Cards and Leaflets, not including the sale issue, which numbered 823 Bibles, 847 New Testaments, 1928 Portions, and nearly 7000 Text Books, Cards, etc. There were forwarded also from the same centre of hallowed activity thousands of Portions of the Word of Truth to sailors, soldiers, and emigrants in various ports of the United Kingdom, and at fairs and races. In addition to all this, the postal system has been wisely and successfully utilized, and more than 614,000 Portions have been circulated by this and other agencies during the past year, in Belgium, Rome and other centres in Italy, France, Spain, Sierra Leone, and North Africa. The aggregate circulation of the Bible, either whole or in parts, since 1862 to the last day of December, 1882, was no less than 17,928,492. What hath God wrought!

An Interesting Incident Occurred on May 24th at the Baptist Bible Convention assembled at Saratoga, N. Y., when Dr. George Dana Boardman, president of the Missionary Union, presented the society with a gavel. The gavel is made of sacred wood, and on one side of the handle is an imbedded stone from the monument erected over the grave of the late Dr. George Dana Boardman, and on the other side is a piece of wood taken from the cage in which Dr. Judson was at one time imprisoned in the Burmese Empire. Both relics are appropriately inscribed. The church of which Dr. Boardman is pastor is the one in which the Missionary Union was organized sixty-nine years ago.

GREAT ACCIDENTS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, June 3, 1883.

[Four days after the catastrophe on the Brooklyn Bridge, when twelve persons were trampled to death and forty others injured.]

"Go to now, ye that say, To-day or to-morrow we will go into such a city and continue there a year, and buy and sell, and get gain; whereas ye know not what shall be on the morrow. For what is your life? It is even a vapor that appeareth for a little time and then vanisheth away."—JAMES 4 : 13, 14.

The Eighth Wonder of the World—The Bridges of Antiquity Eclipsed—A Great Tragedy—The Safest Course in a Panic—The Worldly Lesson of the Calamity—Keep Cool—Unfair Abuse—A Pure Accident—The Religious Lesson—A Great Heresy—How to Live Right—A Lesson of Sympathy—The Great Chord of Coming Harmony—Life's Rare Staccato Passages—What is Life?—A Test—An Apprenticeship—A Conflict—Only One White Tent—A Prophecy—A Preparation—A Great Uncertainty—The World not Ruled by an Autocrat—Personal Testimony—The Great Voice—Sympathy and Congratulation.

THE eighth wonder of the world had been built. Multitudes of people either through their own eyes or through vivid description had gazed upon it. People who had been compelled to spend all their lives in these cities and had not seen many of the wonderful sights of the world, had the satisfaction at last of seeing the greatest. Trajan's bridge across the Danube, Xerxes's bridge across the Hellespont, Cæsar's bridge across the Rhine, Darius's bridge across the Bosphorus, Nicoris's bridge across the Euphrates, the Pons Ælius across the Tiber seem to be eclipsed by the greater wonder uniting these two great cities. The opening ceremonies had just closed, the roar of the cannon had hardly ceased its reverberation, the two cities had hardly taken off their gay girdle of bunting, when all our hearts are shocked with

A GREAT TRAGEDY.

Twelve lives sacrificed. Forty people reported as wounded. A long roll of casualties that will never be known. A woman stumbles and falls, and there is an outcry, and people imagine there is something the matter with the bridge, and others are impelled by a morbid curiosity, and there is a rush, and a trampling, and a massacre, and a bereavement of many households—fathers and mothers and brothers and sisters pushed out of life in most sudden and horrible manner.

Was there anything the matter with the bridge? No. That stands firm as the eternal hills. The next century will have no power to weaken it. This generation will cross it, and the next, and the next, and the next. In that case, as in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of a thousand, there was nothing the matter—absolutely nothing. When will people learn that amid great excitements is to sit or stand still? What a sad thing it is that one fool or one ruffian can turn thousands of people into a herd of buffaloes.

Our deepest commiseration is aroused for the suffering, and our prayers for the bereft. Oh, the sudden reversal from hilarity to heart break. To go out on bright excursion and come home with only part of the family! Some of us know the horror of the contrast. Those people who were sacrificed were in no wise to blame, but they were the victims of a heedless crowd, the victims of a vast number of people rushing there to see what was the matter. So we have seen again and again. A person taken ill in some public assembly—five hundred people rising to see what is the matter. A person carried out—a great crowd gathering around to see what is the matter, until resuscitation is almost an impossibility. Horses running away with a vehicle—who get hurt? Those who jump. Who come off with few scars? Those who sit still. These people trodden under foot by a great crowd of heedless ones rushing ahead to see what is the matter.

There are, in this great calamity, a worldly side and a religious side, and the worldly side says:

"KEEP COOL,

don't lose your equilibrium, never go to see what is the matter unless you can be of practical help." If there be a riot on Fulton Street, go down Schermerhorn Street. If people fall on a bridge, walk the other way, and give them an opportunity to get up. Your curiosity will only make things worse. Some say that all this was the result of the work of pickpockets, and others charge it to the incompetency of officials. It was a pure accident, and no precaution could have hindered it. As good and as wise men as there are in these cities gave their entire time to the consideration of the subject for a long while before, and made every reasonable precaution. Curiosity to see what was the matter on the part of a great multitude trampled these poor victims to death.

The tendency at such a time is to blame the bridge trustees, and such blame at this time is especially unfair. After twelve or fourteen years of suffering, of calumny, being charged with taking too long to build the bridge, and too much money to build the bridge, and not liking this, and not liking that, and not liking the other thing, I tell you they need no new instalment of abuse. They did their work grandly, magnificently—did it under all possible discouragements, and were no more to blame for the disaster than you are, or I. Oh, how wise people are after anything has happened. "I told you so!" To hear us talk you would think we were better engineers than Roebling, and that the bridge trustees made the great mistake of their life when they did not call us into their councils.

Who are the critics of these bridge trustees? The people who put their thousands and their tens of thousands of dollars into the enterprise? No. Not one of them made a larger investment than one cent of toll at the gate, and having paid that one cent of toll they think they have bought the right to boss everything. I have my ideas as to how the bridge might be bettered, and there are five hundred thousand people in these cities who have their ideas as to how the bridge might be bettered, and if the Board of Trustees of the Bridge Company would only take all our advice, what a bridge we would have! The present wonder eclipsed by the greater curiosity spanning the East River! My hope is that as those men have had strength given them to endure the abuse which came before the bridge was opened, they will have the strength to endure the abuse that comes after the bridge is opened. The applause of dedication day has its recoil. It is always so. The cry of hosanna always followed by the cry of "crucify Him!"

But this calamity has a religious side, and some people immediately say we ought to live as though every day were our last, which is of the age. You put that theory into practice and you will be a nuisance to the world instead of a help to it. Live as though you were to have a long life on earth, laying out all your plans with reference to a long life and the eternity that comes after it. It ought to be our ambition to live right, and then we will die right, whether we go through long decadence of our faculties, or through sudden calamity, as did the unfortunates of last Wednesday. Healthy and intelligent Christians do not set grave diggers' spades on their sideboard, nor go worrying about quick transit from this world to the next. You consecrate to Jesus Christ your life and do your best to make people happy, and your death will be a beautiful peroration.

It seems to me there is in this great calamity a good solid

LESSON OF SYMPATHY.

We opened the papers and read the list of the wounded and the dead. The first question in your mind and mine was, "Did we know any of them?" They were all strangers to me, perhaps they were to you, and yet our heart thrilled with sympathy. Their grief our grief, their calamity our calamity. Oh, it is beautiful to see this chord of sympathy running through all human hearts. Mines in Wales fall in upon workmen, and all nations feel the suffocation Prince Albert dies and Queen Victoria has th sympathy of all Christendom. Earthquak rocks down a Mexican city, and all the worl sympathizes. Famine stalks across Ireland and all nations send cargoes of breadstuffs. Ou President lies wounded at Long Branch, an simultaneously people gather at the bulleti boards in Washington, in Savannah, in Ne Orleans, in San Francisco, in Paris, in Londor in Berlin, in St. Petersburg—all nations at onc reading: "Better," "worse," "dying," "dead!

So there is one great chord of sympathy run ning through all our hearts, and it is that chor of sympathy which thrilled last Wednesda when we heard of the misfortune, which is ye going to bring all nations into accord, bindin them all together and then binding them to th heart of God. And the ship of war that lie anchored in the harbor will be turned into merchantman, or swing into the navy yard as specimen of barbarous times, to be looked a just as we examine scalping knives or thumb screws. And the great towers that tolled alarn and woe will strike another sound—Scotch kir and American church and mission chapel an great St. Paul thundering tones of Christ's vic tory, and Marsellaise hymn and Bonnie Doo and God save the Queen mingled in one grea doxology, rolling like the surges of the sea, rol ing like the thunders of the sky. "Hallelujah for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth!" Oh it is the chord of sympathy. Paul struck it righ when he said: "Of one blood all nations tha dwell on the face of the earth."

But there is in this great calamity a back ground for the better understanding of th question of my text:

"WHAT IS YOUR LIFE?"

In most of our lives there are few staccato pa sages. Most of our days and years are in a mon otone. If you are forty years of age, you hav lived fourteen thousand six hundred days, an without a memorandum you could not give a account of fifty of them. We rise in the morning we breakfast, we go to our occupations, we at tend to the business of our life, we lunch, w dine, we come home, we sleep. Wednesday i a copy of Tuesday and Thursday an echo o Wednesday, and it needs some great arousa some great calamity, some great misfortune t arouse in our soul the question of the text "What is your life?"

Well, if in the presence of this great sorro you press that question, I answer,

LIFE IS A TEST.

Every new ship must have a trial trip. If yo take some one into your employ and a crisi comes where his behavior will make or brea you, you say, "Now, I will test him; now I wi see what is in him." And, my friends, our who life is a test, and we are all on a trial trip. Me angels, devils the spectators. Heaven, eart and hell watching. Every word spoken an every action having ten thousand echoes. Yo are watching me to see if I am faithful or u faithful, I am watching you to see if you a faithful or unfaithful. Every man and woma in solemn, unmistakable, stupendous test.

If you still further press the question of th text, in the presence of this calamity, "What your life," I tell you it is

AN APPRENTICESHIP.

We study eight or ten years and we get o profession. We work five or six years and v get our trade, and then we go forth to the wo of life. But this world is not our worksho Have you any idea that those people who pe ished on the bridge were annihilated? Oh, n They only passed into another state. This wor is to be destroyed, but do you suppose th because this world is to be destroyed all the a fairs of the universe are to stop? How ma hands and feet and eyes are necessary for t carrying out of the business of this world, an how many activities will be required for the bu ness enterprises of eternity? That woman, th Christian woman who is busy taking care of t sick in the back alley will be regnant in a rea of light and love and joy celestial. That man who this morning could hardly get to church on crutches will be a ministering spirit flying to the furthest outpost of God's dominion. We are only getting ready to work in this world. We are apprentices, and we have to serve our time out. We are students, and we have to get our diplomas. Death is graduation day. Death is commencement day.

But if in the presence of this great calamity you still farther press the question of the text, "What is your life?" I tell you it is

A CONFLICT.

Have you not found it so? Struggling, those people were, in the last moment of their life. Their whole life had been a struggle. So has yours. So has mine. There is no person in this life to whom life has been happier than to me, no one who has had more kindness than I have had bestowed upon me, no one who has had better health, no one to whom the world is brighter than this world is to me now, and yet, I have found it a conflict. Is it not so with you, my brother, my sister?

If you have never tried to curb your temper, if you have never tried to subdue your passions, if you have never tried to be better men, better women, then you know not what I mean; but if you have tried to do better, and wanted to be better, and struggled to be better, then you know that Paul was not only graphic but accurate when he described life as war with the world and war with the flesh and war with the devil. It may have been a conflict with yourselves, it may have been a conflict with poverty, it may have been a conflict with higher social position, with an unhappy family name, with the persecutions of the world, but I warrant you life has been to the most of you a hand-to-hand fight. There is only one peaceful encampment in this world, and that is the white tent, the white tent of the grave. Life a conflict—so the Bible declares it. Life a conflict—so your own experience ratifies it.

"Must I be carried to the skies
On flowery beds of ease,
While others fought to win the prize
And sailed through bloody seas?"

But if in the presence of this sorrow, this great calamity, you still further press the question of my text, "What is your life?" I answer, it is

A PROPHECY.

What you are now you will in all probability be forever, only on a larger scale. On banks of celestial light walks the consecrated Alfred Cookman. In dungeons of starless night sits John Wilkes Booth. Are all your preferences toward the bad? The probability is they will be so forever. Are your preferences toward the good? Do you want to be better? Do you long after God as an eternal portion? I tell you plainly that you are on the way to grandeurs which no summer night's dream had ever power to depict.

But in the presence of this great calamity you still further press the question of the text, "What is your life?" I answer, it is

A PREPARATION.

If we are going on a long journey we must get ready, we must have a guide-book, we must have apparel. If we are going among dangers we want to be armed. We have all started on a road which has no terminus, and once started we will never come back. Are we armed? Have we the robe? Are we ready for the future? When Death shuts the door of the sepulchre the angel of repentance never opens it. "As the tree falls so it must lie." As far as I can understand your case, my brother, your great need is to have your sins pardoned. I know of no way to do that, or have that done except one: "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin," and though you may feel yourself the worst sinner you may by the grace of God become the best saint. "Where sin abounded grace may much more abound."

But if in the presence of this calamity you press the question of my text a step further, and ask me, "What is your life?" I answer, it is

A GREAT UNCERTAINTY.

Of those people who perished on the bridge, there was not one who expected to quit life in that way. Some no doubt had said: "Well, I shall leave the world under this disease, or under that disease." Another person said, "There are so many perils in my style of business, in that way I shall come to the end of my earthly life." Not one ever expected to go in that way, to perish on the bridge, and to every man the step out of this life is a surprise.

I never knew any one to go in the way he expected. You see some one who has been an invalid for twenty-five years, and he always departs suddenly. You hear of some friend who after thirty years of illness has departed, and you say, "Why, is it possible." Our life is struck through with uncertainty. Our friends change, our associations change, our circumstances change, our health changes. All change. We know not how our children will turn out. We do not know what we ourselves may be tempted to do. Better men than you and I, naturally better, have made shipwreck for this life and the life to come. I do not like to hear a man say: "I couldn't have done this, or I couldn't have done that." Do not have any braggadocio about this life. If God should let you go you could do anything which is bad. So life is struck through with uncertainty.

But blessed be God there is a rock on which we can stand, the Rock of ages. It is no autocrat at the head of the universe.

MY FATHER IS KING.

Though the mountains may depart and the hills remove, His kindness and His love and His grace will fail us never, never. In that hope I have lived over thirty years, and though I should be very sorry to think that there is in this house any one who has been more unworthy than I have been, still I know enough of this religion to commend it to all the people. And I tell you that the grandest and the lovingest and the best friend a man ever had is Jesus Christ. I know Him. He has never betrayed me and He will never betray you.

But do not take my testimony. Take the testimony of those who have been long in the Christian service. Ask those who are in the very evening of their life when Christ betrayed them, by what sick bed, in what dark passage, in what awful crisis. Just ask them. They will tell you, "When I was sick the best physician was Christ, and when I took the last kiss from lips that never again could speak to me, and when I stood by a grave so deep it buried all, Christ was my comforter." And those persons would go on and give you testimony that their brightest anticipation of the future is the presence of Him whom having not seen they love, and in whom believing they rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory.

Oh, my friends, is life a test, make it a successful experiment; is life an apprenticeship, make it an industrious one; is life a conflict, fight the brave fight; is life a prophecy, let it foretell glorious results; is life a preparation, make sure work; is life a great uncertainty, get the divine insurance. You say, "I will do this," and "I will do that," and "I will go into the city and get great gain there, as you know not what shall be on the morrow; for what is your life? it is even a vapor that appeareth for a little time and then—vanisheth away."

that comes from that calamity says: "Be ye also ready." Your first, your second, your hundredth, your thousandth, your last necessity is a heart changed by the converting grace of God. I do not think that cowardice is a characteristic of my nature, but I tell you plainly that I would not dare to take another step in life, I would not dare to pass down the street, I would not dare to cross that river, I would not dare to live another hour did I not feel that whatever happens to my body my immortal soul shall go free. Choose God for your eternal portion. The air is full of perils. Perils flying this way, perils flying that, perils above, perils beneath, perils on all sides. Oh, you want God's protection as a canopy and marshalled around you like an armed host.

And oh, you men and women of God, take congratulation this morning that the revolution of the days and years is bringing you toward your last hour of earth and your first hour of heaven. Waking, sleeping, your heart is beating the double quick step of an immortal spirit. See you not through the fogs and mists of earth looming up the shore on which the white robed walk? and hear you not coming across the waters the sound of harps that never felt the twang of woe, and the trumpets pouring forth the victory of uncounted multitudes? See you not the trees of life and resting under them the toil-worn of earth looking down toward you, ready to shout at your coming amid the rustling of palms and the clang of towers, "Hail, hail, hail!" Sympathy for those who stay. Congratulation for those who go.

A Modern Moses is the Title Given by the Kentucky newspapers to a child found during the recent floods. It appears that a man who was rowing around in search of wreckage saw a cradle floating on the surface of the water, and on rowing up to it was surprised to find a beautiful infant, about three months old, gazing up at the sky in open-mouthed wonder. The little waif was comfortably and warmly dressed, and had not received the slightest harm. It was taken care of by the finder to await the discovery of the parents. If when this "modern Moses" grows to years of discretion he is moved by God to follow the example of the great deliverer, he will find no lack of opportunity. Wherever he may be placed he will find men groaning under the bondage of strong drink and other vices, and who need to be led under God's guidance to the land of promise (Rom. 10 : 59).

An Early Acquaintance of President Arthur died recently. In recording the death of Mrs. Betsey Sherman, at the age of eighty-two years, the St. Albans (Vt.) Messenger says that she used to teach school in Fairfield, that State, and had a distinct recollection of President Arthur's father, as he used to come, leading his little son Chester by the hand, on Sundays and preach in the school-house where she first taught school. In her last year it was very pleasant to her to remember the fact of seeing the bright and playful boy at meeting, who, in after years, became her President. Probably she would have been incredulous in those days had any one told her that the boy she knew would one day hold the highest office on earth, but she lived to see it. So it will be in the last great day, numbers of those of whom little account was taken on earth will be welcome by the great Judge, and highly placed to the surprise of those who despised them here. (James 2 : 5.)

A Solemn Scene in a Swamp was described recently at a public meeting in London by a missionary recently returned from India. Speaking of the "Noble High School" and the District Mission Schools of Masulipatam, India, he said: "I wish I could convey to you some idea of the influence which a mission-school of this character has throughout the whole district as being a centre for information. Let me tell you one story by way of illustration. Two of our pupils came to me and said, 'There is a young man in the village near this who wants to know more of the Gospel.' I asked what were the circumstances, and I found that he had received a tract in some chance manner, and was anxious to know more about that which the tract contained. He at once instinctively appealed to two pupils in our schools. The very position of having to be teachers created in them a greater interest than ever they had shown before I gave them portions of Scripture and tracts. They afterward reported that all one Sunday night they had sat up reading the Gospel, and as morning dawned they had retired to a swamp in a neighboring village where they would not be observed, and prayed to God to lead them all three into the light."

OUR BOY JACK.

A Temperance Story by Rev. Charles Courtenay.

IN TWO PARTS—PART II.

IT was the first real trouble Tom and Bridget had had since their marriage. Things had mostly gone smoothly with them until now. Oh, it was a terrible, terrible blow.

Neither did it lessen the force of the blow that they had themselves to blame for it, and that they had helped to mix the bitter cup with their own hands.

At first they did not realize their own guilt, and thought it hard that they should be called upon to bear such a heavy burden. But a little thought on the subject, a little tracing of the ugly torrent to its source, convinced them that they had only too much to do with it.

Bridget was the first to discover the fact.

"D'ye think, Tom," she asked, "we've trained him wrong?"

Tom answered with a heavy sigh, fetched up from deeper depths than ever sigh of his had come before.

"Lass, it's just wat I'm thinkin', we've been and made a rare mess of it."

"If we could only train him over again!" said Tom wistfully.

"Aye, if we only could!" replied Bridget.

Poor things! Their hearts were sadly torn and weary, the world had become so dark to them. There was scarcely a more miserable couple on earth.

"I wish we'd got somebody to give us a helping hand," said Bridget after a long and busy silence. "I'd like to do something, if I only knew what."

Tom suggested asking their neighbor, who seemed a man to be depended on. "Besides," as he remarked, "he's the father of a family as have turned out well, and all boys too."

The next evening Tom and Bridget found themselves in their neighbor's house. Bridget was spokeswoman, and told her story with not a few tears, ending up with—

"Please help us. We don't know what to do, we're that upset." And Tom nodded his head in confirmation of his wife's request.

"Well, neighbors," said Robert Jackson, for that was his name, "your duty's plain, at least I think so, and as you've come for a bit of advice, I can only tell you what I thinks straight out. I don't want to harry up your feelin's, but 'tis plain as a pikestaff that if father and mother had been a little better eddicated in the temperance line that lad of yours would have had a better chance. He's never had a fair chance, hasn't that chap of yours. Now, look here, you jest turn Teetotaler, both of ye, and be quick about it. He'll have plenty o' temptation out o' doors without having it at home too."

At this piece of plain speaking Tom and Bridget looked at each other with an exceedingly surprised expression on their countenances. Such advice they had never dreamed of. They certainly did not relish it.

"What d'ye mean to say you loves yer beer more than yer boy?" said their neighbor in a tone which said even more than his words.

There was evidently a struggle going on, for Bridget fidgetted with her toe, and Tom twirled his hat with great energy. At length Bridget spoke out, and declared her intention to have done with the beer for her boy's sake, while Tom, who was always not a little swayed by his wife's example, became suddenly and emphatically converted to her new way of thinking, and said:

"I'd give my right arm to save that boy o' mine. And I'll give up beer, every drop of it."

"That's right," said his neighbor, "depend upon it. You've done what's right, and if you ever regret it, why I'll take to drinking myself. I can't put it stronger than that, can I?"

That very night they began their Temperance course, and signed the pledge in their neighbors' kitchen.

Bridget and Tom Searle never knew how little respect Jack had for their authority until they tried to make him a Teetotaler. The young man had been so petted and fondled, and his wishes so respected, that he was master.

"Be a Teetotaler! Not I. I'd be hung first," was his blunt reply.

"But we are, dear Jack; we're never going to touch it no more."

"More fools you!" was the rejoinder.

They had made their bed and were lying on it. They had pickled the rod for their own shoulders.

"It's my opinion," said their Teetotal neighbor in his own blunt way, "that you've shut the door after the steed 's stolen. I don't want to go and throw it into your teeth, but if you'd only set him your Teetotal lesson afore, rather than arter, things would have been a goodish bit different now. Howsoever we'll all have a try. A good pull altogether will do no harm any ways.

"You know," he continued, "I've got great faith in prayer. I'm what my mates call a religious man; and if that boy o'yourn is to be laid hold of, the Lord can do it better nor we."

"You're right, neighbor," said Tom; "you've hit the right nail on the head there, neighbor."

"Well now, we'll have a right good prayer jest here, on this very spot."

Down on their knees, on the clean kitchen floor, they all went, and very simply and earnestly the whole trouble was poured into the loving Father's ear.

"And now," said Robert Jackson, "we'll all put our shoulder to the wheel and push. Praying without working ain't right nohow. The Lord'll help those who help themselves, I find."

The plan the neighbor had proposed was that his lads should somehow gain Jack's confidence, and so by degrees get an influence over him, and by God's blessing land him safe and sound on the side of temperance.

Well, for many months not a single step did they seem to gain. A more wilful, obstinate young customer never walked in shoe leather. Indeed, so difficult a patient did he prove that nearly everybody was in despair about him.

But the longest lane has its turning, and even Jack Searle was conquered in time, though not quite in the way they expected.

It happened thus. His mother was one day, with but little warning, struck down with illness. It seemed even to the doctor a sickness unto death, and he hinted as much to the husband and the son. Still, there was a measure of hope.

"If only her mind could be easier I don't say that she wouldn't recover," the doctor said. "But low spirits will destroy every particle of chance."

And now how father and son tried to look cheerful and to speak hopefully; never men tried harder. All the force of their love was up in arms, for even Jack's heart at the bottom was a very tender one toward his mother.

But it seemed of no avail. She kept steadily sinking, in spite of all their efforts. She was going fast, they felt sure. What would not Jack give to undo his bad past! He had been only too bad a son. Had he treated her as a son should? Had he shielded her from pain and sorrow? Had he made any returns for her love? Alas! conscience told him only too plainly that he had been a cruel, selfish, wayward son.

"Mother, mother," he said, "forgive me. Say you forgive me before you die."

And she smiled sweetly on him, kissed him, and called him her darling boy.

Poor Jack could not stand it. He hurried from the room, and sitting down by the kitchen fire gave himself up to uncontrollable grief. Presently he felt a hand upon his shoulder. Looking up, he saw their neighbor, who said—

"Jack, lad, have ye told her that you're going to give up the drink and sign the pledge?"

In a moment Jack was in his mother's room to tell her that he was going to break with the drink altogether, and that he would go into their neighbor's and sign the pledge.

Oh, you should have seen the joy that lit up her face. You should have heard the fervent "Thank God!" which issued from her pale lips.

And all that day she was thanking God who had so mercifully heard her prayers.

Later on the doctor came, and as soon as he saw his patient he said,

"Why, what's happened? Something has happened. What is it?"

The patient herself answered his question—

"My boy's turned Teetotal."

"Yes," said the doctor, "and I hope has saved his mother's life. You've taken a decided turn for the better."

The doctor was right. She did begin to mend from that very day, and before long was herself again.

It will require but a short chapter to tell the rest of the story about "our boy Jack."

From that time he cut the acquaintance of strong drink for good. And never to the very end of his life would he touch it. He gave his heart to the Lord too, and became an earnest Christian. Yes, and Jack began to work at his old trade in good earnest, never again giving his master cause for complaint. Indeed, before long, he became the best workman in the shop. He had become a man to be depended upon.

OLD TESTAMENT LIGHT ON NEW TESTAMENT PROPHECY.

By Rev. Richard Chester.

The Opening of the Seals — What is the Interpretation?—Past Historical Events not of Sufficient Fulfilment—The "Four Horns" and the "Four Carpenters" of Zechariah—Correspondence of Zechariah with Revelation—Three Seals not Referred to—The Man-Child Symbolized in Zechariah—Comparison with Revelation—The Futurist System of Interpretation.

THERE is no portion of the Apocalypse upon our right apprehension and interpretation of which that of the entire book must depend more than upon in chapter 6. Have these seals been already opened? Did the opening of these seals actually and altogether consist in a symbolical representation being thereby vouchsafed to the Apostle John of events which the visions made in each seal to pass before his eyes were intended to symbolize, and which, having long since taken place, are now matters of history? If so, then the historical mode of interpreting the Apocalypse as the true and consistent one, has, so far firm ground upon which to stand.

Or is the opening of the seven seals, as prefigured in vision to John, and by him recorded and handed down to us, a yet altogether future event? Does it thus set before us a wonderfully solemn and glorious scene, which shall yet be witnessed in all its stupendous reality, in heaven, by the raptured saints as represented by the twenty-four elders of chapter 5, and also by the innumerable company of angels, when He who has redeemed this earth from the destroying power of the evil one, shall at length come forth to take possession of His ransomed inheritance, and, previous to so doing, shall establish His right to do so, by receiving from His Father's hand the title-deeds of that inheritance and then publicly opening them, seal after seal in the presence of the vast assemblage—the opening of each seal being accompanied by a corresponding judgment, war, famine, pestilence, etc., inflicted upon and "destroying them that destroy the earth." See Jeremiah chapter 32. If so, the futurist mode of interpretation, as a true, if not the only true one, cannot well be called in question.

WHAT IS THE INTERPRETATION?

As a help toward decision upon these important points, it cannot be amiss to turn back to Old Testament prophecy, and see if we may not get some amount of light and guidance therefrom. And, first, that the opening of the seal upon the seven-sealed roll, does not merely signify a divulgence to the Apostle John, and through him to us, as historical interpreter usually assume, of the prophetic contents of the

and a

Book of Revelation, becomes, as it seems to me, most manifest when we look at the prophetic Book of Daniel, which we find he was expressly commanded "to seal, even to the time of the end." (Daniel 12 : 4-9.) Yet the contents of the Book of Daniel are nevertheless, and have ever been, just as widely divulged and promulgated as are those of Revelation.

The sealed prophecy in the one instance and the prophecy whose seals have been broken in the other instance have been equally circulated and made known, and their respective contents have been long, and are at this present moment equally the subjects of study, and commentary, and interpretation, throughout the length and breadth of professing Christendom. Surely there can be no clearer proof than this, that some other signification than that of the revealing and opening out of the prophetic contents of the Book of Revelation must be sought for as a correct and full interpretation of the opening of the seven seals.

PAST HISTORICAL EVENTS.

But it further seems to me that conclusive evidence that the occurrences symbolically seen by the Apostle John to take place at the successive opening of these seals have not received at all events their exhaustive fulfilment in any of the past historical events adduced as so fulfilling them by our exclusively historical interpreters, but that they are yet finally to be fulfilled in the wars, famines, pestilences, and other judgments which they so evidently seem to portend, and which our blessed Lord has so plainly foretold as the precursors of His Advent, may be gathered by a comparison of Rev. 6 with Zechariah chapter 1 : 7-21, and chapter 6 : 1-7.

In the former of these two passages we read, verse 8, of "horses, red, speckled," or, as rendered in the margin, "bay" and "white," a vision so far very closely resembling that of the opening of the first four seals of Rev. 6 : 1-8. From the explanation of this vision, given by the angel, Zech. 1 : 9-21, we learn that these horses represent judgments, or rather the spiritual agencies employed for the infliction of judgments sent by the Lord "to walk to and fro throughout the earth," a further feature of striking similitude between this vision and that of the opening of the seals in Rev. 6 : 1-8, while verses 16, 17 connect these judgments with the "return of the mercies of the Lord to Jerusalem," and the rebuilding of its temple.

THE "FOUR HORNS," AND "FOUR CARPENTERS."

In verses 18-21 we find a further vision of "four horns" and "four carpenters," with the angel's explanation that these four horns represent the four kingdoms or powers of the Gentiles "which have scattered Judah," and that these four carpenters represent the judgments by which these four powers are to be utterly overcome and destroyed. So much for the vision of Zech. 1. In chapter 6 we read of another vision of four chariots, the first with red horses, the second with black, the third with white, and the fourth with grisled and bay horses. To the query "what are these?" verse 4, we read the angel's answer that they are "the four spirits" (or "winds," margin) "of the heavens, which go forth from standing before the Lord of all the earth," while in verse 7 we read the charge, precisely similar to that of chapter 1, verse 10, "to walk to and fro through the earth," given to some of these. Then, in verse 8, we read that those of the chariots and horses who have gone to "the north country" have "quieted the Lord's Spirit," that is (as is evident from a comparison of the passage with Ezekiel 16 : 41, 42) have appeased His righteous indignation by the judgments which they have inflicted. Finally, we learn from verses 10-15 of the same chapter, that all this infliction of judgment through the instrumentality of these four spirits is (as in the former instance) in immediate connection with, and in immediate precedence of, blessing to the Jewish people and to Jerusalem, as also of the rebuilding of the temple and of the Advent and the kingdom of the Lord Jesus Christ.

CORRESPONDENCE OF THE VISIONS.

Now that these two visions of Zech., chapter 1 : 7-21, and the further vision of chapter 6, all refer to judgments yet to be poured out upon this earth; and to be so poured out as precursors of blessing to Israel, and of the coming of the kingdom of the Lord, at whose Advent these blessings are to be bestowed, can scarcely be questioned by any intelligent and unprejudiced student of God's sure prophetic Word. The four horns of Zech. 1 : 18-21 representing, as we are expressly told, the four Gentile powers, which have scattered Judah, are unquestionably identical with the four Gentile empires of Daniel, the Babylonian, Medo-Persian, Grecian, and Roman, by which the scattering of the once supreme power of the Jewish nation has been, as we all know, effected and maintained.

The "four carpenters"—evidently corresponding with the judgment horses and chariots of chapters 1 : 7-21 and 6 : 1-7, no less manifestly represent the agencies by which these empires, in their then existing representatives, shall be wasted and overthrown, to make way for the return of the kingdom to Judah and Jerusalem, and of the "one Lord who shall be king over all the earth."

The further correspondence of these visions with the opening of the first four seals in Rev. 6 : 1-8, is surely indicated with sufficient clearness by the significant colors of the horses, which are common to them all, white-red-pale, or grisled and black. While the language of Rev. 6 descriptive of the riders of these horses would seem to leave no room for doubt as to the nature of the judgments—namely, those of war, famine, pestilence, and subsequently earthquakes, great signs and fearful sights from heaven. (Rev. 6 : 12-14.) And the fact that the Lord Himself, Matt. 24 : 6-8, predicts these very judgments, and in the exact order in which we find them thus symbolized in Zechariah and Revelation, as the near precursors of His Advent, would seem to preclude the possibility of any doubt or controversy upon the subject.

THE THREE REMAINING SEALS.

It may be objected, indeed, that we only so far account for four out of the seven seals of the Book of Revelation as having corresponding symbols in these visions of Zechariah, and that there being nothing in these visions to correspond with the last three seals is a sufficient reason for calling in question the existence of any real parallelism between the two prophecies. To this, however, it may be replied that it is only the first four of the seven seals of Revelation (with the exception of the sixth, which we shall notice presently) that can, properly speaking, be regarded as judgment seals, and with which accordingly the four horses and four carpenters of Zechariah do unquestionably correspond.

The opening of the fifth seal is accompanied only by the cry of the souls of the martyrs from under the altar for the infliction of a judgment which they are told must for a little season be delayed. The opening of the seventh seal has no distinctive feature immediately connected with it, but that of "silence in heaven for the space of half an hour," while the judgments pertaining to the opening of the sixth seal are manifestly those of a period of "the day of the Lord," altogether further on, and nearer to its climax than are those of the wars, famines, and pestilences of the first four seals which are specified by our blessed Lord as being but "the beginnings of sorrows." Any representation of such judgments would therefore have been out of time and place in the visions and symbols of Zech. 1 and 6.

FURTHER ACCORDANCE.

How the sequel of the Book of Zechariah, in its predictions of the restoration and conversion of the Jewish people—the trials through which they shall have to pass—the last siege and the deliverance of Jerusalem—the Advent of the Lord with all His saints in judgment to the Mount of Olives, and the consequent glorious Millennium—how all this accords with the teaching of the Book of Revelation throughout, cannot but be evident to every unprejudiced student of prophecy who is at all in the habit of "comparing spiritual things with spiritual."

I should like, ere concluding, to notice the remarkable agreement between Zechariah chapter 2 and Revelation chapter 11, in the measuring of Jerusalem which is common to both. Also, and especially, the correspondence, not so patent, but, I feel persuaded, not less real, between Zech. chapter 3 and Rev. chapter 12. In the former chapter, Joshua the High Priest—the representative of the believing portion of the Jewish people is shown in vision to the prophet, verse 1, "standing before the angel of the Lord," whom verse 2 indicates as the Lord Himself. Satan is further shown "standing at his right hand to resist him"—a position from which he is repelled by the angel. Joshua is then accepted before the Lord. His "filthy garments," and the "iniquity" of which they were the fitting emblem and expression, are made "to pass from him." He is clothed with "change of raiment." A "fair mitre" is set upon his head, and "charge" is given unto him, "to judge the Lord's house and to keep His courts."

THE "MAN-CHILD."

He is further told, verse 8, that he and "his fellows who sit before him are men wondered at" (compare Isaiah 8 : 18, Hebrews 2 : 13) and that the not yet accomplished removal of the iniquity of the land of Israel will be effected "in one day." Again when we turn to chapter 6 : 10-14, we find that "crowns" are to be set upon the heads of Joshua and his fellows, and that he is to "sit and rule upon his throne, and he shall be a priest upon his throne." We find in Revelation 12 "a Man-child caught up to God and to His throne"—corresponding so far with Joshua as here represented standing before the angel of the Lord. We find there Satan, "the accuser of the brethren," in deadly hostility to this Man-child, but overcome and cast down from heaven to earth as the result of this hostility. We find here Satan in like manner standing before the Lord at Joshua's right hand to resist him; but silenced and overcome as in Revelation 12.

Now if the Man-child of Rev. 12 is to be regarded as solely representing the Lord Jesus Christ ascended into the heavens, as some interpreters affirm; or as representing the visible Christian Church exalted into political power, as taught by others, it were not easy to establish any parallelism, or any correspondence, whatsoever between Zech. 3 and Rev. 12. But if the Man-child represents, as is the belief of many students of prophecy, the entire body of "the dead in Christ" raised, and the living in Christ who shall be changed, and both together caught up to meet Him in the air—or if, as I have suggested in the article above referred to—he is to be rather regarded as a portion of the Jewish people—of "the remnant according to the election of grace" incorporated by conversion to Christ into the Church of this dispensation—and thus "brought forth"—"born again," and then, "caught up to God and to His throne," in the rapture of the risen and living saints of 1 Thess. 4—then, in either of these cases, I submit that this vision of Zechariah 3 corresponds.

We have in it the position consequent upon the rapture, "standing before the Lord." We have also the resistance and defeat of Satan. We have further, in fuller confirmation of this view, the acceptance, the change of raiment, the crowning, and the assignment of authority both kingly and priestly (compare Rev. 5 : 10, "Thou hast made us unto our God kings and priests")—all constituting features of resemblance between the two visions apparently far too marked and striking to be accounted for by mere coincidence, or to lead to any conclusion short of identity between them. If so, the prophecies of Zechariah may surely be regarded and studied as shedding no small amount of light upon those of St. John, and as affording no trivial confirmation of the correctness of their futurist interpretation.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Shocking Calamity Which Occurred on Decoration Day on the Brooklyn Bridge, has sent a thrill of horror through both cities. The day being a legal holiday, a crowd, variously estimated at from fifteen to twenty thousand people passed the gates. They moved easily in two streams, each taking the right hand side of the roadway, so that there was no difficulty in the column walking from New York passing the one from Brooklyn. There was, however, a little pressure at the points where the roadway narrows to allow the cables to pass through the flooring; but no apprehension was felt of any disaster resulting. About four o'clock, when the people were returning from the cemeteries, there was a great crowd on the steps which lead from the anchorage on the New York side to the floor of the bridge itself. These steps are fourteen in number; they are in two flights, and their aggregate height is nine feet. Here the crowd mingled, and those ascending were pushed by the people descending. In the confusion a woman fell down the steps with a scream, and another woman at the top of the steps, who saw her fall, also screamed. Then a policeman mounted the low wall and called to the people to keep back. A panic at once ensued. People thought the bridge was falling, and rushed forward with headlong speed. The woman who had fallen raised herself on her hands, but the crowd rushed down the steps upon her, pushing, fighting, struggling like maniacs. She fell forward again, and people who did not see the steps, or who were forced down them by the irresistible pressure in the rear, stumbled over her and fell, until there were more than forty prostrate bodies at the foot of the steps, and the stream of people continued its mad career trampling on the fallen. At last two workmen knocked away the barrier between the foot road and the rail-track, and placed planks on which the throng could pass to the roadway for wagons, and thus the pressure was relieved. Then the work of raising the fallen commenced. Forty persons, injured more or less seriously, were lifted up and placed on passing wagons and carried to the hospitals. Twelve dead bodies trampled almost beyond recognition were taken from the pile of throbbing flesh and blood and removed to the police station. Then the bridge presented a ghastly spectacle. The flooring and the stone work were spattered with blood, and little pools of it lay here and there testifying to the awful character of the struggle. It looked like a battle-field on which the fallen had been the weak and helpless. The dead were four men and a boy of thirteen, six women and a girl about fifteen years old. The latest reports of the injured encourage the hope that they will all recover.

The Responsibility for the Appalling Disaster will have to be settled by the coroner's jury, but the statements of survivors of the calamity all prove that there was negligence on the part of those responsible for the management. When the crushing commenced there was no one present to check it, and crowds were still passing in at both entrances to the bridge at the rate of a hundred a minute, and were still allowed to pass and increase the danger even after the toll-takers were informed of what was occurring. Then a gang of pickpockets were at work, and purposely increased the jam in order to put in their work. A group of stupid young men formed themselves into a wedge-like column, and proclaiming their ability to "go through anything," fought and pushed, reckless of the harm they did. It would be a good thing if those fellows, who think they are able to go through anything, could be found now and given an opportunity to exercise their talents in the penitentiary. These facts show that had a few experienced policemen been placed on the bridge there would have been no lives lost; but the trustees had no police worthy of the name there.

A Raging Flood Passed through Council Bluffs, Iowa, on Friday night, June 1st. It commenced with a heavy rain storm of uncommon violence. Indian Creek, which runs through the centre of the city, rose rapidly and overflowed the streets. A block away from the banks it was waist deep, and it rose so suddenly that it was with difficulty passengers escaped with their lives. Cries for help could be heard in every direction, but the swiftness of the current rendered assistance impossible. Many business men found it impossible to reach their homes, and a number narrowly escaped death from drowning while endeavoring to do so. A press telegram from the city says: "All the bridges as far down as Eighth Street are gone, including two stone bridges, which alone cost nearly $20,000. Hundreds of families living adjacent to the creek were driven from their homes, and many houses were more or less damaged. In many cases the furniture in the houses is a total loss. A number of houses were dashed to pieces as they floated off. One heavy iron bridge, with a fifty-foot span, was carried bodily a distance of more than two blocks, and its heavy iron girders and stringers were bent and warped as if they had been mere wire ropes." The Mayor has received offers of asistance from other cities, but thinks that the liberal contributions of the citizens will suffice to take care of the sufferers.

An Order Issued last Week by Postmaster-General Gresham will, it is hoped, lead to a much-needed reform in the post-offices throughout the Union. It has probably been suggested by the recent disclosures of the negligence of postmasters appointed in Virginia through the influence of Senator Mahone, some of whom have done no duty at all, but left their offices to be managed by incompetent clerks. The following is the order which, if obeyed, will remedy the abuse in Virginia and elsewhere: "Postmasters at first and second class offices will hereafter give their personal attention to the business of their offices and not absent themselves therefrom without authority granted upon written application to this Department. A violation of this order will be deemed sufficient cause for removal."

Colonel Ingersoll's Appeal to the Sympathy of the Star Route jury received a crushing rejoinder last week from Mr. Merrick at the opening of his speech for the government. He said, Colonel Ingersoll's appeals to them not to ruin the defendants were temptations held out to beckon on to infamy and disgrace. The scales of justice must contain nothing but the cold and naked facts, and the rules of law as given by the court. In that way only could the jury discharge with honor and satisfaction to their consciences the duty imposed upon them by the law of the land. It was true that there was no spectacle more solemn than the human being wrecked, or the blackened home, but what wrecked the man and blackened the home? Not the verdict of the jury, but the commission of the crime. By a verdict speaking their sympathies and not their judgment, the jury would commit a crime, and give to their consciences a ceaseless and eternal reproach. There have been many cases tried lately, notably those of homicide, in which the juries appear to have lost sight of this view of their duty.

The Question of Free-Trade as the Chief Po-litical issue in the next campaign was a short time ago regarded as inevitable. It was so treated by newspaper editors in all the great cities and in both the great parties. It is remarkable that the recent conventions in Kentucky should have effectually disposed of the issue. There is a general unanimity witnessed since the conventions in considering the subject indefinitely postponed. If the political prophets are right in their recent predictions the election will be contested, not on principles nor on any proposed change of financial policy, but on the merits of the respective parties.

Timely Words were Uttered in the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church (North) at Saratoga, N. Y., last week, on the subject of biblical criticism. Dr. Crosby, speaking for the Committee on the Higher Criticism, said: "The denial of the authenticity or truthfulness of the Holy Scriptures is a denial of their inspiration, and any teaching that suggests such denial should be not only carefully avoided but studiously repelled. The Assembly would not discourage the full use of all light in critical study, nor does it assume that any erroneous teaching is welcomed or offered within the bounds of the church, but it would warn all pastors and teachers of the danger to young and inexperienced minds in the free use of crude theories and unproved speculations on the part of religious instructors, and would remind them of the paramount importance of sustaining in positive doctrine the authenticity, integrity, truthfulness and inspiration of the Holy Scriptures against the unsanctified learning by which an unbelieving world, through nominally Christian channels, assaults the church of God."

Seventeen Dollars have been Received at the Office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in aid of the fund for sending the paper to the colored ministers of the South. It was sent in two separate sums of fifteen and two dollars, and seventeen ministers' names have accordingly been added to the mailing list, and a statement of the names forwarded to the subscribers. Our thanks are due to our friends in all parts of the country for their exertions in making the paper known in their localities. They will be pleased to learn that the circulation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has largely increased since the commencement of the year, and its list is now higher than at any time since it was established. There are some towns, however, in which only one or two copies are taken; if our subscribers there would show the paper to their friends they might be the means of extending the circulation still more widely. Letters reach us almost every day informing us of conversions which have resulted from the blessing of God on the reading of the paper, and expressing the gratitude of the writers that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was placed in their hands.

The Remarkable Sequel to a Dream is Related in the Boston Globe. It appears that a relative of the late Marshall Jewell residing in Boston had a dream recently, in which she distinctly saw an undertaker drive up to her residence with a hearse. He was a peculiar looking man. His queerly shaped nose, which looked as if it had been broken and was twisted to one side, gave his countenance an expression which would have made identification easy and certain. He came directly toward her, and, as he said, "Are you all ready?" she suddenly awoke. The dream seemed a peculiar one, but did not attract very much attention in the household, until a few days or a week later, it was repeated with exactly the same characteristics, down to the "Are you all ready?" and the awakening. Some little time afterward the young lady was visiting in Cincinnati and went to an apartment hotel to call upon a friend. She stepped into the elevator with others, and was startled to hear "Are you ready?" from the man in charge. She was still more startled on looking around and beholding the exact picture of the man of the dream, even to the misshapen nose. It made such an impression upon her mind that she requested to be let out of the elevator at the first landing. She stepped out, and the other occupants went out at the next landing, and the man remained. The elevator machinery gave out; suddenly the car went up, and then down, and the man was instantly killed. The strange coincidence it is not easy to explain, but the question heard in the dream and in the elevator was one that it would be well for every man to ask himself. The case of those who neglect its consideration will be deplorable indeed (Luke 12 : 40).

The Burial of a Dog in a Family Lot at Greenwood Cemetery attracted much notice recently, owing to the costliness of the coffin used and the deep grief of the two ladies who followed as mourners. The circumstances are explained by a correspondent of the New York Tribune. He states that during life the two ladies displayed warm affection for the dog, which was a noble Newfoundland, evidently aged and infirm. For some years past they have been seen passing daily through Ninth Street to Prospect Park with the animal, which usually walked slowly and painfully between them. They often stopped for the dog to rest, only moving when he evinced his desire to proceed. They were permitted to bathe him in the Park lakes. Inquiry revealed that several years ago, the ladies, mother and daughter, were wrecked on the Jersey coast. While being transferred with the dog from the ship to the beach the boat was capsized. The dog rescued the daughter and, returning through the surf, aided the Life Saving crew in bringing the half-drowned mother ashore. That fact explains the devotion of the two grateful ladies to the animal in old age and after death. Every one who hears of the rescue sympathizes with them in an affection they might otherwise despise. When men, however, abandon the pursuit of wealth and honor to serve Jesus, society wonders, and often calls it fanaticism; but those who realize that the Saviour died to save their souls know that no devotion is too great to express their gratitude and love to Him (Rom. 12 : 1).

Revenge has been Taken on a Usurer in Georgia for his extortions. About two weeks ago in Upson County, the house of a money-lender was entered by twelve disguised men. In the presence of his wife they stripped the usurer and beat him unmercifully with hickory switches until he fell from sheer exhaustion. They broke up everything in the house. The lady, who was in a delicate condition, is lying at the point of death, and her husband is in a precarious condition. The attack was made in revenge for the hard terms the money-lender made in loaning money and in forcing collections. The marauders also carried off a large sum of money. Usurers are notorious for the high rates they charge borrowers, and for the pitiless way in which they compel payment; but that fact was doubtless known to the men when they made their bargain, and they received the loan on those conditions. Their violence was therefore unreasonable and inexcusable. It will be found at the last that, like the usurer, Satan is a hard master, and those who have enjoyed the pleasures implied by the phrase "sowing wild oats" will discover that a heavy penalty has to be paid, far worse than that which exasperated the Georgian debtors (Prov. 5 : 11-13).

Fifty Thousand Dollars were Found by a Boy in a hotel yard in Philadelphia recently. The boy was looking for a lost baseball in the yard of the Commercial Hotel on Saturday, May 26th, when he found a package of bonds, deeds, cheques and notes amounting to $50,000 wrapped up in a newspaper. The police after considerable inquiry discovered that the property belonged to one John Stockwell, and was stolen from the office at No. 15 South Seventh Street several years ago. The thief took $70 in money also, but none of the paper was negotiable, and he must therefore have thrown it away to avoid detection. The boy received the reward of $30 which was offered at the time of the robbery, with the observation that it was a better business than finding baseballs. It may be hoped that the boy will learn that there is a better business still. If he will search he may find a treasure which also is not negotiable, but which is beyond all price (Prov. 3 : 13-18).

"Almost to Heaven," is the Translation of the Indian name which it is proposed to give Washington Territory upon her admission to the Union as a State. Washington is a name so honored among us that nearly every State and Territory has a county of Washington and also a town called Washington. Should Idaho and Washington be admitted as States, with North Idaho as an adjunct of her Western sister, and with names unchanged, we would have the distressing anomalies of a Washington County in Idaho and an Idaho County in Washington, besides a town of Washington in Idaho County, State of Washington. It is therefore suggested, to avoid confusion, that Washington Territory should be called Tahoma, a name signifying "almost to heaven," which the Indians gave to Mount Ranier on account of its great height, said to be 14,000 feet above the level of the sea. It may be hoped that if the name Tahoma should be given to the Territory it may not be a still greater anomaly than the one avoided. There are many places whose natural beauty and whose Christian privileges might suggest the name, but for which the name would be a misnomer by reason of the wickedness of the inhabitants (Matt. 11 : 23).

The Daughter of a Prussian Statesman Died by her own hand in a hotel on the Bowery, New York, on May 28th. She was utterly poor and friendless, and in her despair she extinguished the gas in her bedroom, and having closed every crevice in the room she turned on the gas again without lighting it, and deliberately lay down to die by suffocation. The Rev. J. W. Geyer, Pastor of the Houston Street Reformed Dutch Church, who had befriended the woman and knew something of her history, said she was the daughter of von Mauschwitz, once a Minister at the Prussian Court. She was born November 25th, 1843, and on the day of her christening the Princess Wilhelmine was godmother and Secretary Adamie, one of the Court attachés, was godfather. She studied at the Royal Medical College of Saxony, and was awarded, in 1880, a diploma as nurse and midwife. The year after she came to this country to practise her profession. She was unfortunate from the beginning, and, finding only occasional employment, was reduced to the verge of starvation. Among her effects was a copy of the New Testament, with the fifth chapter of Second Corinthians marked in red pencilings and a turned-down page. The poor woman was probably crazed by disappointment and anxiety before she committed her awful crime. If she had studied the next chapter to the one she marked, she would have found that a rank far above her own was offered her with unlimited privileges (2 Cor. 6 : 18).

SHUTTING, SEALING, AND COVERING.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city, to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the most Holy."—DANIEL 9 : 24.

THE Lord God appointed a set time for the coming of His Son into the world; nothing was left to chance. Infinite wisdom dictated the hour at which the Messiah should be born, and the moment at which He should be cut off. His advent and His work are the highest point of the purpose of God, the hinge of history, the centre of Providence, the crowning of the edifice of grace, and therefore peculiar care watched over every detail. The studious mind will be delighted to search out the reasons why the Messiah came not before, and why He did not tarry till yet later ages. Prophecies declared the date; but long before infallible wisdom had settled it for profoundest reasons. It was well that the Redeemer came; it was well that He came in what Scripture calls the fulness of time, even in these last days.

Note, again, that the Lord told His people somewhat darkly, but still with a fair measure of clearness, when the Christ would come. Thus He cheered them when the heavy clouds of woe hung over their path. This prophecy shone like a star in the midst of the sorrows of Israel; so bright was it that at the period when Christ came there was a general expectation of Him. Holy men and women, diligent in the study of the Scriptures, were waiting for Him; Simeon was waiting for the consolation of Israel, and Anna looked for redemption in Jerusalem with others of like mind. Not only the Jews, but the Samaritans expected Him, for the woman at the well exclaimed, "I know that Messias cometh, which is called Christ!"

Even in heathen lands there was a remarkable cessation from stir and battle; an unusual peace reigned over all the nations, and the hush of expectation ruled the hour—

"No war, or battle's sound,
Was heard the world around:
The idle spear and shield were high uphung;
The hookèd chariot stood
Unstained with hostile blood;
The trumpet spake not to to the armèd throng;
And kings sat still with awful eye,
As if they surely knew their sovran Lord was by."

Men were looking out for the coming One; for the corn of earth was ripe for the reaper. Men were on the tiptoe of expectation, and wondered when the promised Prince would arrive. Alas, they knew Him not when He appeared. After this fashion are things at the present moment with regard to

THE SECOND ADVENT

of our Lord Jesus Christ. "Of that day and of that hour knoweth no man;" but it is known unto God, and fixed in the roll of His eternal purposes. He has given us suggestive hints as to that glorious appearing; and He has plainly taught us to be looking for and hastening unto the day of the Lord. Among His last words are these, "Surely I come quickly;" these are words of consolation as well as of warning. He bids us watch constantly for the coming of the Lord, that it overtake us not as a thief in the night; and He assures us that He will descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God; wherefore comfort one another with the glad tidings, and whenever your hearts sicken because of abounding sin, hear ye with the ear of faith the voice of promise: "Behold, the Bridegroom cometh."

The first advent of our Lord is spoken of in our text as ordained to be ere the seventy weeks were finished, and the city should be destroyed; and so it was even as the prophet had spoken. I shall not occupy your time by attempting to fix the beginning and the end of the period intended by the seventy weeks, and the seven weeks and three-score and two weeks. That is a deep study, requiring much research and learning, and I conceive that the discussion of such a subject would be of no great practical use to us this Sabbath morning. You will be better nourished upon the Lord Himself than upon times and seasons. Suffice it to believe that Jesus Christ our Lord, the Messiah, came exactly as it was prophesied, and remained on earth as it was foretold He should do; in the middle of the predestined week He was cut off, when He had completed three years and a half of saving ministry, and within another period of like length the Gospel was preached throughout all nations, and Messiah's peculiar relation to Israel was cut off. At another time it may afford you profitable contemplation if you consider the four hundred and ninety years from the decree of the king for rebuilding to the overthrow of Jerusalem.

We will at this present hour survey the work of the Messiah—that is His Hebrew name, or of Christ, which is the Greek interpretation thereof. Let us survey the work of the Anointed. Secondly, let us inquire as to our participation in it; and then, thirdly, let us contemplate the consequences which follow upon our being sharers in it, or upon our not being participants in it. Oh, for a measure of the anointing, that we may fitly meditate upon our great theme. Come, Holy Spirit, and rest upon us.

I. First, let us survey the MESSIAH'S WORK.

According to my text it divides itself into two grand works, which two works subdivide themselves in each case into three particulars.

The first work of our Lord Jesus Christ is the overthrow of evil, and it is thus described: "To finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity." But our Lord's labor is not all spent upon down-pulling work; He comes to build up, and His second work is the setting up of righteousness in the world, described again by three sentences: "To bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the Most Holy."

The first work of the Messiah is the overthrow of evil. This overthrow of evil is described by three words. If I were to give you a literal translation from the Hebrew I might read the passage thus: "To shut up the transgression, to seal up sin, and to cover up iniquity." According to learned men, those are the words which are here used, and the three put together are a singularly complete description of the putting away of sin. First, it is shut up; it is, as it were, taken prisoner, and confined in a cell; the door is fastened, and it is held in durance; it is out of sight; held to a narrow range; unable to exercise the power it once possessed.

But it is not enough to shut up the vanquished tyrant, unless he be shut up forever; and therefore, lest there should be any possibility of his breaking loose again, the next sentence is, "To seal up." The uses of the seal are many, but here it is employed for certainty of custody. Just as when Daniel was thrown into the lions' den the king sealed the stone with his own signet and with the signet of his lords; or, better still, as when our divine Master was laid in the grave, they rolled the stone to the mouth of the sepulchre, and His enemies set a seal and a watch, lest His body should be stolen by His disciples. Thus is sin placed doubly out of sight; it is shut up and sealed up, as a document put into a case and then sealed down. "Finished" and "made an end of" are the two words used in our authorized version, and they give the essence of the meaning.

Yet, as if this might not suffice, the next term in the Hebrew is to cover up; for the word to make reconciliation or expiation is usually in the Hebrew to cover up. "Blessed is the man whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered." Christ has come to cover sin, to atone for it, and so to hide it. His glorious merits and substitutionary sufferings and death put away sin so completely that God Himself beholds it no more. He has blotted it out, cast it into the sea, and removed it from us as far as the east is from the west. The two former sentences speak of finishing transgression and making an end of sin, and these expressions are full and complete, while this third one explains the means by which the work is done, namely, by an expiation which covers up every trace of sin. The three words might be put into one word by saying Christ has made of every kind.

Observe, dear friends, that the terms for sin are left in an absolute form. It is said, "to finish transgression," "to make an end of sins," "to make reconciliation for iniquity." Whose transgression is this? Whose sins are these? Whose iniquity is it? It is not said. The mass of evil is left unlabelled, that any penitent sinner may look to the Messiah and find in Him the remover of sin. What transgression is finished? Transgression of every kind. But what sins are made an end of? Sins of every sort—against law and against Gospel, against God and against men, sins past, sins present, sins to come. And what iniquity is expiated? Every form of iniquity, whatever falls short by omission, whatever goes beyond by commission. The Messiah came to wipe out and utterly destroy sin, and this is, and will be, the effect of His work. Put all the three sentences into one and this is the sum of them.

Indulge me for a few minutes while I take the sentences separately and press each cluster by itself. And first notice that it is said He came to FINISH THE TRANSGRESSION.

As some understand it, our Lord came that in His death transgression might reach its highest development, and sign its own condemnation. Sin reached its finis, its ultimatum, its climax, in the murder of the Son of God. It could not proceed further; the course of malice could no further go. Thy finis is written, O transgression! written by the pierced hand!

Now take the second sentence, which in our version is, "To make an end of sin." Messiah has come to proclaim so free, so rich, so gracious a pardon to the sons of men that when they receive it sin virtually ceases to be; it is made an end of. The man that is in Christ, and hath Christ for his covenant head, is this day so delivered from all sin whatsoever, that he may boldly ask the question, "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect?" If Christ has made an end of sin there is an end of it; the matter is ended, and no more is to be said. Down among the dead men let sin lie, forever buried by the right hand of the conquering Saviour.

But the Hebrew has it "to seal up sins." Now I take it to mean just this. There are certain handwritings which are against us, and they would be produced against us in court, but by the order of the judge all these handwritings are and regarded as out of sight; no man dare break the seal, and no man can read them unless the seal be broken; therefore they will never be brought against us. They have become virtually null and void. Everything that can be brought as an accusation against God's people is now sealed up and put out of the way once for all, never to be opened and laid to their charge before the living God. Or, if you regard sin as a captive prisoner, you must now see that by Christ's death the prison wherein sin lies is so sealed that the enemy can never come forth again in its ancient power. The mountain of the Lord's house is this day exalted upon the top of the hills, and though as yet all nations do not flow unto it, yet a glorious company comes streaming up to the temple of the living God, and that company shall increase from day to day.

But now, the last expression is in English, He hath come "to make reconciliation for iniquity"; that is, to end the strife between God and man by a glorious reconciliation, a making again of peace between these twain; so that God loveth man, and, as a consequence, man loveth God. In the blessed atonement of Christ, God and man meet at a chosen meeting-place. Oh, glorious reconciliation which Christ has made by honoring the law in His life and in His death.

I fail to describe this triumphant overthrow of sin and Satan. I have neither wisdom nor language answerable to such a theme. I invite you now for a few minutes to consider the second work, namely,

THE SETTING UP OF RIGHTEOUSNESS.

This is set before us in three expressions: first, in the words "to bring in everlasting righteousness." And what is that? Why, His own righteousness which is from everlasting to everlasting, and will never be taken away from those who have it, and will never cease to be their beauty and their glorious Jesus. The work of Christ in His life and death is by God imputed to His people; indeed, it is theirs because they are one with Christ. He is the Lord their righteousness, and they are the righteousness of God in Him. Saints are so righteous in Jesus Christ that they are more righteous than Adam was before he fell, for he had but a creature righteousness, and they have the righteousness of the Creator; he had a righteousness which he lost, but believers have a righteousness which they can never lose, an everlasting righteousness.

Nor is that all the meaning of our text; those to whom God imputes righteousness, to them also He imparts righteousness. He makes them pure in heart, He changes their desires, He makes them love that which is right and just and good, and so He gives them grace to lead godly, sober, honest, and holy lives. This righteousness shall not be crushed out of them, for the work of the Spirit shall continue until they shall become perfect, and be meet to dwell with God in light. Happy are those spirits to whom Christ gives an everlasting righteousness, for theirs is the kingdom and in it they shall shine forth as the sun.

Next, in order to the setting up of a kingdom of righteousness He is come that He may "seal up vision and prophecy." That is, by fulfilling all the visions and the prophecies of the Old Testament in Himself, He ends both prophecy and vision.

HE SEALS UP VISIONS

and prophecies so that they shall no more be seen or spoken; they are closed, and no man can add to them; and therefore—and that is the point to note—the Gospel is forever settled, to remain eternally the same. Christ has set up a kingdom that shall never be moved. His truth can never be changed by any novel revelation. Until such time as Christ Himself shall come the canon is complete; and though there be many voices crying, "Lo, here!" and "Lo, there!" and some so fascinating that they might deceive, if it were possible, the very elect, yet those whom Christ has chosen know the Shepherd's voice, and "a stranger will they not follow, for they know not the voice of strangers." Brethren, there always was something better yet to come in all times till Christ arrived; but after the best there cometh none.

This, then, is an essential part of the setting up of that which is good—namely, to settle truth on a fixed basis, whereon we may stand steadfast, immovable. The candles are snuffed out because the day itself looks out from the windows of heaven. Rejoice in this, beloved. God makes you righteous in Christ and with Christ, and in order that you shall never be perplexed with change, He sets aside all other teachers, that Christ may be your all in all.

Then, as if this were not enough, and truly it would not be enough, He is also come to anoint the Most Holy, or the Holy of holies, as you may read it. And what means this? Nothing material, for the Holy of holies, the place into which the High Priest went of old is demolished, and the veil is rent. The most holy place is now the person of the Lord Jesus Christ; He was anointed that God might dwell in Him. Together with Christ the Holy of holies is now His Church, and that Church was anointed or dedicated when the Holy Ghost fell at Pentecost, to be with us, and to abide in us forever. This is Christ's work, for which He came, and for which He ascended on high, to set up the truth, to set up righteousness, and to make it everlasting by the dwelling of the Holy Ghost in the Church of God in the midst of the sons of men.

Thus you see, in six ways, which condense themselves into two, our Lord set about His lordly enterprise. Heaven rings with the praises of the Messiah who came to destroy the work of sin, and to set up the kingdom of righteousness in the midst of the world.

II. Let us now inquire as to

in these two works. I will put a few questions as briefly as I can, and I pray God, the Holy Ghost, that every one of us may honestly answer them. First, dear brethren, Christ has come into the world to do all this good work, but has He done it for us? God loved the world, and therefore He gave His Son. But to what end did He give His Son? Here is the answer, "That whosoever believeth in Him might not perish, but have everlasting life." There was a special eye to believers. Come, then, have you believed?

The first question that is to help you to answer that inquiry is this: Is your sin shut up as to its power? "Sin shall not have dominion over you" if Christ is in you. How is it between your soul and evil? Is there war or peace? Once you loved sin; you could not have enough of it. Is it so now? Do you still delight in evil? For if you do, the love of God is not in you. Can you still put forth your hand to iniquity as you once did? Then do not pretend that Christ has done anything for you.

If you are a believer, your sin may not be absolutely dead, but it is shut up for dead; it is fast held in the condemned cell. It may still breathe, but it is crucified with Christ. How it tugs to get its hands loose from the nails! How it struggles to get its feet down from the tree! But it cannot, for He that nailed it there knew how to drive nails, and how to fasten the offender to the tree. Do you begin to grow weary of iniquity? Is it distasteful and unpleasant to you? And when looking over the day you perceive where you have spoken unadvisedly or acted hastily, or in any other way soiled your character, do you feel as if you would fain wash out every spot with tears? If it be so, Christ has begun with you; He has come to shut up your sin, and to end its reign; it shall no more have dominion over you. It may be in you, but it shall not be on the throne; it may threaten you, but it shall not command you; it may grieve you, but it shall not destroy you. You are under another master; you serve the Lord Christ. Judge you how this matter fares with you.

The next question arising out of the text is, Is your sin sealed up as to its condemning power? Have you ever felt the power of the Holy Spirit in your soul, saying to you, "Go in peace; thy sins which are many, are all forgiven thee"? Have you clutched that promise, "He that believeth in Him is not condemned"? Have you believed in Jesus? and has that blessed word, "There is therefore now no condemnation," breathed a deep calm over your spirit? Some of you do not know what I mean; but others of you do. He has made an end of sin. Come, dear hearer, do you know anything about this? If you do not, it is the one thing you want to know, and until you know it you will never have any rest to your spirit, but you will be tossed to and fro as upon a raging sea. "There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked." There is no peace to any of us till Christ hath made an end of our sin. How is it with your hearts?

And next,

as to its appearance before God? Has the Lord Jesus Christ made such an expiation for your sin that it no longer glares in the presence of the Most High, but you can come unto God without dread? Can you hopefully say, "Lord God, Thou seest no sin in me, for Thou hast covered me with the righteousness of Christ, and washed me in His blood"? Did you ever feel the sweetness of that? It is rapture! Have you ever felt it? You will feel constantly if Christ comes to dwell with you; you will then be assured in your heart that He has made an end of your sin.

Further, let me question you about the next point. Has the Lord Jesus Christ made you righteous? Do you glory in His blood and righteousness, and do you now seek after that which is pure and holy? "Be not deceived; God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." If we continue in sin we shall perish in sin. He is saved who comes out from evil and seeks to live honestly, righteously, soberly, after the manner of the godly and the saintly. Is it so with you? Is there a great and deep change in your spirit, so that you now love those good things which once you despised and ridiculed in others? Oh, if you cannot answer my poor questions, how will you stand before the judgment-seat of God when He shall test you as with fire?

III. Lastly, we have but a brief interval in which to speak of of participating in all this. The results! I want a week to speak of them in. They are, first of all, security. How can that man be lost whose transgression is finished, and whose sin has ceased to be? What is there for him to dread on earth, in heaven, or in hell? If Christ has put away my sin, I cannot die; if Christ has washed away my guilt, I cannot be condemned; I am safe, and may triumphantly sing:

"More happy, but not more secure,
The glorified spirits in heaven."

Wherefore, rejoice in this.

And now, inasmuch as you are secure, you are also reconciled to God, and made to delight in Him. God is your friend, and you are one of the friends of God. Rejoice in that hallowed friendship, and live in the assurance of it. Now you have the anointing, do not doubt it. Christ has made it yours by His death. The Spirit of the Lord resteth upon you; you are fit for service; set about it without further question. The anointing is upon you; you are most holy to the Lord; so let your life be wholly consecrated. Your heart ought to be, and shall be by the Spirit's power, as holy as that innermost shrine into which no unauthorized foot ever intruded, into which only once in the year the high priest went, and then not without blood. God dwelleth in you, and you in God. Oh, blessed consequences—you shall soon dwell with Him forever!

But now suppose when I put the question you had to shake your head and say, "No, it is not so with me." Then hear these few sentences. If the Messiah has not done this for you, then your sin will be finished in another way; sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death. An awful death awaits you—death unto God, and purity and joy. Woe, woe, to you. Death on the pale horse pursues you, and will overtake you soon. Then will one woe be past, but another will follow it. If Christ has never made an end of your sin, then mark this, your sin will soon make an end of you, and all your hopes, your pleasure, your boasting, your peace will perish.

Have you never had the righteousness of Christ brought in? Then mark this, your unrighteousness will last forever. One of these days God will say, "He that is unholy, let him be unholy still; he that is filthy, let him be filthy still." That will be the most awful thing that can ever happen to you. You have heard of the fable of Medusa's head: whoever looked upon it when it was held up was turned to stone; and one day, sinner, you shall look at death, and it will petrify your character so that it shall be forever what it is when death came to you. Where death finds you, there judgment shall find you, and there eternity shall leave you. Oh, wretched soul, to have nothing to do with the everlasting righteousness of Christ!

Lastly, will you never be anointed to be most holy? Then remember, holiness and you will stand at a distance forever, and to be far off from holiness must necessarily be to be far off from heaven and happiness. Sin is misery; in it lies both the root and the fruit of eternal woe. Purity is paradise; to be right with God is to be right with yourself and all created things; but if ye will not be holy, then must ye by force of your own choice be forever tossed about upon the restless sea of wretchedness. God save you, brothers and sisters; God save you for Christ's sake. Amen.

GALLANT RESCUE BY A LADY.

A BENEVOLENT institution which is established at the English town of Clewer for the reception of invalids that are approaching convalescence has for many years past unostentatiously afforded aid where it was most needed, without much notice from the general public. But an act of devotion and courage recently performed by one of the ladies who give their services in the hospital, has attracted considerable attention to the value of the work done there.

In July, 1882, a lady known as Sister Agnes, went to see the wife of a cottager whom she knew, in order to make arrangements for the reception of a little invalid boy just brought from London. While Sister Agnes was talking to the woman the child wandered toward a pond near the cottage, and fell into the water where it was very deep.

Without a moment's hesitation, and utterly oblivious of all personal or selfish considerations, Sister Agnes, hearing the child's shrill cry of helpless agony, at once rushed to the spot, dived into the murky insalubrious water, and rising to the surface, struck out with an energy born of true bravery, toward the drowning boy, but he had already disappeared. The air bubbles on the surface of the water told her, however, the spot where he had sunk.

Looking up to heaven, as if appealing for help, she resolutely dived again beneath the surface, and after a few moments of indescribable suspense on the part of the agonized mother, the brave lady again appeared, holding before her the child, in an almost senseless condition. The moments that passed were such as seem a lifetime to those who look on. It was a supreme crisis; for it requires no small effort when standing on terra firma to grasp firmly a robust, struggling child. In this case the little creature was in a paroxysm of fright and struggled desperately to save himself, and the lady, her movements impeded by her dress, had to swim with one hand and support the child with the other. It was a terrible struggle, and for some moments it seemed as if both lives must be lost. The anxious mother standing on the bank was paralyzed with alarm. She could do nothing. In her distress she tore her hair like one in frenzy and at last covered her eyes with her hands lest the sight of her drowning child should overthrow her reason. When she opened them again it was in response to the glad cry that told her her child was saved.

It is difficult to realize the true merits of such a rescue. In order to do so it must be remembered that the rescuer was a woman, who plunged into the water with all her clothing on, and who had to incur the danger of the child's dying grasp at a critical moment. The act of this kind lady, and the success which crowned her efforts, are types of those attempts made in the strength of the Holy Spirit by those who, impelled by the promptings of a pure philantropy inspired by the love of Christ, are prepared to sacrifice all they have and hold most dear, if only from the mire and sloughs and fetid waters of sin, in all its protean forms, they are able to save the souls of immortal ones from perishing forever in hell. It was in this spirit, and with this aim of highest generosity that Christ Himself came into the world "to seek and to save that which was lost," and He now summons all who profess to love Him, to share with Him the perils and honors of the enterprise.

ADA STUART'S PERIL AND RESCUE.

(See Illustration.)

ADA STUART sat at her piano playing soft, dreamy music while her father lay stretched on the lounge close at hand, tranquilly enjoying his evening hour of rest. A day spent in the murky city atmosphere among journals and ledgers, controlling and directing the extensive business of Stuart, Wells & Co., prepared Mr. Stuart to appreciate his luxurious parlor, the air laden with the delicate perfume of flowers and the harmony of Ada's piano. Ada played on, though her father's silence and motionless attitude led her to think he must have dropped asleep. Her thoughts wandered away from the room and its surroundings to very different scenes.

In the village outside the garden-gates of the Stuart mansion were many houses in which poverty and hardship were well known. As Ada's fingers strayed over the keys of the piano, the notes she called forth were very plaintive as she thought of the sorrow and misery she had seen on that and other days, but which she could not alleviate. She was able in simple, modest fashion to point the weary and heavy laden to the world's burden-bearer and to encourage the despairing to trust in Him who receives sinners; but she would have liked to have helped herself to bear the burdens, to have sent a ton of coal into one cottage, a new dress into another, and medicine and nourishment into a third. None of these things, however, could she do. Mr. Stuart objected to charity on principle. He subscribed liberally to charitable institutions and gave freely to funds raised for the benefit of the poor and afflicted, but he objected to dealing directly with the poor, and resolutely refused to give his daughter money to distribute among her poor.

It pauperized the people, he said, it discouraged thrift and self-dependence, and it generally resulted in imposition and deception of some kind. It was better far to teach them to lay up in store for a rainy day, and if the rain continued longer than the store, there were officials whose duty it was to look after such cases and prevent destitution ending in starvation. He had seen people provided for at the public expense, and they really seemed very comfortable. Private charity, therefore, Mr. Stuart considered a mistake, a voluntary assumption of burdens already provided for, and, in short, as a mischievous waste of money. Ada therefore was never able to relieve by actual gifts the distress around her, save in the few cases which could be relieved from her own pocket-money. To-day, however, she was especially depressed with this inability, and was meditating how best to overcome her father's aversion.

"What are you playing, Ada? It is the saddest air I ever heard. Some condemned prisoner pleading for life might use such strains."

Ada, startled by her father's question, answered simply, "I do not know, dear papa, I thought you were napping, and I expect my notes were the echo of my thoughts, and they were sad ones."

"What is wrong, Ada?" asked Mr. Stuart, anxiously. He loved his daughter with a passionate love, and since the death of her mother he had clung to her with all the strength of his nature; and, hard and reserved to all the rest of the world, had been always kind and tender to her. Her life, as he desired it to be, would have been a round of pleasures and gaieties, and as happy as love and money could make it. But pleasure had no charm for Ada. Her mother's memory was ever present with her, and that mother had been an eminently godly woman, who had in her youth drunk deeply of the cup of pleasure and had learned in time its bitter taste. Her care had been to lead her daughter to seek a better part, and God had blessed her efforts. Ada had, to her mother's inexpressible joy, given her heart to the Saviour about a year before Mrs. Stuart's last illness and death. Since then she had tried to take up the Christian work her mother had prosecuted during her life, and, as far as she was able, to be, as her mother had been, the light and comfort of the village homes.

Ada answered her father's question with a trembling heart. "I saw Widow Evans this morning, papa, and she is in sad trouble. Williams has told her she must leave the cottage now her husband is dead, and she is grieving about that. She was born there and lived in it before she was married, and ever since, and it seems trouble upon trouble to have to leave now. Dear papa, do tell Williams to allow her to remain."

"No, my dear, you are too sympathetic with those people; you let them impose upon you. Widow Evans will be a great deal better off in a smaller place. It is only sentiment and pride. She will soon get over it, and I want her place for the new gardener. Surely that was not the cause of your sadness, my child?"

"Yes, papa, I am very sorry for the poor woman left to struggle alone in the world. I think her lot will be very hard. I wish she might be spared this additional sorrow."

"Ada, why will you seek troubles? Your life ought to be as happy as the day. You must have trouble some day. I cannot shield you always, though I would do so if I could. But why are you so anxious to take up other people's worries? They do not concern you. In this world every one must bear his own burden, and I generally find the unhappy and unfortunate are the people who deserve to be so."

"Dear papa, I know you are wiser than I, but do not be vexed with me for trying to do a little good when I can. It is but little I can do to fill dear mamma's place in the village. The poor people do miss her so. You remember her last words to me: 'Visit the fatherless and the widow in their affliction, and keep yourself unspotted from the world.' I am trying to do that, papa, and I am happier so than at the balls and parties you think more natural for me. I should feel more delight in getting your consent to Widow Evans remaining than in all the expensive presents you give me."

"Ah! that is a matter of business, Ada, and I have settled it on that principle, though for your sake I wish I could have arranged it otherwise."

When Mr. Stuart spoke in that tone Ada knew further pressing was useless, and turning again to her piano she sought out the music her father loved, and the room was filled with sweet sounds.

Ada was an early riser, and before her father appeared the next morning she was wandering through the garden gathering flowers to adorn the breakfast table. While so engaged, a servant summoned her to Mr. Stuart's room. She went immediately, and there found her father reclining in his chair and suffering severe pain. In stepping across the room he had slipped and sprained his ankle. The accident caused him annoyance as well as pain, as his face showed.

"Ada," he said, "this is a most unfortunate affair. I cannot go to the office to-day, and there is very serious business to be done there. I dare not trust any messenger but you, lest something should go wrong. Would you mind riding over after breakfast and taking two letters which you must put into the hands of the persons to whom they are addressed, and give them to no one else?"

"Of course I will, papa, if that will help you better than by staying and nursing your poor foot. The pony is lame, so I will take Niger, and he will soon carry me there and back."

"I am sorry you will have to take that great black brute. He is not fit for a lady to ride. You are a good horsewoman I know, but are you sure you can manage him?"

"Oh, yes, papa, I have often ridden him. I am not at all afraid."

A few minutes later Ada cantered down the village on her ungainly steed. It was true she had frequently ridden him, but it was a venturesome experiment. He was quiet enough as a rule, but any one with the slightest knowledge of horses could see that it would need a stronger wrist than Ada's to hold him if he became restive. Ada accomplished her journey safely, and was nearing her home again. She entered the village street, but when near the cottage in which Widow Evans lived and which she was so soon to leave, a sheet of paper was carried by a gust of wind from a passing wagon right around Niger's ears. His alarm would have been ludicrous had it not been dangerous. In an instant he swerved with a violence that almost threw Ada from her seat, and then tore along the road almost mad with fright. Not far ahead was an avenue of trees with low-hanging branches, and in the headlong course Niger was taking it was evident that Ada could not hope to escape with her life. Several men dashed out in pursuit, but their cries only increased the horse's speed, and there was no one ahead to check it. Widow Evans, however, with her two children was in her garden and saw what had happened and who it was that was in danger. She uttered a scream and ran to her gate; but Robert, her fourteen year old boy, was before her. Quick as thought he dashed into the road, and jumping close to Niger's side he seized the rein and hung on to it with all his weight. The ugly brute swerved aside and would have flung him off if he could, but that dead weight on the rein was too great even for his strength, and after a few futile struggles he was brought to a stand.

"The great ungainly brute swerved under Robert's weight."

Ada's nerves were completely unstrung by the excitement, and she was too agitated to do more than utter a few words of thanks to the brave boy who had saved her life. Mr. Stuart, however, had witnessed the affair from his chamber window, and it was with a heart full of gratitude that he vowed the boy, whoever he might be, should reap a rich reward for his daring.

Widow Evans still occupies her cottage, and her support is the liberal salary her eldest boy receives in the warehouse of Messrs. Stuart, Wells & Co., in which he has long been a trusted and valued employé.

PETER BLAKE'S VOYAGE.

A SERIAL STORY BY HESBA STRETTON.

Mara not Naomi.

It had been a sad time for Peter's mother. She had never fairly felt at home in England, nor had she grown quite accustomed to English manners. Now she had lost her sons, a dreary sense of utter loneliness and desolation preyed upon her. It was a cruel country, where no one cared for brave men like her husband and her sons, but left them to perish, if other men grew richer by their death. Now this fresh blow had fallen she knew well enough that Bessie must have a desperate fight for bread for herself and the children. But if she went back to Normandy there would be no home for her except the hospital, and she shrank painfully from seeking a refuge there.

Her father had been a prosperous fisherman, owning several boats, and had given her a good sum for her marriage portion, though he had not altogether liked her wedding an English sailor. She had lived so well after her marriage, among her own people, surrounded with every English comfort, and made so much of by her English husband, that it was tenfold more humiliating to go back to her native town and there beg for a corner and a bed in the hospital.

But there was a simple courage and tenderness in her heart which would not suffer this pride to turn her aside from treading her old dignity and good fortune under her feet, if that was the right thing to do for Bessie and her grand-children. She could not be any other than a burden to Bessie if she remained. Yet to part with her and the children and place the deep and cruel sea, the grave of her husband and son, between herself and them, how hard that would be! All through the sleepless night that followed the notice to quit the sail-maker's house this question rang through her brain, "Must I go? Must I leave them?" but before the late, lingering sun rose the answer was clear to her. She must go.

"Bessie," she said, early in the morning, "I will go back to my France, my Normandy. You shall never be able to keep me; that is impossible. I go to eat the bread of charity from my own people, not from strange people. I cannot go into what you call a workhouse. I must leave you and my baby and my Nannette. It is too much of misfortune; yet the good God loves us still."

"If I could only believe it!" wailed Bessie.

"But in truth He loves us," persisted her mother-in-law, with tears in her dark eyes. "His Son, our Lord Jesus, had sorrows worse to bear. His poor mother had sorrows worse to bear. She did stand by Him and did see Him hang on His cross, the crown of thorns upon His head, and she must not try to take Him down from the cross, and she must not take one little thorn out of His crown. That must have made me die—to see Peter and Victor sinking in the sea and not to do something to save them."

"But Mary saw Him again in three days," said Bessie.

"And we shall see Peter and Victor again," she went on, "not in three days, but some day. But I shall go back to my town; I can live here no more. And I will take with me nothing but my cradle, our cradle, where I rocked Peter when he was my first eldest little baby. They will let me keep it in the hospital, if the sister Marie is still alive. The sister Marie knows me very well."

There was little time for thinking over the question. Bessie could not bear to let Peter's mother go; but December had already set in, with bitter snowy weather and keen north-east winds, and the poor shivering ailing woman was racked with sharp rheumatic pains. She had always been fond of talking of her sunny Normandy, with its bright blue skies and its blossoming apple-orchard; and Bessie, who knew little of foreign countries, except the strange accounts brought by Peter from his voyages, thought it must be nearly always summer in France. It was best then for her to go back to Normandy. So she packed up the few possessions that her husband's mother would consent to take away with her in the heavy old wooden cradle, and had it carried to the wharf, not far off, from which a steamer was about to sail for Havre.

It was all hurriedly done, for she had but one more night to stay in her old home; and it would be a good thing for Peter's mother to be gone before she was turned out. With the baby in her arms, and little Nan clinging to her grandmother's hand, they passed sorrowfully along the old familiar streets to the wharf where the steamer lay.

"Mother," cried Bessie, "we shall never see one another any more!"

The Frenchwoman's brown face was quivering and her lips trembling, though she strove hard to speak bravely to her son's wife, whose face she was never likely to see again.

"The good God is very good," she said, "and He loves us. He is very good, though my two sons are lost, and I go away quite old, and solitary, and poor. If He does not love me, who shall be good to me? I have not one other friend. No, no. I have called Him always my good God, and He must be my good God still. He will love you and me."

"Are you going in the ship to look for father and Uncle Victor?" asked little Nan. They had neither of them found it in their hearts to tell the child plainly that both her father and Victor were drowned, though she had heard them say that they were lost. "Are you going to find father?" she asked, again pulling her grandmother's cloak.

"They'll never be found again, never, no more!" said Bessie, falling on her knees, and taking the little girl into her arms; "none of us will ever find father again."

"But God can find him," said the child. "God holds him and Uncle Victor in His hand, and He couldn't lose them. Mother, has God lost them out of the hollow of His hand?"

"No, no, my Nannette," answered her grandmother; "the good God cannot lose them. 'No one can steal them out of the hand of My Father;' that is said by our Lord Jesus. 'No one can steal them out of My hand,' He said also. There is not one of us lost in His hand. But I must part. Adieu, my Nannette, my Bessie, my poor little baby!"

Bessie put the baby into little Nan's arms, and clung weeping to Peter's mother. To part with her was something like losing him afresh. There would be no one left to talk with her about him, and to share her grief. She was such a poor, desolate, bereaved, sorrowful woman, too! How ailing and infirm she looked, as she stood leaning over the bulwark, gazing back toward them, while the steamer moved slowly off! She stayed there, on deck, waving her white handkerchief toward them, long after her own dim eyes had lost all sight of Bessie and the children on the wharf; yet as long as she thought they could see her handkerchief fluttering against the dark hull of the vessel, she would not go below, in spite of the keen wind blowing up the river.

The last thing she saw was the bow-window, now black and cheerless, with no firelight gleaming through its panes. She crept away then, as if with a fresh wound in her sorrowful heart, down into the darkest corner of the cabin. The sailors, the rigging, every sound and sight, brought to her mind too strongly her boys, whom she could never keep away from the sea. With her brown withered face turned away from the dim light, and with long-hoarded tears streaming from her eyes, she gave way at last to a paroxysm of deep and bitter grief, such as the old seldom feel.

Her brave, beautiful sons! her pleasant, loveing daughter-in-law! her pretty babies, whose cradle only she had brought away with her—all were lost. If she had but kept her boys in France, even if they had gone to sea, it would not have been in some worn-out or overladen ship. She could have borne it better if they had perished by the unavoidable perils of the sea, or if God had taken them away by one of His irresistible decrees. But they had had no chance; they had been cast away that the ship's owner might be a richer man.

It was a December morning, though soft and bright, as Peter's mother crossed over the mouth of the Seine from Havre to Honfleur. The high cliffs behind the town were clothed with trees still in leaf, and glowing with the rich crimson and amber of autumn. High among them stood the cross, beneath which she had so often sat to watch the sea, upon which her husband was sailing. Low down on the shore, so near the water that its tides beat against the thick stone walls, lay the gray hospital, with its little belfry, under which swung the deep-toned old bell, whose tolling had often sounded in her ears, as she returned in her father's fishing-boat from the low-lying, tide-swept sands, stretching out into the open sea. The little fleet of fishing-boats was sailing homewards with the tide, and she could hear the merry singing of the girls and women in them, as the steamer passed by them. Was it possible that she had once been light-hearted and gay like them, before she had met with her English seaman!

The jetty was all alive with the townsfolk, crowding down to meet the steamer. Besides these were the old fishermen and the fishwomen from the market, waiting to see what the boats would bring in. She knew nearly every face there. There was Michel, whom her father had chosen for her husband, and who had been wise enough to draw back when he found that her love had been given to Peter Blake. He was the first to see her, but in a few minutes she was surrounded by a crowd of old friends and neighbors. Most of the women had envied her in former times, and wished that they, too, could find English husbands, to carry them away to that paradise for wives which lay across the stormy Channel. But the old men still remembered the blame that had fallen on Henri Baudin for giving his pretty daughter to an English heretic.

They formed a group about her, on the jetty, with her old wooden cradle beside her, all that she had brought back from that rich England whither she had gone. Where was her husband? He was dead. Where were her sons? They, too, were dead. They had all been lost at sea.

"My husband went out in a worn-out ship," she said, her voice tremulous and low, "and he was drowned; and my sons, both of them, went out in a ship overladen, and they were drowned. There were not enough men in the ship, for two of them made themselves deserters at the last minute even; they were sent to jail, and they are in jail now. If my sons had gone to jail they would have been saved."

"But how," asked Michel, who had been listening eagerly, "did their Capitaine Expert let the ships go to sea worn-out and overladen? Did he not see that they were not good vessels, sound and safe? What sort of certificate could he give to them that the cargo was well laden and the provisions good?"

"They have no Capitaine Expert in England," she answered.

"No Capitaine Expert!" echoed half a dozen voices.

"What then!" cried Michel's wife, a sunburned, brisk-looking woman, whose long gold earrings glistened in the sunlight under her snow-white cap; "do the English women not love their husbands, that they permit them to go away to sea in rotten old ships, without enough food? Here, in France, we would see if our men abandoned us like that! We would go up to Paris, every one of us, and make them change their laws. Bah, madame! Your fine English women do not care a straw for their husbands!"

"My Peter's wife loved him with all her heart," she replied, sobbing.

"Why, then," replied Michel's wife—"why does she not go to the grand Lord Mayor of London, and cry, and pray for help? Why do not all the sailors' wives go up together, in a great troop, to the Lord Mayor's palace! Oh, if it were so here, in France, would we sit still and hold our tongues, think you?"

"My two sons sailed out to sea, and were lost," she answered; "that is all I know. Nobody will ask about them, nobody will care, except me and Bessie."

"But it is incredible!" said Michel; "England is so great a nation for ships. If they lose their sailors what can they do? It will become a nation quite small, of quite little importance. They are not wise these Englishmen."

"The Englishwomen are too cold, too tranquil," added his wife; "they have no blood in their veins; they do not love their husbands. If they loved them, would they let them be taken away to be drowned in worn-out old ships? No, no, no."

"I loved my husband well," she said, with quivering lips. How often they had stood together on this jetty, watching the boats come in, just as Michel and his wife were doing now! It seemed almost as if the last few years had been only a painful dream, and that in a moment or two she might awake to see him at her side again, and her son Peter, a boy of twelve, coming back in the boats. Was it true that they would never feel the sunshine again, nor see the river glittering in the light, nor hear the hundred cheery sounds of life mingling together all about them?

"Good day, my friends," she said, looking up, and trying to smile. "I am very tired. I must go on."

"But where are you going, madame?" asked Michel; "we will carry your baggage for you. Ah! it is the old cradle, I see; thy mother's cradle, Nannette."

No one had called her Nannette since her husband's death, and the tears started to her eyes. How could she tell Michel and his wife that she had no refuge but the hospital. Yet they were waiting for her answer, and she could not keep her bitter lot a secret. She had gone away happy and prosperous; she had come home again penniless and childless.

"I must go," she answered, with a faltering utterance. "I must go to the hospital."

There was a dead silence for a minute among all the group that surrounded her, and Michel was the first to break it.

"Madame," he said, respectfully, "we will do ourselves the honor of accompanying you. You will be very welcome there."

In another minute a little procession was formed of old neighbors and friends, who pressed about her, speaking to her in tones of sympathy. The streets along which they passed were narrow and roughly paved; but she knew every house in them, and the faces that looked through the windows at the sound of so many footsteps, and the hum of so many voices passing by, were many of them familiar to her. Was it more or less bitter to be treading these well-known streets on her way to the last poor shelter where she could lay her head? She could not tell. There was no chilling indifference, such as would have been her lot if she had gone into some English workhouse; but in England there would have been no sad memories awakened into life at every step she took.

At the great heavy door of the hospital she bade farewell to her escort. The old cradle was carried into the inner court, and she had to tell her mournful story again to the pitying Sisters, who gathered about her. But she was worn out and exhausted; the strain upon her feeble strength had been too long and too great. A sudden dimness fell upon her, and she stretched out her hands to them as if groping for help. She forgot the words she was saying to them, and they heard her mutter, in broken sentences, "He has not lost—not lost them—not lost me—out of the hollow of His hand."

THE RETURN TO ANTIOCH.

S. S. Lesson for June 17, Acts 14 : 19–28. Golden Text, Matt. 28 : 19. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Disinterested Service not Understood—Persecutors Narrow-Spirited—The Higher Physical Law—Paul Stoned and Quickened—Believers Privileged Witnesses—What is Christ Worth?—Elders Ordained—Dependence on the Holy Spirit—The Missionaries' Resources—Their Life of Faith—Return to Antioch—Their Testimony.

THE same spirit which prompted the heathen Lystrians to deify Paul and Barnabas, made them just as ready to persecute them later on. The apostles came to preach not themselves, "but Christ Jesus the Lord" (2 Cor. 4 : 3); this the poor heathen could not understand. "Man shall praise thee when thou doest well to thyself" (Ps. 49 : 18), and Paul and Barnabas were not doing well unto themselves, not seeking their own interests. It was inconceivable to those who had or of what holiness was, that men could be so devoted to an unseen God as to forego personal interest and personal safety for His sake. Thus when some of the Jews from Antioch and Iconium made it their business to come and side with the heathen against them, and persuade them, the poor ignorant people, having nothing in common with them, were easily induced to persecute them.

We have a little light here on the difference there is in dealing with those who have some measure of Bible knowledge and prayer and those who have no conception of Divine things. In almost every place where Paul preached in the synagogues, where his quotations from Scripture and his allusions to the true God were understood, we hear of immediate results, some among his audience "believed" under his first sermon, but at Lystra, where gross idolatry prevailed, it was otherwise; we read of no immediate results, although on his return to that city later, he found disciples there. We are not told on what ground the Jews stirred up the Lystrians, or what arguments they used. Their own hatred of the truth and of its witnesses sprung undoubtedly from jealousy and an intolerance of those who lived more in the power of God than they did, although they deceived themselves by the belief that they were serving God and their religion by opposing the doctrines of Jesus of Nazareth.

Oh, how narrow is the spirit of persecution; one might have thought that even while they themselves rejected Jesus they might at least have been thankful that the heathen should be brought from their gross idolatry to the knowledge of the true God, though it were by Christians. But no; they would rather souls should perish in the grossest heathenism than that they should believe on Jesus. And this same spirit is abroad to this day! How many, even among believers, shake their heads ominously and warn other believers against those who are teachers of holiness and healing! How many there are who attribute the present manifest power of the living God to magnetism, mesmerism, or spiritualism, which things savor of the abominations against which God warned His people (Deut. 18 : 9–13), and which must be abhorrent to all true followers of God. But whatever were the arguments used by the Jews, the people of Lystra were influenced by them, and they carried their persecution to such a length as to stone Paul, and having done so, to draw his apparently lifeless body out of the city, supposing he had been dead.

But these persecuting Jews and these men of Lystra had yet to learn that the life which Paul lived in the flesh was than they yet knew, he lived by the faith of the Son of God who died and gave Himself for him (Gal. 2 : 20). The Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwelt in him, and He that raised up Christ from the dead quickened his mortal body by His Spirit that dwelt in him (Rom. 8 : 11). His persecutors were not there to witness the life returning into that lacerated, bruised, and bleeding body. But disciples were there, whether some who had accompanied them from Iconium, or whether some Lystrians who had already received Christ; in any case it was in the midst of those who believed that he rose up, and came into the city; and he seems to have been healed of all the effects of the stoning, for he departed the next day with Barnabas to Derbe. We are not told what the effect was upon the city of Lystra when the man left for dead, a heap of bruised flesh, came walking on his own feet into the city. In any case the few who had been brought to believe must have been strengthened in their faith very considerably, and probably the persecutors must have thought "that God who so defends His people is very different from the powerless gods we worship."

Paul and Barnabas were no ways inclined to desist from the work of their vocation because of the persecution even unto death which they had met with; arrived at Derbe, "they preached the gospel to that city," and also "taught many." Here the Jews seem to have desisted from pursuing them; they had a quiet time of it, and without doubt a blessed work of God was done among the heathen. Then a choice lay before them; should they go farther, or return to the places through which they had travelled?

GOD WAS THEIR GUIDE,

and He led them back to the very place where Paul had been stoned. Was it not madness to go there? No; it was the safest place on the face of the earth for Paul, because he was in the will of God, and God was perfectly equal to the charge of him. He and Barnabas seem to have conducted holiness meetings in Lystra, Iconium and Antioch. Notwithstanding all the opposition they had met with in either place they went thither "confirming the souls of the disciples, and exhorting them to continue in the faith, and that we must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God." "Is not this rather a discouraging view of the Gospel?" some may say. "How much is Jesus worth to you," we would answer, "At what price do you value Him?"

Then "they ordained them

ELDERS IN EVERY CHURCH."

This must have been from among the converts themselves. How much faith Paul and Barnabas must have had in God that He could make these untaught, untrained men, heathen but yesterday equal to the charge of the new converts! They must have believed indeed in the direct work of the Holy Ghost through such as are given entirely up to Him. They had no means of controlling these new made elders, no provision for keeping them in consistency and purity of life and doctrine, and yet they could rest quiet, knowing that the Holy Ghost Himself took real charge of each little flock. And how much better off were some of these early churches than many congregations in our own day, where the minister may be a man of learning, even of note, yet void of the Holy Ghost.

In these early churches if evil arose, God was the Counsellor, God's the authority, through His Word and by His Spirit. The offender had not to feel that the question was between him and man, but between him and God. Men had faith then in God's special direction and His special intervention, and although the odds against every new convert must have been fearful in their heathen families; and probably fortune, reputation, family position, all must be sacrificed in becoming a Christian, yet the centres of spiritual life in the churches must have been so warm, so living as to more than compensate for all they lost.

"When they had ordained them elders in every church and prayed with fasting, they commended them to the Lord, on whom they believed." What this praying with fasting was we can only surmise. But probably it was a time set apart for earnest prayer and conference about their future work which did not admit of distraction, and therefore necessarily included fasting, but in which nothing of that idea which many possess was included that by prayer and fasting we must compel God to give blessing which He gives grudgingly and unwillingly. We can well understand how Paul and Barnabas, seeing together the precious souls for which they had prayed, believed and suffered, now in uniting them into little churches and delivering to them charges from God, would be so filled with emotion that eating was out of the question. The very men who had sought to pay divine honors to them now knowing Jesus only, the very hands which had helped to stone Paul now given up to the service of God; Jupiter, Mercury, and their other gods forsaken, and their lips full of praise to the true God; it was enough to overcome the two disciples.

And after they had passed through Pisidia, they came to Pamphylia. We can little understand what these missionary journeys must have been, and for how much food, means of transit, etc. If they carried with them any copy of the Scriptures, it must have been too heavy for themselves to carry, each book being in itself a very large and heavy parchment roll. They had also to trust the Lord for clothing. Paul, it is true, usually worked for his living (Acts 18 : 2, 3; 2 Cor. 12 : 13–18; 2 Thess. 3 : 8), lest it should be thought that he served God for gain (1 Cor. 9 : 6–18); but in order to do this he must remain a certain time in a place. He often suffered necessities (2 Cor. 12 : 10; 11 : 27), but he says he took pleasure in them, he felt it was worth while. Had Paul lived in our day, he would rather have sold religious papers from door to door than have asked any one for money; we want men of this spirit in

THE BLUE RIBBON GOSPEL ARMY.

Their next move was to Perga; this was their second visit, and "they preached the Word." In the matter of preaching, too, how many difficulties they had to overcome! Probably among the heathen their chief audiences were in the open air, beginning by a conversation with individuals which gradually gathered a crowd. Then would come conversation and prayer with inquirers, the healing of the sick, etc., and there needed unceasing prayer and faith that in all things, in every detail, their way might be made plain. From Perga they went to Attalia, a seaport, from thence they "sailed to Antioch (in Syria), from whence they had been recommended to the grace of God for the work which they fulfilled."

They had been absent probably about four or five years, and it is not likely that many, if any, communications had passed between them and the church at Antioch. And how glorious must have been their meeting with those who had recommended them to the grace of God, who had sent them forth at the bidding of the Holy Ghost into such an unknown, untried future! Oh, how much they must have had to tell about the faithfulness of their God and His good hand over them, and how the Antiochan Christians must have been strengthened in their faith when, having gathered the church together, "they rehearsed all that God had done with them, and how He had opened the door of faith unto the Gentiles." When they told him of the stoning of Paul and his rising up alive, of the blessed conversion of the Lystrians, etc., oh, how great must have been their joy! This was no hurried visit, probably they saw their need of contact with other Christians, for "they abode long time with the disciples."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Coronation of the Czar was Accomplished on Sunday, May 27th, in spite of the threats of the Nihilists. The most elaborate precautions were taken to insure the safety of the young autocrat, but no hostile demonstration was made during any part of the proceedings. The correspondent of the New York Herald, who witnessed the ceremony, describes it as "a dream of grandeur, splendor and solemnity. No such magnificent spectacle has been witnessed anywhere in Europe in modern times as the glorious and impressive service. The most gorgeous that I have ever seen sinks into insignificance compared with that which has been brought to an end within the walls of the most sacred church in Russia—the Uspenski Sabor, or Cathedral of the Assumption." The appearance of the interior of the edifice was magnificent. In the centre, between four great columns, was a scarlet canopy, and under it the throne, and before that, the table on which was the regalia. The Emperor and Empress on entering the cathedral were received by the Archbishop of Moscow, who put the questions to the Emperor as to his religious faith. Selections from the gospels were then read, and the Metropolitans of Novogorod and Kieff ascended the dais and invested the Emperor with the imperial mantle of ermine, the Metropolitan of Moscow saying at the same time, "Cover and protect thy people as this robe protects and covers thee." The Emperor responded, "I will, I will, I will, God helping." The Metropolitan of Novogorod, crossing his hands upon the head of the emperor, then invoked the benediction of Almighty God upon him and his reign, and delivered to Alexander III. the crown of Russia, who placed it upon his own head and assuming the sceptre and orb took his seat upon the throne. He then returned the insignia of his title to the dignitaries appointed to receive them, and called the Empress, who knelt before him; he touched her head lightly with the crown of the Emperor, and then formally crowned her with her own crown. The expression and the attitude of the Empress, as she knelt, was one of sympathy with her royal husband and touched deeply the audience. Directly this part of the ceremony was finished the bells in all the churches of Moscow rang out in chorus, a salute of one hundred and one guns was fired, and inside the cathedral the members of the imperial family tendered their congratulations to their majesties. The Bishop of Moscow said aloud in behalf of the nation a fervent prayer for the happiness of their majesties. Shouts of "Long live the Emperor!" then rent the cathedral, and were taken up by thousands outside and carried from mouth to mouth until that part of the multitude who were unable to get inside even the ample acreage of the Kremlin caught the sound and waved it in a huge volume of human gratulation to the remotest parts of the city, where it was speedily known that another Czar of the Russias had been crowned. The same evening the Czar issued a manifesto granting the remission of a large number of penalties and fines and arrears of taxes due from the poor. It also granted amnesty to Polish exiles who would consent to two years' police supervision.

The French Government have Made Arrangements for a vigorous prosecution of the war in Tonquin, which it is expected will also involve war with China. The capture of Fort Hanoi by the French has been followed by disasters. It was surrounded by the enemy, and when Captain Rivière, the French commander, made a sortie, the Annamites fell upon his little force of 400 men and almost annihilated it. Captain Rivière was killed, and fifteen men who were taken prisoners were carried off and executed with unspeakable barbarity. The French Government on receiving the news appointed General Bouet to the command in Tonquin in place of the deceased Captain Rivière, and at once dispatched reinforcements to the scene of war. China on her side is also making extensive preparations to aid her neighbor. Li Hung Chang, her ablest statesman and soldier, has been summoned to take command of the Chinese troops in the provinces bordering on Tonquin, and he is daily expected at Shanghai on his way to his new post to begin operations. He will find already assembled 6000 Chinese troops, armed in the manner of European troops, and massed on the Tonquin frontier and a fleet of torpedo boats built and armed in Germany and manned in part by German marines ready for action. That Germany is closely watching the conduct of France in the far East is evident from a dispatch sent from Berlin on May 31st, which is clearly inspired by the German Chancellor. It says. "Despite the assurances of the French that there is no danger of a war between France and China, the commerce of Germany with China has already been much disturbed by the Tonquin dispute. It is hoped in Berlin that if France declares a blockade of Chinese ports Great Britain and America will refuse to recognize it. A French blockade cannot be effective, and Germany will certainly support England and America in opposing it. The German Government are considering the question of sending more vessels to the Chinese coast."

In Madagascar the French Forces are Proceeding with their barbarous work. A dispatch from Tamatave, received on June 1st, says that the French have bombarded two ports on the north-west coast of Madagascar, causing great destruction of British and other merchandise. Two large American warehouses there are also said to have been destroyed. The French man-of-war Forhait and the British war sloop Dryad have left the harbor of Tamatave. The Malagassy authorities are pressing forward their military preparations. A decidedly hostile feeling has been aroused in Europe toward France by the bombardment. It was believed that the ports in the north-west, which are chiefly occupied by American and European merchants, would not be attacked, as France was aware that the bombardment must involve a wanton destruction of property.

Two More Executions have Taken Place in connection with the Phœnix Park murders. On May 28th Michael Fagan was hanged in Kilmainham Jail, and on June 2d Thomas Caffrey paid the forfeit of his life in the same place. Neither of the two struck the fatal blows, but both witnessed the murder, being on the spot by order of the Invincible Society to which they belonged. Caffrey made an earnest appeal to young men to keep out of secret societies, and appeared to be sincerely penitent. He pleaded guilty at his trial, and was no doubt disappointed that his plea did not save his life. He is the fourth of the gang hanged for the dastardly crime, which even Mr. Parnell denounced.

A National Monument to Garibaldi is to be erected on Janiculum Hill, the site of the general's defence of Rome against the French in 1849. The cost will be defrayed from the national Treasury by a vote of the Chamber of Deputies on June 1st. The recent anniversary of the death of General Garibaldi was commemorated throughout Italy. The Syndic of Rome unveiled a bronze bust of Garibaldi in the capital. A number of persons formed in procession and marched to the capital to witness the unveiling ceremony.

A Rebuff to Royalty is Said to have been administered by Mr. Gladstone. A cablegram published in the daily journal states that the Duke of Albany, Queen Victoria's youngest son, recently received an urgent request from Canada to consent to be the successor of the Marquis of Lorne as Governor-General of the Dominion. The Duke, after studying the affairs of Canada, wrote to Mr. Gladstone on the subject. The Prime Minister replied that the Duke was too young for such an important position, and also that he lacked experience in governmental work. The physicians of the Duke of Albany were of opinion that his health would not have suffered by his acceptance of the post. The affair has provoked a lively discussion in England. The Duke is over thirty years old, and is only three years younger than the Marquis of Lorne was when he was appointed to the same office. It is thought in Court circles that Mr. Gladstone was glad of an opportunity of rebuffing the royal family in return for personal slights; his friends, on the other hand, claim that his action is due solely to regard for the interests of the great Dominion.

A Fatal Result of the Gaming Table is Reported from Monte Carlo. A foreign correspondent of a daily journal writes: "The newest case of suicide at Monte Carlo has put into mourning one of the first families of Schleswig-Holstein. Its youngest son had the misfortune, during a journey to Italy, to make a visit to Monaco. He had a large sum of money with him at the time, but he lost it at roulette. Telegraphing home for more, he received it and played again, but lost all he had. He then lost his watch, his studs, and his rings and tried to borrow 500f. to pay his hotel bill. Being a stranger he could not do this, and out of shame at his failure, and out of reluctance to ask for more money from his family, he shot himself."

A Spurgeon Golden Wedding.—Mr. C. H. Spurgeon's parents have just celebrated their fiftieth wedding-day. The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pastor was their first child, and a golden wedding commemoration was arranged for at his residence on Monday, including a gathering of children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren, to the number of nearly forty. Mr. Spurgeon's father, the Rev. John Spurgeon, although retired from the pastorate, frequently conducts service as a Congregational minister, and has six brothers living. The family has for generations past been remarkable for the longevity of its members. Mrs. Spurgeon, senior, remembers the celebration of her grand-parent's golden wedding.

Mr. Francis Murphy, the Temperance Advocate, has written to a friend in this country a letter from which the following interesting extract is taken: "Your good letter with account of Woman's Christian Temperance Union anniversary inclosed received and read with interest. The women there have done a great work in our country. Would that the same work was being done here. The women of England are not working like our women. It is most difficult to keep them together here on account of class distinction. Many of the nobility have signed the pledge and put on the ribbon of blue—the Countess Dowager of Sunderland, Lord Mount Temple, Lady Wolsey, the Duchess of Aberdeen, the Hon. Emly Kinnaird, and a host of others. The Rev. Mr. Spurgeon has signed and put on the blue, also the Rev. Canon Basil Wilberforce and the Earl of Carlisle. My son Edward and myself are going into Exeter Hall, London, commencing on the 27th inst., and continuing till June 3d. May God help us. It is the last work we do in this country if we can get away. I am longing to see my own dear land. It was stated in our country that the Rev. Spurgeon was a hard drinker. It was false. He was most abstemious in the use of drink. He has been very kind to myself and son."

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

GEORGE FREDERICK PENTECOST, the eminent pastor and evangelist, whose portrait appears on our frontispiece this week, comes of a family stock in which many strands are woven. For his physical and mental characteristics he is debtor to French, English, and Jewish ancestors. The traditional origin of the name Pentecost is interesting and suggestive. A Bohemian went to France, was converted among the Huguenots, and became a zealous lay evangelist. His labors were always followed by so much blessing that the people among whom he labored called him Old Pentecost. This became the new name of the family, the members of which lapsed into unbelief, until, through a Christian mother of Hebrew lineage, the believer and evangelist again appears.

The subject of our biography was born at Albion, Ill., on September 23d, 1842. He is the third child of Hugh L. Pentecost. His only surviving brother is a prominent Baptist clergyman in Brooklyn, N. Y. Soon after the birth of George, his father failed in business, and became hopelessly dispirited. The burden of supporting the family was in consequence laid on the wife and mother, whose energy was equal to the emergency. To meet it, she took her charge to Evansville, Ill.

After two years had been passed in the public school, and when thirteen years old, George was and he quickly acquired skill in the business, receiving while still a boy full wages. At the age of fifteen his father died, and he removed to Kansas, dazzled by the glowing accounts he had read of certain fortune in that new territory.

Reaching Quindaro, he obtained employment in the store of a former townsman, but the following year came depression; he lost his situation, and was adrift with many others in like condition. He was driven to ask for the humblest labor; sometimes toiling with Irish workmen upon the highways; working in a saw mill, sleeping in the loft, and again, purchasing an axe, venturing into the virgin forest; indeed, he turned to whatever employment gave any compensation. He soon tired of this life, and travelled to Leavenworth, hoping to obtain work as a printer, but without success. At Lawrence, however, he found employment at good wages. It was there that he contracted the habits of dissipation which were near proving his ruin.

By his characteristic fondness for mischief, which often found expression in practical jokes, he lost his situation at Lawrence. His employer was coming up the stairway one day, and supposing him to be an associate, George threw a pail of binder's paste full in his employer's face. The words of farewell to the astonished offender were few, but exceedingly emphatic. Then came another period of idleness and poverty.

While endeavoring to obtain board at a hotel in Lecompton by a story concocted to deceive, a young man noticed his blundering embarrassment and entered into conversation with him. George frankly told him the truth and expressed his readiness to work for a living if he could obtain employment. His new friend happened to be foreman of the government printing-office in the town, and he told George that if he really wanted a situation, he could obtain it the next day. Filled with penitence at recent exploits, Pentecost determined to settle down to habits of industry and sobriety.

For weeks this resolution was kept, his purse was replenished, and new acquaintances were formed. But he was led into the vortex again, and resumed his dissipated habits. He made the acquaintance of some politicians and through their influence he obtained a clerkship in the Supreme Court.

LIFE OF DISSIPATION.

His life, meantime, was growing more dissipated! Wine-drinking, card-playing, and revelry, were the round after the hours of work. He was nineteen years of age, and had been in the territory for nearly four years. Mrs. Pentecost removed in the mean time to Henderson, Kentucky, the home of her late husband's family; and having fallen ill, desired her boy to hasten to her bedside. He started immediately, and found her convalescent. Determining to remain with his mother to whom he was sincerely attached, he secured a deputy clerkship in the district court at Henderson, and formed new friendships among eminent lawyers and influential officials. He received numerous invitations to balls and parties, became a graceful dancer and acquired skill in the amusements of fast life. His bondage to liquor increased and he was often alarmed by noticing his powerlessness to resist the seductions of the glass.

SPECIAL SERVICES.

In the spring of 1860, the Rev. G. C. Lorrimer (now Dr. Lorrimer, of Chicago), conducted a series of services in the Baptist Church at Henderson. One evening, George, accompanied by a profane associate, went to the church, listened to the sermon, and, when he went home, felt himself strangely disinclined to make light of anything he had heard or seen, though he was not aware of any serious impression.

A LADY'S INFLUENCE.

On the following Sunday morning he went again to hear Dr. Lorrimer and noticed, on entering the church a young lady who was an intimate friend of his own. At the close of the meeting Mr. Lorrimer announced that he would preach that evening to young men. George accompanied his friend home, and the conversation revealed on her part a deep interest in the meetings, which called forth his raillery. He saw the young lady was pained, and changed the subject to the preacher's stirring discourses. These had awakened earnest thought and feeling, and the girl expressed a desire to hear the sermon announced for the evening, and George offered himself as escort.

A MEMORABLE SERMON TO YOUNG MEN.

When they entered the crowded church, young Pentecost was quite unconscious of the least interest in the preacher or his subject, but the moment Mr. Lorrimer announced his text (Eccles. 11:9) George's conscience was touched. In an instant, his past and present life so exactly depicted in those graphic words, were before him; he saw his whole career—long forgotten sins came back, like ghastly, grinning skeletons from their graves. Then he seemed to stand before the Great White Throne of Judgment, without excuse, a condemned soul. The next few days were a time of agony and darkness.

AT THE PENITENTS' BENCH.

On the following Wednesday George Pentecost saw clearly the way of salvation, and gave himself to Christ. He distinctly recollects, and often refers to, the following formula of his experience: "If God is satisfied with what Christ has done for me, I ought to be, and am." This clear revelation of the Gospel to the hitherto bewildered mind was made in a moment, as one opens the eyes on a landscape. The spiritual vision was raised from self to Christ.

With a glad, peaceful heart, he went forward at the meeting he was in and kneeled down, but not to pray; for near by was a young friend, to whom George began to explain the Gospel, telling how God in Christ had done all, that God had accepted Christ for us; that there was nothing to do but to rejoice and begin serving Him. This experience has been the key-note of his ministry—salvation by the simple acceptance of Christ.

COMMENCEMENT OF CHRISTIAN WORK.

Mr. Pentecost was asked to lead the meetings of young converts, and he soon became an active worker in the church. His venerable pastor and officers urged him to study for the ministry. After prayerful deliberation, and repeated consultations with his pastor, Mr. Pentecost was licensed, at the age of twenty, to preach the Gospel, meanwhile remaining in a law office, and leading the meetings of the new converts when desired.

In the autumn of 1861, he went to Georgetown, Kentucky, to enter the preparatory department of the college there, under the patronage of the Baptists, and at the end of the term became enrolled as a regular student. His college life was brief; he left it at the end of ten months, in June, 1862, with the expectation of returning the next September. God's providence, however, wrought a change of plan which affected the whole of his after life, and led through experiences which moulded and ripened his character for future usefulness.

In August, 1862, young Pentecost entered the army as a private in the Eighth Kentucky Cavalry and served until 1864 when he was chosen chaplain of the regiment, with the rank of captain. On his way to Louisville, to receive his commission, he called upon an old college friend, Rev. James Bent, of Georgetown, who besought him not to abandon the ministry, warning him of the peril of apostasy, and shipwreck for eternity. Upon reaching Louisville, it was found that the last military vacancy was filled. But he was promised a commission in a few days or weeks. But it did not come, and while waiting for it, Mr. Pentecost entered the law office of his former Sunday-school teacher who had become the Provost-Marshal-General of Indiana.

A PERILOUS RIDE.

One day Mr. Pentecost was riding on a thorough-bred horse, which he had used in the army, and which, taking fright, dashed away at furious speed. He was unable to check the mad career of the animal which became more unmanageable every moment. Being a good horseman, he did not fear, but felt annoyance that he could not stop the horse from dashing along one of the principal streets of the city. He drove his spurs deep into the horse's flanks, and giving him the bit, shouted with an oath, "Run, now, till you are satisfied." In an instant the rider was overwhelmed with remorse and shame, and borne by the foaming steed through the city, Mr. Pentecost was unmindful of everything except the bitterness of repentance, and upon reaching home, fell on his face before God, to implore forgiveness.

AN INVITATION.

While he was thinking of giving himself to more active Christian service, he received a letter one morning from the Baptist Church at Greencastle to go and preach to them, though they could guarantee him nothing more than his travelling expenses. After five months' labor at Greencastle, he received, in April, 1864, when he was nearly twenty-two years old, a unanimous invitation to become the pastor, at a salary of three hundred dollars per annum. He was living at the rate of two thousand five hundred dollars a year, and how could he think of living on one eighth of that sum? He had been married but a short time to an earnest Christian young lady and he laid the matter before his young wife, who, much to his surprise, said: "Fred, since October 6th, last year, when I married you, I have been looking forward to the time when you would be settled over a church, I don't care how small or obscure. I appreciate all you are doing for my comfort and pleasure, but I would rather live in one room, on a bare floor, if you would only preach the Gospel, than live in luxury in any other calling."

This speech from the gentle young wife, who had never known hardship or want, was like the voice of God to the undecided man. He felt that of a truth God had called him to the work of the ministry, but did not see how they were that, under the name of Tarshish, Great Britain is specifically noticed in Holy Writ. And not only so; for so many incidents in its career in the last days and during the Millennium are narrated that they read more like a record of past than an epitome of future events.

NAME AND LOCALITY OF TARSHISH.

The name of Tarshish first appears in sacred history in the pedigree of Japheth and his descendants. From Gen. 10 : 4, 5 it appears that one of his grandsons, named Tarshish, aided in colonizing "the isles of the Gentiles." He probably gave his own name to the territory which came into his possession. In accordance with the Hebrew rule in indicating geographical sites, we cannot doubt that wherever the city of Tarshish was planted, it was westward of the Holy Land.

The exact locality of Tarshish has caused much controversy on the part of biblical students. This has chiefly sprung from the difficulty which is found in reconciling 1 Kings 22 : 48 with 11 Chron. 20 : 36. For in the first passage it is stated that "Jehoshaphat made ships of Tarshish to go to Ophir;" while in the latter it is recorded that he "joined himself with Ahaziah, King of Israel, to make ships to go to Tarshish." In order to harmonize these conflicting statements, some commentators have suggested that there were two Tarshishes—one somewhere in India and the other lying westward of the Mediterranean. We, however, think that there is no real contradiction in the two passages, but that they may be thus reconciled; vessels of a very large tonnage were known to the Jews as "ships of Tarshish," with which city they usually traded, and by this name they were distinguished from vessels of lesser bulk, to whatever port they sailed.

KING SOLOMON'S NAVY.

We also read in 1 Kings 10 : 22 that King Solomon "had at sea a navy of Tarshish, with the navy of Hiram; once in three years came the navy of Tarshish, bringing gold and silver, elephants' teeth (margin), and apes and peacocks." As the three latter items have their birth in India, some have sought for Tarshish there. But Hales considers the ships of Solomon on this voyage proceeded westward to Cadiz on the Spanish coast, and from thence southward along the coast of Africa. He says that "this voyage might well occupy the navigators of that period during three years."

In addition to the suggestion that there were two Tarshishes, two theories are most prominent as to its locality. The first that we shall review is that suggested by the learned Bochart, and ably supported, among others by Sir Emerson Tennant in his "History of Ceylon." He says that "it seems probable that the long-sought-for locality of Tarshish may be found to be identical with that of Point de Galle. Bochart was not the first that rejected the idea of Tarshish having been a Phœnician colony situated at the mouth of the Guadalquiver; but he was the first who suggested that Tarshish must have been somewhere in the vicinity of Cape Cormorin." After mentioning the articles imported by King Solomon from Ophir, which he identifies with Malacca, he adds, "By geographical position, by indigenous productions, and by the fact that from its having been from time immemorial the resort of ships from Egypt, Arabia, and Persia, on one side, and India, Java, and China on the other, Galle seems to present a combination essential to determine the problem so long undecided, and to establish its own identity with the Tarshish of the sacred historians—the mart so long frequented by the ships of Tyre and Judæa."

THE THEORY OF BOCHART.

At the first glance at the proofs adduced, this theory would seem to be further supported by the fact that the ten tribes at last will be conveyed to Palestine by some unknown power (Isa. 18 : 1–7) "from beyond the rivers of Ethiopia." Whether by this phrase we are to understand eastern Ethiopia as it is restricted to Abyssinia, the nearest territory to Ethiopia after crossing the sea, is that which has for its boundary the River Indus, or in other words British India. So that, were Bochart's and Tennant's, and Dr. W. Smith's theory the true one, still Great Britain would be the prophetic Tarshish.

But three facts out of many serve to disprove this theory of Bochart and Tennant. The first is this: We necessarily infer from an episode in the history of that most self-willed and incomprehensible of prophets, Jonah: in order to escape from his mission to Nineveh, he (Jonah 1 : 3) "went down to Joppa (or Jaffa), and he found a ship going to Tarshish; so he paid the fare thereof, and went down into it, to go unto Tarshish from the presence of Jehovah." Now it is self-evident that he would not sail eastward, when by a westward voyage he would leave Nineveh far in the rear. Hence, wherever Tarshish was, we must look for it westward of Palestine.

TARSHISH WESTWARD OF PALESTINE.

Again, in Gen. 10 : 4–5, we find Elishah, or Elis, in the Peloponnesus, Kittim, or Cyprus, and Dodanim or Rhodes, connected with Tarshish in the list of the sons of Javan, by whom "the isles of the Gentiles were divided." We may presume, according to ancient custom (Ps. 49 : 11) that they gave their own names to their respective territories. If so, as it is improbable that an eastern isle would be inserted amid these western ones, even if the emphatic phrase "isles of the Gentiles" had not been selected to show the place they colonized, we cannot but conclude that Tarshish was located westward of Palestine, and hence we must look for its site in that direction.

But a still more important prophetic fact negatives the theory that Tarshish was an equivalent name for Ceylon or some other Asiatic city. The most cursory glance at the 48th Psalm will show that it refers to the period when Antichrist and his vassal kings will invest and be defeated at Jerusalem; for it says (ver. 4–6): "The kings were assembled—they passed by together; they saw it [i.e., Zion]; they marvelled; they were troubled and hasted away: fear took hold of them there, and pain as of a woman in travail." It then proceeds to say (ver. 7): "Thou breakest the ships of Tarshish with an east wind." Now, were the squadron sailing westward, the wind would be favorable; but, if sailing eastward on the Mediterranean, it would be in their teeth. We must, then, infer that the navy of Tarshish will sail westward to aid Antichrist when God destroys it as He did the Spanish Armada, not by human agency, but by fierce storms. Hence, wherever it is, we must look westward of Palestine for the prophetic Tarshish.

IS TARTESSUS THE PROPHETIC TARSHISH?

The second and popular theory, and which is warmly advocated by Calmet, Michaelis, Hales, Bredow, Eadie, and other biblical scholars, is that Tartessus, a city at the mouth of the river Guadalquiver, near the Strait of Gibraltar, is the ancient Tarshish. It was known to the ancient Greeks, not only as a great commercial city, but as a territory, and as such extending westward as far as the isthmus which separates Gibraltar from Spain, colonized by the Phœnicians (see Isaiah 33 : 6 and 12), who were of Hamite descent. Its colonists were celebrated, like their Tyrian ancestors, for their skill as navigators, so noted were they among both the Greeks and the Hebrews for their large and well-manned ships, that "the ships of Tarshish" became a common phrase to describe their navy—just, indeed, as we speak of the huge trading vessels to India and China as "East Indiamen," to distinguish them from ships of lesser tonnage. They traded so far west as Cornwall, bartering their products for its mineral wealth, so that Great Britain and the ancient Tarshish were commercially connected long before the Christian era. From its position, then, abutting as the territory of Tarshish did on Gibraltar, it may now be regarded as virtually British territory. Thus replacing ancient Tarshish, Great Britain may be regarded not only as the modern synonym for the Tarshish of prophecy, but as its legitimate heir.

Another link in the chain of proof which identifies Great Britain with the biblical Tarshish is supplied by those mineral products for which it was famous in Bible annals. Thus, in his requiem for Tyre, the most celebrated seaport in Bible times, Ezekiel says (27 : 12): "Tarshish was thy merchant by reason of the multitude of all kind of riches; with silver, iron, tin, and lead, they traded in thy fairs." It is scarcely needful to indicate how strikingly this portrays that mineral wealth which, for a series of centuries, has aided in making Great Britain the commercial emporium of the world.

THE NATIONAL SYMBOL.

Again, as supporting the theory that Great Britain is the modern Tarshish, we would point to the national symbol, the lion. Speaking of the "latter year" of this dispensation, when Antichrist will invade the Holy Land, Ezekiel says (38 : 8–13) that, "the merchants of Tarshish—with all the young LIONS thereof—will say unto Gog [or Antichrist], Hast thou come to take a spoil? Hast thou gathered thy company to take a prey, to carry away silver and gold, to take away cattle and goods, to take a great spoil." Now, of no other existing nation can it be said that its "merchants" so represent the dominant commercial spirit as to be the representatives of the nation, save England; for its (Isa. 23 : 8) "merchants are princes, whose traffickers are the honorable of the earth." And no other western nation has chosen the lion for its heraldic symbol, save the minor kingdom of Belgium, which is under the quasi-protectorate of Great Britain. Though, if it stood alone, this choice of the prophetic "lion" as its emblem might be regarded as a mere coincidence, yet, when it is added to the other proofs, it becomes a striking factor in the evidence, which finds in Great Britain the Tarshish of the "latter days."

THE PROPHETIC TARSHISH.

One other fact strikingly confirms the theory that Great Britain is the prophetic Tarshish—namely, the recent virtual incorporation of Kittim, or Cyprus, with its dominions. It is true that some geographers extend the word "Kittim" to the Greek islands generally, but the best ancient authority, Josephus, who, as a Jew, must have known what his kinsmen understood by the phrase, restricted it to the Isle of Cyprus. Of the few references to Kittim or Cyprus in the Old Testament, one only need be referred to. It is a striking one, for Cyprus and Tarshish are found connected together in the last days. Thus Isaiah says (33 : 1) "Howl, ye ships of Tarshish; for it (Tyre), is laid waste, from the land of Kittim it is revealed unto them." From the fact that when the modern or revived Tyre is destroyed, it is reported to the navy of Tarshish when it reaches Cyprus, we cannot doubt that there is some intimate connection between the two countries—such, in fact, as has existed since the virtual session of Cyprus to Great Britain in 1878–9. By this acquisition, England has now a chain of forts in the Mediterranean — namely, Gibraltar, Malta, and Cyprus—and thus it has such a mastery of that sea that the prospect of its ever becoming "a French lake," as Napoleon I. dreamt, is farther off than ever. Possibly the virtual possession of this direct route to the Holy Land will make its fleet so conspicuous in the time of Antichrist. For whether it resist or aid the great autocrat of the world, its naval powers will preponderate too much for any but a supernatural power to resist it.

From these facts, then (1)—the geographical position of Great Britain; (2) its commercial features, which so remarkably correspond with those of the biblical Tarshish; (3) the regal-heraldic symbol, the Norman and Scotch "lions;" and (4) its recent acquisition of Kittim or Cyprus—we think, accumulative as is the evidence, that we are justified in the conclusion that Great Britain is the heir of ancient Tarshish, with all its pre-recorded greatness, and all its predicted prominence in the last days of this dispensation, as well as during the Millennium.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Decrease in the Public Debt for May as analyzed by Mr. John M. Carson, clerk of the Committee on Ways and Means, is as follows: The month's decrease is less than $5,000,000, and for the eleven months closing May 31st, less than $120,000,000—as against a decrease in May, 1882, of over $10,000,000, and for the eleven months ending with May of last year of over $139,000,000. The aggregate reduction during the last fiscal year was $151,000,000, but for the present year, which closes with the current month, the reduction is not likely to exceed $125,000,000. This comparatively unfavorable exhibit is owing to the falling off in receipts from customs, which falling off will continue until July 1st, when the new tariff act goes into effect, and perhaps for several months after July. The silver dollars coined during the month were 2,350,000. They were deposited in the Treasury, as no one wanted them, and more of the cumbrous coins which had been forced into circulation were returned, making the present total lying unused in the vaults nearly $109,000,000. If the coinage is kept up at its present rate there is likely to be $125,000,000 thus stored at the end of this year.

The Ohio Republican Convention which, Assembled last week at Columbus, attracted unusual attention through the country, owing to the close contest expected in that State on political grounds and to the uncertainty as to the probable decision of the people on the liquor question. An effort was made to induce Senator Sherman to accept the nomination for governor, but that, for obvious reasons, Mr. Sherman promptly and firmly declined. Judge Foraker's name was then put before the convention, and he was nominated by acclamation. The platform adopted is a document showing no little astuteness, which will be read with amusement by citizens who are familiar with the course of State and National politics. It approves "the wise and conservative administration of President Arthur," and "attests the wisdom, care and economy of the administration of Governor Foster." It declares for "a tariff system which will provide a revenue for the government and protect American producers and American labor;" it approves Civil Service Reform without mentioning Senator Pendleton's bill, and favors the repeal of the law limiting the time for applications for pensions. It will be seen from these points that there has been no lack of effort to make the platform comprehensive. On the subject of Temperance, which is the most prominent of all in Ohio now, the platform thus states the Republican position: "Fifth, that we approve of the action of the General Assembly of Ohio in the submission of constitutional amendments in relation to the liquor traffic, thus giving an opportunity to the people to make such changes in the organic law of the State as may be approved by their judgment. Sixth, that we approve of the taxation of the liquor traffic for revenue and for the purpose of providing against evils resulting from such traffic." As will be seen the Republicans thus practically indorse the principles of the Scott law, the constitutionality of which is still before the courts.

The Iowa Democratic Convention Assembled at Des Moines on June 6th, and nominated the ticket for the coming contest. The nominee for Governor is Judge L. G. Kinne, of Tama, who two years ago ran as a Republican against Mr. B. R. Sherman; Mr. Justin C. Clarke is nominated for Lieutenant-Governor, and Walter I. Hays for Supreme Court Judge. The nomination of Judge Hays is regarded by Democrats generally as a mistake, his attitude on the prohibition question, it is thought, will involve either extensive scratching or a rejection of the whole ticket by Democrats favorable to temperance legislation. The platform favors the extension of the civil service laws to every department of the Government; arraigns the last Congress for its extravagance and demands economy; indorses a tariff for revenue only and a gradual reduction of protective duties; denounces the tariff legislation of the last Congress; opposes constitutional prohibition, and in the interest of practical temperance favors a well-regulated license law, with the penalty of forfeiture of the license for its violation.

The Coroner's Jury in the Case of the Brooklyn Bridge disaster on Decoration Day, express in their verdict the opinion of the public as to the responsibility of the trustees. On that subject they say: "We find the trustees and officers reprehensible in not having the bridge and its approaches properly policed, and particularly at the steps. Had this important matter received the careful attention of the managers of the bridge, to which it was entitled, the vast throng upon the structure would have been kept moving, and the panic, which resulted in the death of twelve persons, averted; and that the construction of the footway and steps is not of sufficient capacity for the accommodation of the foot passengers. The trustees should not pass this disaster over as a special dispensation and not likely to be repeated, but give their serious attention to the problem of making the promenade absolutely safe." It is to be regretted that the jury did not recommend the removal of the steps at both ends of the bridge, but they apparently preferred leaving details to the discretion of the trustees, while in the last clause of the verdict placing the entire responsibility upon them. With a very few exceptions the verdict of the jury is heartily indorsed by the people.

Mr. Richard T. Merrick of Counsel for the Government in the Star Route cases, concluded, on Friday last, his address to the jury. The speech, which occupied nine days in delivery, was an exhaustive analysis of this protracted case. It provoked frequent interruptions from the counsel for the defence, and has drawn forth a torrent of vituperation from the newspapers controlled by the accused. It may be hoped that the next few days during which Judge Wylie will deliver his charge will be followed by a decisive verdict, and that the country may not be put to the expense and humiliation of a third trial. The confidence freely expressed by the defendants in the issue of the trial does not encourage that hope, but rather indicates that the defendants have reasons, not generally known, for expecting a disagreement. The astonishment of the people has been caused during the past week by the intelligence from Washington of the startling fact that the Fort Diobrara and Deadwood Route has been let to John R. Miner, one of the Star Route defendants, with Vaile, another defendant, as his surety. It may be hoped that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General will be required to give an explanation of such a contract.

The Opium Dens of Philadelphia have been raided by the police, who were doubtless moved to their act by the revelations in New York. In one building two young women were found under the influence of opium, and a man, a minstrel performer, who had accompanied the women. They were taken in custody, together with the proprietor and three other Chinamen. The Chinese laundry in the adjoining building was also raided, and five Chinamen captured. No opium smoking was in progress at the latter place. The prisoners were arraigned, and the proprietor of the house was held in $1000 bail for keeping a disreputable house. The two women and the man were held in $600 each as witnesses, and the rest in $300 each to keep the peace.

The Burial of the Author of "Home, Sweet Home" took place in the Oak Hill Cemetery, Georgetown, on Saturday last. The coffin containing the remains of John Howard Payne has remained since it was brought from Tunis in the little chapel within the cemetery gate, but on Saturday morning, the anniversary of the poet's birth, it was placed in a hearse and taken to Washington. Thence later in the day it was taken to the cemetery for re-interment. The hearse was preceded by a military procession, soldiers of the regular and volunteer service with reversed arms, and bands playing funeral marches, and followed by carriages containing the President, the members of his Cabinet, representatives of the diplomatic corps, the Supreme Courts of the United States and of the District, and by Mr. Corcoran, to whom the removal is chiefly due, and many specially invited friends. The procession marched up Pennsylvania Avenue over to Georgetown, up the prettily shaded hillside to the cemetery, where under the monument erected to Payne's memory the remains were finally deposited.

The Plea for a Five-Cent Subscription to Aid in building a church at Smithville, Clay County, Mo., which was published in these columns on April 5th, has elicited many responses from the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Mr. Shafer writes that he has acknowledged by mail the receipt of all subscriptions in cases in which the senders gave their address. He desires us to express his thanks to others who gave no address. The friends at Smithville are still earnestly at work endeavoring to raise funds that their little church may be opened free of debt.

The Convention of Colored Men.—The Committee, of which Frederick Douglass is chairman, appointed to make arrangements for a national convention of the colored people of the United States, decided on May 23d to change the place for the proposed convention from Washington to Louisville, Ky. The convention will meet on the day previously agreed upon, September 24th, next.

Ten Dollars were Received at the Office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD last week from a lady who desired that acknowledgment should be made here of their receipt, but who wished that her name should not be published. They will be used in accordance with her wish, in defraying the cost of sending THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to ministers who cannot afford to pay a subscription. It is gratifying to the proprietors of the journal to find that God is blessing it and inclining the hearts of His people to aid them in placing it in the hands of those who through its means are assisted in their ministerial labors.

A Fetish in a New York Court last Week Failed in its function. Its possessor believed that it would preserve him from harm here and hereafter, but notwithstanding its supposed virtues the owner was convicted and punished. He was a sailor, and had been arrested for a misdemeanor. When he was searched in the station-house, a small piece of shrivelled skin and bone was found in his possession. He said it was the forefinger of the right hand of a dead friend, named John Brown. They had been shipmates together in a dangerous voyage, and at one time they were certain they would never return alive. The result of many conferences they held before the mast was that the survivor should detach the forefinger from the hand of the one dying first and carry it about with him as an omen of good luck. With this, acting as a fetish, they were sure one of them would escape all harm there and forever. They escaped on that occasion, but subsequently, when Brown died, his shipmate carried out the ghastly arrangement. No one would have supposed that in this age of enlightenment superstition so gross could have existed. Numbers of people, however, are, in trusting for their eternal welfare to their good works, or to Church ordinances, or the absolution of priests, relying on a hope as unworthy of confidence as the sailor's fetish (Jer. 3 : 23).

An Immigrant's Fatal Stupidity was Evinced on a steamboat on June 1st. As the steamer Rhode Island, of the Stonington line, was passing through Fisher's Island Sound on her way from New York to Boston, an unknown man, an immigrant, about twenty-five years old, jumped overboard. The captain at once ordered the steamer stopped, two boats were lowered, but after an unsuccessful half hour's search, the Rhode Island proceeded on her way. Early in the evening the man informed the steward that his family and friends were on the Fall River steamer, and he got on the Stonington steamer by mistake. He appeared crazed with grief. The steward tried to ease his mind by telling him he would reach Boston in time to meet his friends, but this had no effect on him, as he evidently believed he was separated from his friends forever and did not care to live without them. It is remarkable that the man could not grasp the idea that the two steamers had the same ultimate destination, and that if there were no accident he would meet his friends in the morning. Bereaved parents and husbands and wives might often reflect with advantage on this immigrant's folly. Only it is essential that they should be certain, before death separates them from those they love, that their destination is the same, and that the place where there will be no more partings (II Samuel 12 : 23).

A Panic in a Circus Caused some Consternation in Chicago, on June 7th. Barnum's show was exhibiting in the city, and the tents were completely packed, over 15,000 persons being present. The grand entry was being made, when one of the elephants, attached to a chariot, became frightened and went bellowing around the ring, dashing into the procession and smashing one or two of the chariots. To add to the confusion, one of the women charioteers abandoned her horses and they went dashing around the ring. The wild beasts, frightened at the uproar, began bellowing and beating the bars of their cages, and the rest of the elephants became frightened and unmanageable. The vast audience, composed largely of women and children, were greatly terrified and rose in their seats, and those near the exit made a rush for the outside. For a few moments a general panic and a fearful loss of life seemed inevitable, but the continued playing of the band reassured the frightened multitude somewhat, and the employés succeeded in getting the unruly animals out of the rings. Quiet was then restored. It is evident that but for the coolness of the musicians there might have been a fearful calamity in the circus, but the strains of music allayed the fears of the people. That was a beneficial use of the charms of music which seem to operate on the human mind more powerfully than any other agent. In that case, alarm was the chief thing to be feared, but there are cases, with which every gospel worker is familiar, in which alarm would be a welcome sign, but which is often unhappily allayed by the enchantments of Satan, and the sinner is lulled into a false security (Amos. 6 : 3-7).

A Romantic Marriage was Solemnized in New Orleans two weeks ago. A young officer in the French Army, who is visiting this country, went to Montreal last December, and called on the French consul there. During his visit he saw in an album the portrait of a young lady of remarkable beauty. He inquired her name and address, and learning that she resided at New Orleans, he thought nothing of the two thousand miles to be travelled, but set out immediately to seek her. On his arrival, he made the lady's acquaintance, and his admiration for the portrait quickly developed into love for the original. He proposed, and was accepted ; and on May 28th they were married. The Apostle Paul's use of the marriage relation as a type of the union between Christ and His Church is recalled by this romantic wedding. In that blessed union, however, it was the Bridegroom who was "altogether lovely," and though He came from heaven to earth to win His bride, she became complete and beautiful only in Him (Eph. 5 : 25-27).

The Value of a Boy's Leg, as Assessed by a jury in the New York Supreme Court last week is twenty thousand dollars. The boy who made the claim for damages testified that while playing ball on one of the piers he was knocked down from behind by the defendant's horse and cart, caught under the wheel and dragged about twenty feet, until the cart was stopped and he was rescued by a policeman ; he was taken to the Chambers Street Hospital, and after three months' treatment it became necessary to amputate his left leg in order to save his life. Upon this evidence the case was submitted to the jury, who, after brief deliberation, returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for twenty thousand dollars. Large as the amount is, the boy would doubtless have preferred retaining his limb, and it is very certain that few persons could be found willing to lose a limb for that or any other sum. It is remarkable, however, that unnumbered people while so careful of their bodies which must die are so careless of their immortal souls that they voluntarily place them in peril to win much smaller sums of money (Matt. 5 : 30).

A Steamboat made of Paper is the Latest novelty of American manufacture. It is being constructed at Lansingburg, N. Y., and is near completion. The Troy Times gives the following description of the strange craft : Its length of keel is twenty feet ; breadth of beam, five feet ; depth of hold, three feet ; length over all, twenty-four feet ; draft of screw, twenty-four inches ; length of shaft, eight feet ; weight without machinery, one thousand pounds ; seating capacity, twenty-five persons; carrying capacity, three tons. The boat was built in two sections and jointed on the keel. The sheathing, a solid body of paper, is three eighths of an inch in thickness. A bullet from a Smith & Wesson revolver fired at the sheathing from a distance of four feet neither penetrated it nor made an abrasion on its surface. Experiments have shown that it is impossible to soak or soften the hull or increase its weight by contact with water. Its motive power is a Westinghouse engine of about six horse-power, capable of making two thousand revolutions a minute, and guaranteed to give a high rate of speed. The inventors claim that life-boats, steam launches for ships, captains' gigs, and whale boats can be constructed by this process, which will have greater durability and less weight than at present. The astonishing feature of the new vessel is its being made of a material which in its best-known form is weak and fragile. If it proves all the inventors claim for it, it will be an illustration of the fact observed in the spiritual world that the weakest part of humanity often displays in times of temptation and persecution strength no one ever supposed they possessed (I Cor. 1 : 27, 28).

CHRIST IN YOU.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Christ in you, the hope of glory."—Colossians 1 : 27.

The Gospel a Hidden Secret—Revealed only by the Holy Spirit—Spiritual Dram-Drinking—The Mystery of the Gospel—I. Christ its Essence—In His Person—In His Work—In His Offices—A Visit to a Physician—A Variation in a Parable—The Essence in no Other—Nor in Christ's Gifts—II. Christ its Sweetness—Accepted by Faith—Possessed—Experienced—Reigning—The Siege of Mansoul—Filling—A Legend of a Garden—III. The Outlook of all This—Glory for Believers.

THE Gospel is the grand secret : the mystery of mysteries. It was hidden from ages and from generations, but is now made manifest to the saints. To the mass of mankind it was utterly unknown ; and the chosen people, who saw something of it, only perceived it dimly through the smoke of sacrifices and the veil of types. It remained a mystery which wit could not guess nor invention unravel ; and it must forever have continued a secret had not God in His infinite mercy been pleased to reveal it by the Holy Ghost. In a still deeper sense it is even yet a hidden thing unless the Spirit of God has revealed it to us individually, for the revelation of the Gospel in the word of God does not of itself instruct men unto eternal life : the light is clear enough, but it availeth nothing till the eyes are opened. Each separate individual must have Christ revealed to him and in him by the work of the Holy Ghost, or else he will remain in darkness even in the midst of Gospel day. Blessed and happy are they to whom the Lord has laid open the divine secret which prophets and kings could not discover, which even angels desired to look into.

Brethren, we live in a time when the Gospel is clearly revealed in the Word of God, and when that Word has its faithful preachers lovingly to press home its teachings, let us take care that we do not despise the mystery which has now become a household word. Let not the commonness of the blessing cause us to undervalue it. You remember how in the wilderness the Israelites fed upon angels' food until they had enjoyed it so long, so constantly, and so abundantly that in their wicked discontent they called it "light bread." I fear me that many in these times are cloyed with the Gospel like those who eat too much honey. They even venture to call the heavenly Word "commonplace," and talk as if it were not only "the old, old story," but a stale story too. Are not many hungering after novelties, longing for things original and startling, thirsting after the

of sensational preaching, dissatisfied with Christ crucified, though He is the bread which came down from heaven ? As for us, let us keep clear of this folly ; let us rest content with the old food, praying from day to day, "Lord, evermore give us this bread."

In our text we have in a few words that great mystery with which heaven did labor as in travail, that mystery which is to transform this poor world into new heavens and a new earth ; we have it, I say, all in a nutshell in the seven words of our text : the riches of the glory of this mystery may here be seen set out to open view—"Christ in you, the hope of glory." By the assistance of the divine Spirit, I shall speak upon this mystery in three ways. The essence of it is "Christ ;" the sweetness of it is "Christ in you ;" and the outlook of it is "the hope of glory." The words read like a whole body of divinity condensed into a line—"Christ in you, the hope of glory."

I. The eternal

MYSTERY OF THE GOSPEL,

the essence of it is Christ. I hardly know what is the antecedent to the word "which" here : whether it is "mystery," or "riches," or "glory ;" and I do not greatly care to examine which it may be. Any one of the three words will be suitable, and all three will fit best of all. If it be "the mystery," Christ is that mystery ;

"Without controversy great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh." If it be the word "glory," beyond all question our Lord Jesus wears a "glory as of the Only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth." Is He not "the brightness of the Father's glory?" If we take the word "riches," ye have often heard of "the unsearchable riches of Christ," for in Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. Oh, the riches of the grace of God which it hath pleased the Father to impart unto us in Christ Jesus! Christ is the "mystery," the "riches," and the "glory."

The essence of this mystery is CHRIST HIMSELF.

In these days certain would-be- wise men are laboriously attempting to constitute a church without Christ, and to set forth a salvation without a Saviour; but their Babel building is as a bowing wall and a tottering fence. The centre of the blessed mystery of the Gospel is Christ Himself in His person. What a wonderful conception it was that ever the infinite God should take upon Himself the nature of man! It never would have occurred to men that such a condescension would be thought of. Even now that it has been done it is a great mystery of our faith. God and man in one person is the wonder of heaven, and earth, and hell. Well might David exclaim, "What is man, that Thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that thou visitest him?" Does not the "Word made flesh" dwelling among men arouse hope in your bosoms, and lead you to believe that you may yet be saved? Certainly, the fact of there being such an union between God and man is the delight of every regenerated mind.

Our Lord's person is at this day constituted in the same manner. He is still God and man; still He can sympathize with our manhood to the full, for He is bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh; and yet He can help us without limit, seeing He is equal with the Father. Though manifestly divine, yet Jesus is none the less human; though truly man, He is none the less divine; and this is a door of hope to us, a fountain of consolation which never ceases to flow.

When we think of our Lord we remember with His person the glorious work which He undertook and finished on our behalf. Being found in fashion as man He humbled Himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. He took upon Himself the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of sinful flesh, because we had failed in our service, and could not be saved unless another did suit and service on our behalf. The heir of all things girded Himself to be among us as one that serveth. What service His was! How arduous! how humble! how heavy! how all-consuming! His was a life of grief and humiliation, followed by a death of agony and scorn. Up to the cross He carried all our load, and on the cross He bore, that we might never bear, His Father's righteous wrath. Oh yes, brethren, Christ's person and finished work are the pillars of our hope. I cannot think of what He is, and what He has done, and what He is doing, and what He will yet do, without saying, "He is all my salvation and all my desire."

My brethren, every one of our Lord's offices is a well-spring of comfort. Is He prophet, priest, and king? Is He friend? Is He brother? Is He husband? Is He head? Every way and everywhere we lean the weight of our soul's great business upon Him, and He is our all in all. Besides, there is this sweet thought, that He is our representative. Know ye not that of old He was our covenant head, and stood for us in the great transactions of eternity? Believers must and shall possess the covenanted inheritance because Jesus represents them, and on their behalf have taken possession of the estate of God. Whatever Christ is His people are in Him. They were crucified in Him, they were dead in Him, they were buried in Him, they are risen in Him; in Him they live eternally, in Him they sit gloriously at the right hand of God, "who has raised us up together, and made us sit together in the heavenly places in Christ Jesus."

Christ Himself, again I say, and no other. I have been trying to think what we should do if our Lord were gone. Suppose that a man has heard of a great physician who understands his complaint. He has travelled a great many miles to see this celebrated doctor; but when he gets to the door they tell him that he is out. "Well," says he, "then I must wait till he is in." "You need not wait," they reply, "his assistant is at home." The suffering man, who has been often disappointed, answers,

"I DO NOT CARE ABOUT HIS ASSISTANT.

I want to see the man himself; mine is a desperate case, but I have heard that this physician has cured the like; I must, therefore, see him. No assistants for me." "Well," say they, "he is out; but there are his books; you can see his books." "Thank you," he says, "I cannot be content with his books, I want the living man and nothing less. It is to him that I must speak, and from him I will receive instructions." "Do you see that cabinet?" "Yes." "It is full of his medicines." The sick man answers, "I dare say they are very good, but they are of no use to me without the doctor; I want their owner to prescribe for me, or I shall die of my disease." "But see," cries one, "here is a person who has been cured by him, a man of great experience, who has been present at many remarkable operations. Go into the inquiry-room with him, and he will tell you all about the mode of cure." The afflicted man answers, "I am much obliged to you, but all your talk only makes me long the more to see the doctor. I came to see him, and I am not going to be put off with anything else. I must see the man himself, for myself. He has made my disease a speciality; he knows how to handle my case, and I will stop till I see him."

Now, dear friends, if you are seeking Christ, imitate this sick man, or else you will miss the mark altogether. Never be put off with books, or conversations. Be not content with Christian people talking to you, or preachers preaching to you, or the Bible being read to you, or prayers being offered for you. Anything short of Jesus will leave you short of salvation. You have to reach Christ, and touch Christ, and nothing short of this will serve your turn.

PICTURE THE CASE OF THE PRODIGAL SON

when he went home. Suppose when he reached the house the elder brother had come to meet him. I must make a supposition that the elder brother had sweetened himself, and made himself amiable; and then I hear him say, "Come in, brother; welcome home!" But I see the returning one stand there with the tears in his eyes, and I hear him lament, "I want to see my father. I must tell him that I have sinned and done evil in his sight." An old servant whispers, "Master John, I am glad to see you back. Be happy, for all the servants are rejoiced to hear the sound of your voice. It is true your father will not see you, but he has ordered the fatted calf to be killed for you; and here is the best robe, and a ring, and shoes for your feet, and we are told to put them upon you." All this would not content the poor penitent. I think I hear him cry—"I do not despise anything my father gives me, for I am not worthy to be as his hired servant; but what is all this unless I see his face, and know that he forgives me? There is no taste in the feast, no glitter in the ring, no fitness in the shoes, no beauty in the robe unless I can see my father and can be reconciled to him."

Do you not see that in the case of the prodigal son the great matter was to get his head into his father's bosom, and there to sob out "Father, I have sinned?" The one thing needful was the kiss of free forgiveness, the touch of those dear, warm, loving lips, which said, "My dear child, I love you, and your faults are blotted out." That was the thing that gave his soul rest and perfect peace; and this is the mystery we come to preach to you—God Himself drawing near to you in Christ Jesus, and forgiving you all trespasses. A personal grasp of a personal Christ, even though we only know Him as an infant, fills the heart to the full; but nothing else will do it.

I go a little farther still. As it must be Christ Himself, and none other, it must also be Christ Himself rather than anything which Christ gives. I was thinking the other day how different Christ is from all the friends and helpers that we have. They bring us good things, but Jesus gives us Himself. He does not merely give us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption; but He Himself is made of God all these things to us. Hence we can never do without Him. When very ill you are pleased to see the doctor; but when you are getting well you say to yourself, "I shall be glad to see the back of the good man, for that will be a sure sign that I am off the sick list." Ah, but when Jesus heals a soul he wants to see Jesus more than ever. Our longing for the constant company of our Lord is the he who longs for Jesus to abide with him forever is healed of his plague. We never outgrow Christ; but we grow to need Him more and more. Not Thy gifts, Lord, but Thyself; Thou, Thou art the desire of our hearts.

Christ alone is enough. Mark this. Nothing must be placed with Christ as if it were necessary to Him. Some hold a candle to the sun by preaching Christ and man's philosophy, or their own priestcraft. We rejoice in Christ and nothing else but Christ; Christ and no priestcraft; Christ and no philosophy; Christ, and no modern thought; Christ and no human perfection. Christ, the whole of Christ, and nothing else but Christ; here lies the mystery of the Gospel of the grace of God.

II. Secondly, we are to consider the sweetness of this mystery, which is Christ in you. This is a grand advance. Christ in you—that is, first, Christ accepted by faith. Is it not that Christ Jesus should ever enter into a man? Yes, but I will tell you something more wonderful, and that is, that He should enter in by so narrow an opening as our little faith. There is the sun; I do not know how many thousands of times the sun is bigger than the earth, and yet the sun can come into a little room or a close cell; and what is more, the sun can get in through a chink. When the shutters have been closed I have known him come in through a little round hole in them. So Christ can come in through a little faith—a mere chink of confidence. If you are such a poor believer that you can hardly think of assurance or confidence, yet if you do trust the Lord, as surely as the sun comes in by a narrow crack, so will Christ come into your soul by the smallest opening of true faith. How wise it will be on your part when you see your Lord's sunny face shining through the lattices to say, "I am not going to be satisfied with these mere glints and gleams, I would fain walk in the light of His countenance. Pull up those blinds; let the heavenly sun shine in, and let me rejoice in its glory."

By Christ in you we mean Christ possessed. You see nothing is so much a man's own as that which is within Him. Christ in you is yours indeed. Men may question whether an acre of land or a house belongs to me; but the meat I ate yesterday is not a case of property which Chancery or any other court can alter. So, when the believer has Christ in him, the law has no more to say. The inclosure made by faith carries its own title-deeds with it.

It means, too, Christ experienced in all His power. There may be a valuable medicine that works like magic to expel a man's pains, and cure his diseases; but it is of no efficacy till it is within him! When it commences to purify his blood, and to strengthen his frame, he is in a fair way to know it without depending upon the witness of others. Get Christ in you, curing your sin, Christ in you filling your soul with love to virtue and holiness, bathing your heart in comfort, and firing it with heavenly aspirations —then will you know the Lord. Christ believed in, Christ possessed, Christ experienced, Christ in you, this is worth a world.

Moreover, Christ in us is Christ reigning. It reminds me of Mr. Bunyan's picture of Mansoul, when the Prince Immanuel laid siege to it, and Diabolus from within the city strove to keep him out. It was a hard time for Mansoul then ; but when at last the battering rams had broken down the gates, and the silver trumpets sounded, and the prince's captains entered the breach, then on a day the prince himself did ride down the city's streets, while liberated citizens welcomed him with all their hearts, hung out all their streamers, and made the church towers rock again as the bells rang out merry peals, for the king himself was come. Up to the castle of the heart he rode in triumph, and took his royal throne to be henceforth the sole lord and king of the city. Christ in you is a right royal word.

Yes, and then Christ in you is Christ filling you. It is wonderful, when Christ once enters into a soul, how by degrees He occupies the whole of it. Did you ever hear of a man whose garden produced nothing else but weeds, till at last he met with a strange foreign flower of singular vitality. The story is that he sowed a handful of this seed in his overgrown garden, and left it to work its own sweet way. He slept and rose, and knew not how the seed was growing till on a day he opened the gate and saw a sight, which much astounded him. He knew that the seed would produce a dainty flower and he looked for it ; but he had little dreamed that the plant would cover the whole garden. So it was : the flower had exterminated every weed, till as he looked from one end to the other from wall to wall he could see nothing but the fair colors of that rare plant, and smell nothing but its delicious perfume. Christ is that plant of renown. If He be sown in the soil of your soul, He will gradually eat out the roots of all ill weeds and poisonous plants, till over all your nature there shall be Christ in you.

It may sound strange to add that Christ in you transfigures the man till he becomes like Christ Himself. You thrust a bar of cold, black iron into the fire, and keep it there till the fire enters into it. See, the iron is like fire itself—he that feels it will know no difference. The fire has permeated the iron, and made it a fiery mass. I should like to have seen that bush in Horeb before which Moses put off his shoes. When it was all ablaze it seemed no longer a bush, but a mass of fire, a furnace of pure flame. The fire had transfigured the bush. So it is with us when Christ enters into us ; He elevates us to a nobler state ; even as Paul saith "I live, yet not I, but Christ lives in me." Jesus sanctifies us wholly, spirit, soul, and body, and takes us to dwell with Him in the perfect state above.

"Oh," says one, "I wish He would come and dwell in me." Then, be humble, for He loves to dwell with him that is humble and of a contrite spirit. Next, be clean ; for if they must be clean that bear God's vessels, much more they that have Christ Himself in them. Next, be empty ; for Christ will not live amid the lumber of self, and pride, and carnal sufficiency. Learn abundantly to rejoice in Christ, for he who welcomes Christ will have Him always for a guest. Jesus never tarries where He is not desired. If His welcome is worn out, away he goes. Oh, desire and delight in Him ; hunger and thirst after Him ; for Christ delights to dwell with an eager people, a hungry people, a people who value Him, and cannot be happy without Him.

III. Thirdly we are to consider that is "Christ in you the hope of glory." Think of it. Glory for us poor creatures ! Glory for you, sister ; glory for me ! It seems a strange thing that a sinner should ever have anything to do with glory when he deserves nothing but shame. We are neither kings nor princes, what have we to do with glory ? Yet glory is to be our dwelling, glory our light, glory our crown, glory our song. The Lord will not be content to give us less than glory. Grace is very sweet ; might we not be content to swim forever in a sea of grace ? But no, our Lord "will give grace and glory."

> "All needful grace will God bestow,
> And crown that grace with glory too."

We shall have glorified bodies, glorious companions, a glorious reward, and glorious rest.

But how know we that we shall have glory ? Why, first, He that has come to live in our hearts, and reigns as our bosom's Lord, makes us glorious by His coming. His rest is glorious ; the place of His feet is glorious. He must mean some great thing toward us, or He would never dwell in us. I saw a fine carriage stopping the other day at a very humble hovel ; and I thought to myself, "that carriage is not stopping there to collect rent, or to borrow a broom." Oh, no ; that lady yonder is calling round and visiting the poor, and I doubt not she has taken in some nourishment to an invalid. I hope it was so ; and I am sure my Lord Jesus Christ's carriage never stops at my door to get anything out of me : whenever He comes He brings countless blessings with Him. Such a one as He is, God over all, blessed forever, it cannot be that He took our nature, unless with high designs of love unsearchable. Thus we nourish large expectations upon the food of solid reason.

Besides this, Christ is He that has entered into covenant with God to bring His people home to glory ; He has pledged Himself to bring every sheep of His flock safe to His Father's right hand, and He will keep His engagement, for He never failed of one covenant promise yet. Moreover, this we do know, that the Christ who is come to live with us will never be separated from us. If He had not meant to stop He would not have entered our heart at all. There was nothing to tempt Him to come, and if in sovereign grace He deigned to live in the poor cottage of our nature, then, brethren, He knew what He was about : He had counted the cost, He had foreseen all the evil that would be in us and about us, and when He came, He came with the intent to stay.

Why, look ye, sirs,

CHRIST IN YOU IS GLORY.

Did we not show that just now ? "Lift up your heads, O ye gates, and be ye lifted up, ye everlasting doors, that the King of glory may come in !" You have heaven in having Christ, for Christ is the biggest part of heaven. Is not Christ the soul of heaven, and having Him you have glory ? What is more, having gotten Christ, Christ's glory and your glory are wrapped up together. If Christ were to lose you, it would be a great loss to you, but a greater loss to Him. If I can perish with Christ in me, I shall certainly be a fearful loser, but so will He, for where is His honor, where His glory if a believer perishes ? His glory is gone if one soul that trusts in Him is ever cast away. Wherefore comfort yourselves with this word, Christ in you means you in glory, as sure as God lives. There is no question about that. Go your ways and rejoice in Christ Jesus, and let men see who it is that lives in you. Let Jesus speak through your mouth, and weep through your eyes, and smile through your face ; let Him work with your hands and walk with your feet, and be tender with your heart. Let Him seek sinners through you ; let Him comfort saints through you ; until the day break and the shadows flee away.

ADVENTURE WITH A LEOPARD.

(See Illustration on page 380.)

IN a report issued by a missionary society a thrilling narrative is given of an adventure with a leopard in India in which Mr. Patterson, the eminent missionary was mercifully preserved from a shocking death.

The Rev. Mr. Patterson is missionary among the Santhals of India, and his earnestness and sympathetic kindness have won him the regard even of those who are most firmly opposed to Christianity.

One day several natives burst into his house with the news that a ferocious leopard was at large in the village. It had been seen lurking around the outskirts and the natives had raised a cry of alarm, when the leopard had bounded away and had taken refuge in a cow-house where it had turned at bay.

It jumped on to some tie beams on which the howdah of a car had been placed. Some ropes had been thrown into this howdah, and on these the leopard settled itself. The oxen and cows underneath, seeing their foe lying above their heads, were frightened. The farmer made much lamentation, thinking he was going to lose his cattle, but at last they ventured on opening the door and the cattle rushed out. The leopard, however, still kept his position, and they were unable to get at him with their bows and arrows, as a projection in the roof protected the animal. They could not burn the shed down because it would have endangered the village.

Mr. Patterson took his gun and went back with the men who had come to obtain his aid. He had to approach the cow-house very closely in order to get a sight of the animal. That involved considerable risk as the leopard might leap upon him at any moment. At length he sighted the brute, and taking careful aim he fired hitting him but not killing him. As soon as he fired the leopard sprang at him ; providentially it got its hind leg entangled in the rope and there it hung struggling to get at Mr. Patterson. Then he fired again inflicting another wound, but only after a third shot was it killed. Upon going into the shed they found the leopard still hanging up by one leg, and had to cut the cord to get him down. He measured six feet eleven inches from nose to the tip of the tail.

This instance of divine interposition furnishes another proof of the faithfulness of God. "The very hairs" of His servants' heads are numbered, and they are invulnerable to every danger, and delivered from every peril, till their earthly ministry is accomplished. As truly as He closed the hungry lions' mouths when Daniel was cast into their den, so did God save Mr. Patterson from the ferocity of the leopard, and his preserved life has been more than ever consecrated to the service of that Master, who is with His servants in every position to which duty summons them.

THE LATE ELDER ACHILLES COFFEY.

ON page 380 we publish a portrait of a veteran in Christian service, well known personally in the State of Illinois, where the bulk of his work was performed, and by reputation in all the Baptist churches throughout the country. Elder Coffey has but recently gone to his reward after a period of service covering the last half century. He died March 10th last, at the age of seventy-seven years.

Elder Coffey was by birth a Kentuckian having been born in Wayne County of that State, on July 30th, 1806. His parents continued to reside there for about six years after his birth, but when the war with the British broke out they removed to Indiana, settling in Jefferson County. The life of the family there was subject to many hardships and privations owing to the unsettled condition of the country and to the exactions of the enemy, and they therefore removed to Washington County and afterward made other changes without improving their financial position. Finally the better opportunities and prospects of life in Illinois attracted them and they removed there in 1822, making a permanent settlement in Saline County. There Achilles, then sixteen years of age, soon commenced to take an active interest in political, social, and religious affairs.

In 1832 came the Black Hawk trouble, and Achilles Coffey left the peaceful occupations of home life and joined the force sent out to repel the Indian incursion. He served with distinction in the campaign and returned safely at its close. The following year he made a profession of faith in Christ and was duly admitted to membership in the Baptist Church of Battle Creek. He at once commenced active labor in the Christian cause. In July, 1834, being then twenty-eight years old, he delivered his first sermon and in the following year, having proved his capacity and acceptance by fruits of his labor he received his license to preach.

It was in 1846 that on the invitation of the Baptist Church at Harrisburg, Ill., Elder Coffey settled in that town where he labored for thirty-seven years. Through all that long period he ministered with earnestness and unswerving fidelity, and the church increased in numbers and prospered under him. The messenger of death found him in the field, and when at last it became evident that his illness would terminate fatally, the old soldier of the cross was acquiescent. He had obeyed the call to labor; he was ready to obey the call to rest and reward. "I have finished my course," he said, "and am ready to be offered up." Scarcely had the words escaped his lips when he peacefully breathed his last.

Elder Coffey took a prominent part in the unhappy difficulties which arose among the Baptists of Southern Illinois and after the separation had become final he was selected by his brethren to prepare a statement of the causes which led to it and of the platform occupied by the Regular branch with which he identified himself. This history was published and had a large circulation.

MARION GREVILLE'S WEDDING-DAY.

(See Illustration.)

THE early sunrise of a midsummer day found the citizens of Goldville astir with unwonted animation. The ladies were busy clearing up and getting household work done up, and all neat and tidy, preparatory to donning the best dresses and little articles of finery which on ordinary days did not see the light. The children having undergone a vigorous scrubbing and hair-brushing had been turned loose in the gardens and lanes with emphatic warnings of what would happen if they came back "mussed," and the men-folks had received broad hints that they would do well to get breakfast over quickly and take themselves out of the way if they could not make themselves useful.

What was the meaning of all this stir? It was not Sunday, nor Fourth of July, nor Decoration Day, nor any day that the almanac marked as different from ordinary days. The fact was that Miss Marion Greville was to be married in the evening, and Mr. Greville being the greatest man in the village, and Miss Marion being his only daughter and a general favorite with every family, the event was not to be allowed to pass without notice. There were to be great rejoicings at the big house all day, and everybody was welcome to go and take part in them, and the children were all to have holiday and picnic in Mr. Greville's shrubbery, and spend the day in games as they liked, and in the evening all were to meet in the big hall and see Miss Marion married.

In the big house, too, preparations were going on for the ceremony. In the library the handsome presents were laid out for the guests to see, and they were well worth seeing, for they were wonderful specimens of the silversmith's work, and beautiful paintings and jewels and precious things of all kinds.

In the breakfast-room Mr. Greville sat waiting his daughter's arrival with some impatience. He was a tall, handsome man of about fifty-five years of age, of dignified presence and somewhat stern expression of countenance. Marion was his youngest daughter. All the others were married and scattered, and she too was now to go, and the house would lose its last and brightest ornament. At last she entered, and as her father looked at her she seemed indeed a daughter of whom any father might be honestly proud. Her dark curly hair, long eyelashes, and her sweet, gentle face formed a picture it was a pleasure to look at, and her tall, graceful form spoke of health and an active life. They sat down to breakfast in silence, the hearts of both being too full for speech. At last, however, Mr. Greville said:

"You will not forget me, Marion, when you go away and leave me here lonely and desolate?"

"Dear papa," Marion answered, "can you doubt me for a moment? I can never forget you. I am doing as you wish, and I hope it will make you happier."

"I know it, my child, but I hope you will be happy too. I feel sure you will. You have never known the hardships of poverty, and it would have been terrible to me to witness your suffering. You are a brave girl, and I am sure you will do your part well and thank me one day for what I am doing."

"Ah, papa, I would rather have borne the poverty and have lived frugally with you than have entered into this union, but it will comfort me to know that it brings help to you."

"My child, nothing else could save me. Drake cancels all my indebtedness to him to-day, and he has promised to be a good husband to you, and I believe he will. He has sown all his wild oats now, and you will find him a steady-going, domesticated husband."

No more was said then, but Mr. Greville had an uneasy feeling that he had sold his daughter for money, and that he was a selfish, craven-hearted man. He was giving his daughter to the wicked rake who held him in his power, and while she was going to a fate she loathed he was to enjoy the fruit of her sacrifice. Oh, it was a bitter thing to do, and though Mr. Greville tried to cheat himself into the belief that Marion would be rich and happy, he knew in his heart that the virtuous, Christian girl would be wounded every hour and that she had sacrificed herself for his sake.

As he sat and pondered over these things and reproached himself for the extravagance and carelessness which had rendered the sacrifice necessary to preserve his reputation and the honor of his name, Marion was strolling through the grounds to bid farewell to her humble friends. Not many steps from the door she met Widow Rose bearing a huge bouquet, while two little girls from her Sunday-school timidly offered her bunches of the choicest wild flowers they could find, and looked up anxiously in her face for the kind words of acceptance and love they knew would come.

"It is not much," said the widow, alluding to the value of her offering, not to its size, "but I could not let you be married, Miss Marion, and not bring you anything. It's unlucky to come in my mourning on your wedding-day, and I'd ha' stayed away if I could, and sent 'em to you, only I wanted to see you and say God bless you and make you happy. It's two years ago to-day since I was married, and a better, kinder husband no woman ever had." Tears choked the poor woman's voice as she added: "Poor fellow, he's better off now, but it's hard for me." Then the tears were quickly brushed away and the face brightened as she said, "If you have all the joy wished you, Miss Marion, by them as you've been good to, you'll be a happy wife."

Marion took the big bouquet with a full heart, knowing well that it was the token of more love and good wishes than were represented by many of the costly gifts in the library. "Thank you, Mrs. Rose," she said, "for the flowers and all your kind wishes. We cannot expect unalloyed happiness in this world, you know, but it is very pleasant to know you desire it for me and that so many friends love me. You will pray for me, will you not? I may need grace more than you know."

"That I will, miss," said the widow, "and so will a many more."

Marion stooped and kissed the little girls with their dear innocent, wondering faces, and then turned to receive another floral gift a servant had brought from a sick villager with simple congratulations. It was all very delightful, except the one sad, woeful thought crushing her heart that she was about to wed a man who was not a Christian and who could not sympathize with her in the best and most cherished feelings of her heart. Marion knew that she was sacrificing herself for her father's sake, and it seemed to her that it was her duty to obey him in this matter. She had not yet realized that she was disobeying God's command, and in uniting herself with an unbeliever she showed her lack of faith in Him.

Widow Rose's Wedding Gift.

The leave-takings were all said at last, and the ceremonies performed; then bride and bridegroom departed amid general congratulation on their way to the seaport whence they were to sail for Europe for their wedding tour.

Many years afterward a tall, graceful lady clad in deep mourning drove through Goldville to the house in which the wedding had been celebrated. Her face was prematurely aged, and her luxuriant dark hair was thickly streaked with white. She still moved with the same easy grace as in her youth, but the elasticity and buoyancy of youth had departed long before their time. This was Marion returning to the home of her girlhood now an empty and desolate house, and she a widow. What she had suffered she never told. That the harrow had passed over her soul was plainly written on her face. She had groaned under a bitter bondage, and had learned how much the human heart could suffer and yet not break. She had not even the comfort of knowing that she had delivered her father. Not many weeks after her sacrifice, wealth in abundance had come to him through the death of a distant relative, and if father and daughter had only waited and trusted in God the sacrifice need never have been made. Now after years of grievous pain and sorrow, her father dead, her husband destroyed in a fit of delirium by his own hand, she returned a weary, depressed woman to her early home, and to the enjoyment of riches that had no charm for her. As she passed the spot where on her wedding morning she had stood and talked with Widow Rose, the thought came to her of how many years of agony she might have been saved if she had only trusted in God instead of trying by her own efforts to deliver herself and her father.

PETER BLAKE'S VOYAGE.

A SERIAL STORY BY HESBA STRETTON.

Taken by Surprise.

ARTHUR PENROSE had vowed to himself to find out the truth concerning his father's dealings as a shipowner; but he was quickly entangled in a coil from which there seemed no clear way out. He was not yet of age, and had no legal right to push his investigations as far as he wished; while the executors of his father's will, old friends of his, assured him of his father's perfect integrity, and cast blame upon him as a son for suffering any doubts of it to linger in his mind.

Blackburn, the mate of the Dolphin, was ready to take his oath that he knew of nothing that would imperil the safety of the ship and her crew, and swore most emphatically that the cargo was not only fair but had been skilfully loaded, being neither too stiff nor too crank. Sailors, he said, always cursed the owner in any moment of danger or difficulty. Fleck asserted the same. If every timber of the Dolphin had been heart of oak, and every bolt in her of the best wrought metal, the crew would have sworn that she was rotten, and nothing else than a floating coffin. There never were such liars and scoundrels as seamen, said Fleck.

Arthur Penrose was only too willing to be assured of his father's honor, and his own right to the riches he had amassed; yet he could not shake off the deep impressions made on that terrible night, when the Dolphin, with most of her crew, had been lost before his eyes. Peter Blake's steady but mournful words, spoken with such manly earnestness to himself, in the very thick of the peril, could not be erased from his memory. Neither could Captain Norcott's passionate statement be forgotten; nor Blackburn's own admission, that if they ran ashore all the crew would desert. What was he to do? Whom was he to believe?

In the mean while Fleck's scheme prospered beyond his own hopes. Bessie Blake's removal from the sailmaker's house made him more secure in it; for if young Penrose should take it into his head to institute any inquiries on his own account, all he could learn was that Peter Blake's widow and children had left their former home. But Arthur Penrose trusted Fleck without suspicion. Fleck's wife, and her mother, and the two youngest children, clad in decent mourning, had been once to his house in Onslow Square, and had acted their part very well. Arthur Penrose found them less interesting than he had expected, but he regarded them with pity, and promised to allow them a pound ($5) a week, to be paid in advance every four weeks at the office in Wapping. This was more than Fleck had looked for, and he felt himself quite relieved from the necessity of going again to sea. It was a life that suited him well enough hanging about the wharf, and doing an odd job now and then, if he could get good pay for it, especially when he had overrun his allowance. It was really astonishing what a little way the ill-gotten money seemed to go.

As for Bessie, he never heard a word of her. She was as much lost as if, like her husband, she had been swallowed up by the sea. There were times when Fleck felt a little uneasy about her and the children, and he idly wished he could find some trace of her. He fancied that if he only knew where she was it would make him more comfortable to help her with a trifle occasionally, as the widow of an old shipmate. But Fleck was deceiving himself. The heartless selfishness and utter dishonesty of his conduct would have caused him to shun the sight of Bessie, and have hardened him against her misery, until he would have passed her by, if he had seen her starving in the streets. He did not feel quite a villain, while he could imagine that if he only knew where she was, she should share in the comforts he was robbing her of. It was a bitter, cruel winter, and the thought of her haunted him at his own fireside, which he seldom frequented, and followed him to the tap-room of the "Ship at Anchor," which was becoming the only home he cared about.

He was sitting there one evening in March, very much at home, smoking and drinking with boon-companions like himself. It had been a bitter day, too cold for him, he said, to dawdle about the river-side, on the look-out for work. It was warm and snug in the smoky tap-room, and he was in what he considered a comfortable stage of drunkenness, not yet top-heavy, nor quite half-seas over, but a little maudlin and confused. He was telling over again the story of the loss of the Dolphin and of his own rescue, with young Mr. Penrose, the wealthy ship owner, who had been his best friend since that terrible night. The tears stood in his eyes while he spoke of Victor, Peter Blake's young brother. Most of them knew Peter, poor Peter! he said, a good shipmate and a good seaman!

"Fleck!" said a deep, agitated voice in his ear, a voice he had never thought to hear again; "Fleck, do you know aught of my wife and children?"

Fleck was sober in an instant. He dropped the long pipe he held, and shrank away in sudden terror from the hand laid heavily on his shoulder. It was neither a dream nor a mistake. There stood his old shipmate whom he had believed to be at the bottom of the sea. True, for a few weeks he had not felt altogether safe, especially as the mate had been picked up; but it was four months or more since the wreck, and all fear had faded away from his mind. But here was Peter Blake himself; a living man, no ghost. Superstitious as he was, Fleck would rather have seen his ghost.

"Do you know aught of Bessie and the children, and my mother?" he was asking again, and giving him a shake this time to arouse him from his stupefaction.

"No—no," he stammered. "Peter Blake! Is it you, Peter Blake?"

"Ay! it's Peter Blake," he answered, "boatswain of the Dolphin. The old house at home is all shut up and dark, and I'm seeking for Bessie. I came ashore only an hour ago. Does anybody here know where Bessie Blake is to be found?"

Peter looked round him with a face of the deepest anxiety. Most of the men present had crowded round, and were staring at him, curious to hear what chance had saved him from the fate of the rest of the crew. Fleck himself seemed excited and curious; and there was a strange, though unmistakable, appearance of dismay in his crestfallen and thunderstruck manner.

"Maybe they'll know something at Penrose's office," suggested one of the bystanders.

"They know nothing about her there," stammered Fleck again, in haste. He was not ready yet with any fresh scheme, but he must keep Peter away from Penrose's office till he had found some loophole of escape for himself.

"I have heard say," continued the man who had spoken before, "that Penrose was doing very handsome by the crew of the Dolphin's folks, and he'd never overlook the boatswain's family."

"So he did," said Fleck; "he sent Bessie Blake some money by me, but she wouldn't touch it—no, nor look at it. She said it was like Judas's money, the price of innocent blood; and I was to tell Mr. Penrose so."

"Bessie had always a high spirit," said Peter, with a gleam of a smile flitting across his grave and anxious face.

"Ay! so she has—so she has!" agreed Fleck hastily; "but that settled it with Penrose; and the sailmaker failed, and Bessie left Wapping. I've searched high and low after her, for old sake's sake, but never heard a word of her nor from her."

"It's a hard thing," said Peter, looking round at the men, "to come back among old neighbors, and find that not one of them has had the heart to look after your poor girl and the little ones. I'd have done it for any of you, mates, whether you'd been shipmates or no. It's hard upon a man that's been cast away at sea!"

"It's a long while since the wreck of the Dolphin," muttered one of the men.

"Near upon eighteen weeks," answered Peter; "only eighteen weeks! and nobody can tell me where they are gone to! I'd have done my utmost for your wife and children, Fleck."

"She wouldn't have it," he said. "She cursed me, and him, and his ill-gotten gold. It's no good you going to Penrose's. I'll help you find 'em to-morrow; if they're in London, I'll ferret 'em out, trust me."

"Good-night, mates," answered Peter, turning away abruptly. He could hardly control himself. Was this the welcome home he was to get, after all his peril and anxiety? He had never been one to judge his fellow-men harshly; but he felt bitterly the carelessness and selfishness of his old neighbors, which had allowed them so soon to lose sight of his poor Bessie, and the three helpless creatures dependent upon her.

"Stay!" cried one of them; "tell us how you were saved from the wreck."

"I've no time to spin long yarns," answered Peter sternly. "I'd my life-belt on, and I floated till a Dutch brig picked me up. She was bound for the Cape, and to the Cape I've been, and came home again in the first boat that was sailing. That's about all my story."

He went out into the dark streets, as the keen biting air of the spring night was cutting bitterly. It had been a long and tedious voyage out to the Cape, and the Dutch brig had not spoken with any homeward-bound vessel; but as soon as they had got to harbor, he had written to Bessie, telling her of his safety, and promising to be at home as soon as possible—perhaps even before his letter could reach her. It had never crossed his mind that any unforeseen casualty could deprive Bessie of her dwelling under the sailmaker's roof. That she must have found it hard to get bread, he had known and grieved over; but to discover that she had actually been turned out into the streets was a shock almost more than he could bear. Where was she now? What shelter had she found from this pitiless cold? Who had cared for them all?

God had cared for them—he knew that very well. The God who had saved him in the utmost extremity of peril had not forsaken them. But Peter Blake did not believe that his peril, or the bitter trials he was dreading for Bessie, were any part of God's will. They had been brought about by the negligence, the covetousness, and the vile selfishness of his fellow-men. It was so bitter to him to think of it, that his heart felt weighed down with an intolerable burden.

Was this all that Christ had done in the world by His agony and passion? Had He been lifted up upon His shameful Cross that rich men and poor men should all go on in their own way, never raising their eyes to Him, who saved others, but would not save Himself? Yes; God cared for His dear ones; but if man had not cared also, they had been drinking the same cup of sorrows of which the Saviour had drunk before them.

As he passed by the police-station, he turned in to make some inquiries there. There was not much to be learned except that his mother had been seen embarking on a steamer to Havre, and that his wife and children had left Wapping immediately afterward with a good cart-load of furniture. If Bessie had disposed advantageously of such of the furniture as she could spare, she would have made enough money by it to keep herself and the children from absolute want. That was the first gleam of comfort that had shone upon Peter since he had seen his old home shut up and deserted. His poor mother had gone back to her native place, and she would be easily traced. No doubt, too, she would know where Bessie was. As soon as he had seen old Penrose, he would cross over to Normandy.

Fleck knew that he was no longer to lie at anchor in still water, but that he was about to be driven to and fro upon a sea of troubles. His brain had been in too bewildered a state to suggest to him that he must not lose sight of Peter, until he had formed some new scheme, or come to some determination. As soon as he recovered his wits this oversight struck him sharply, but he could not meet with Peter Blake, though he spent half the night in searching for him.

As soon as Penrose's office was open the next morning, Peter presented himself to ask for the address of Mr. Penrose. That another man belonging to the crew of the Dolphin should turn up again was not altogether welcome to Blackburn, the reputed owner, who had also been manager for Penrose. Of all the doubtful transactions in which old Penrose had been engaged, that of the Dolphin had been the most knavish, and had been the only one positively fraudulent.

The sight of the Dolphin boatswain caused the well-remembered salt swindle to weigh heavily on Blackburn's conscience that morning. He wished heartily that the past could come back again, and he could undo what had been done. Fleck was a man easily disposed of, if he attempted any nonsense; but he could not look into Peter Blake's face without a qualm of terror. On the whole, he thought it would be best to give him Arthur Penrose's address, without appearing to make any difficulty about it.

It was still early enough in the day for Arthur Penrose to be at breakfast when Peter Blake reached his home. There was no delay in admitting him. The old servant, as soon as he heard his name, dragged him into the hall by main force, and across it to the door of the room where his young master was breakfasting, which he flung open, and, pushing his visitor before him, cried out exultingly, "Here he is himself, Mr. Arthur; here's Peter Blake. There's another of 'em saved; all the crew will come back, one by one; and you'll be all right again."

Peter Blake's surprise at this reception was increased tenfold by Arthur Penrose's excitement when he saw him. Old Penrose's son, whom he had thought lost in the shipwreck, was grasping his hand in both of his, and shaking it heartily again and again, though he could not utter a word. Peter himself could not command his voice to speak.

"Thank God!" cried Arthur Penrose, at last, "thank God! I'll take heart again now. Your wife has not seen you yet, Blake?"

"No," he answered, "she has left the old place, and I cannot find her."

"She's here," exclaimed Arthur Penrose, joyfully, "at this very instant—in this very house!"

"Here!" he repeated, "here!"

"Yes, here," he went on. "I've taken care of her; she has not known any want; and this very morning she, and your children, have come with some little petition. They are waiting to see me now."

"Here!" cried Peter again. He had not known how heavy a load of care had been weighing him down until now it was removed. The tears stood in his eyes as he shook Arthur Penrose's hand in his turn, giving it such a grip as he had never felt before. "Thank God!" he said, in his inmost heart, though the words did not rise to his lips. "Hadn't somebody better break it to her?" he said, with a tender anxiety; "she's been mourning me, and the joy maybe would be too great for my poor girl. The children won't feel it, little creatures! but Bessie—"

"Old Simmons is breaking it to her," answered Arthur Penrose, "or I am very much mistaken. They are down-stairs having breakfast; and Simmons will listen to Fleck's yarns all day long."

"Fleck!" exclaimed Peter.

"Yes," he replied, "he has been a true friend to your wife, Blake. In fact, I have not seen much of her, but he has attended to all her necessities, and taken care of her for me. He came with her this morning, and is waiting down stairs."

"Fleck!" repeated Peter.

REVIEW OF THE QUARTER'S LESSONS.

S. S. Lesson for June 24, Golden Text, I. Peter 11 : 15. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Foolish Ignorance Answered—God's Answer in the Life—God's Epistle—In Early Times Legible—Simon's Incongruity Easily Seen—Spurious Experience Passes Current—The Coming Ordeal—Philip's Prompt Obedience—The Called Worker Misunderstood—How to Know when God Calls—Paul Like-minded—Peter also Obedient—The First Missionary Meeting—The Call of the Holy Ghost—Paul's Standard of Soul Value.

"FOR so is the will of God, that with well doing ye may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men." Disputation is not authorized by God, He has a stronger resource than that of argument, the life of Christ manifest in our mortal bodies: suffering long and yet kind where others resent the smallest injury; free from envy where others are slaves to it; not puffed up or vaunting ourselves where others are always sounding their own trumpet; not self-seeking where others live for self alone; not easily provoked where others cannot endure the smallest provocation; thinking no evil, while others are busy in plotting it; whose joy is not in iniquity but in the truth; who bear all things against which others fret; believe all things which others doubt; hope all things about which others despair; endure all things which vex and worry others; this life, not contrary to, but above nature, this divine life, is to "the ignorance of foolish men." As Jesus, our beloved Lord and Head is the Word which was from the beginning, so we are called to be His language, His voice, His message to the world: "Ye are manifestly declared to be the epistle of Christ, ministered by us, written, not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God;" "known and read of all men" (2 Cor. 3 : 3, 2).

In the early Church the writing of God's epistle was legible and distinct; the characters were so bold and clear that every one could read God in these holy men. It was this very presence of Christ in them which made it impossible for an unprincipled man like Simon the sorcerer to remain among the faithful, the truth would out, and the real aim of his life to be "some great one" manifested itself. Although the circumstances of his life were altered, and the object which he sought after was spiritual, it was nevertheless only for self-exaltation and self-glory; and Peter looking with the all-seeing eye of Christ, said to him, "Thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter, for thy heart is not right in the sight of God." Simon was no "epistle of Christ," he was altogether an epistle of self, and as such, could not pass current in that day of pure Christianity. Simon, instead of Christ was manifest in his mortal body, and his conversion could not pass current with the apostle Peter. Alas in this day the most will pass; men who lay some hold of the fact that their sins are forgiven, and who yet manifest anything than Christ — selfishness, pride, envy, self-seeking, impurity in their mortal bodies, yet pass as converted men, if they can only pray and preach. But the day is coming when "every man's work shall be made manifest; for it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is" (1 Cor. 3 : 13), and when every man also shall himself be tried. "What is the chaff to the wheat? saith the Lord" (Jer. 23 : 28). There is every appearance of breakers ahead in the political world; uncertainty, almost terror, reigns already in some hearts, and if, as is probable, violent persecution breaks out against Christians who live the life of Christ, only those who have real spiritual stamina will stand firm for God; the Lord take full possession of His people!

Again, in the case of Philip and the Ethiopian, we find Philip not only ready to testify the moment the Spirit called upon him, but also fully willing to leave his sphere of labor in Samaria, even when the blessing was at its height, and he himself was God's chief instrument in the work. Here was the "well doing" of our Golden Text, the immediate readiness to do the will of God without the smallest reference to his own predilections. It is no difficult thing to be willing to labor for the Lord when all is victory, and success is crowning our labors, when souls are being won continually to Christ, and the whole atmosphere is one of joy and praise, when multitudes are hanging on our lips, and it seems as though we should carry all before us. But it is quite another matter to hold on patiently when everything seems to turn against us, when our loved converts turn back again to the world, when among those who have consecrated themselves to the Lord, bitterness and strife break out, and all we say is wrested and misunderstood, and the ill-doing of others is laid at the door of our teaching. It is in circumstances such as these that we have the privilege, with to put to silence the ignorance of foolish men. Or in circumstances similar to those of Philip, to be quite willing to leave the press of work which seems as though it depended on us, and just retire into the desert, a nothing and a nobody, at the very time when those who have been blessed through us, tell us we are indispensable, and look upon our leaving them as an unpardonable selfishness; when really it is God Himself who calls us.

Some Christian workers say,

HOW AM I TO KNOW

it is the Lord who calls? Are you under authority? Then take the decisions of those under whom you work as from God, leaving all the responsibility to Him. If in obedience to Him, you have placed yourself under them, then you may cast on Him all responsibility as to the consequences of obeying them, and even if they err in judgment, you may trust Him to overrule it, provided only that they do not call upon you to go contrary to the written Word of God. Philip being thus right with God, doing well in the secret of His presence, had power, not in one kind of work only, but in all to which he was called; whether amid multitudes in Samaria, or with one anxious soul alone in the desert. The Lord give to those of us who work for Him a like spirit.

Again, we find Saul of Tarsus a man like-minded, different in character, his circumstances very unlike, and yet from the very first of his career by well doing putting to silence the ignorance of foolish men. This was manifest first toward God in his unconditional surrender, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" and his immediate obedience to the first expression of the will of God, in allowing himself to be led into Damascus by the hand, probably of some fellow persecutor, who must himself witness Saul's submission to be taught, blessed, healed, and baptized, through the means of one of the very men whom he had come to persecute. Nature would have said, "Do it quietly, don't make any stir," but "well doing" in the sight of God was to obey, obey instantly, implicitly, and at any cost, because the command was from God. In the same spirit he preached there and then in the synagogues that Jesus was the Christ. Equally with Philip, Saul set aside his own thoughts and plans, and allowed himself to be guided like a little child; and thus there was about him that irresistible power which made his presence felt wherever he was.

Our narrative next resumes the history of Peter, and here again we see the same entire surrender and

UNQUESTIONING OBEDIENCE.

Speaking under orders as he did, there was nothing rash or venturesome in his declaration to the sick man at Lydda, "Æneas, Jesus Christ maketh thee whole, arise and make thy bed." It would be rash for anyone to imitate Peter, and without any contact with, or knowledge of the thoughts of God, to go and say to every invalid of his acquaintance, "Jesus Christ maketh thee whole," just as it would be rash for any evangelist to go to every sinner whom he met with, and say to him, "Your sins are forgiven." We may indeed say to every sinner, "Jesus has died for you, and made a full atonement for your sins; turn your back upon them and receive Jesus," and just as fully, we may say to every sick person, "Jesus has taken your infirmities, and borne your sicknesses, turn from your own thoughts, and ways, and plans, and give yourself over unreservedly to Him, receiving Him as your Healer and your health."

Peter went on at the command of God, to raise the dead, and not rashly, but still under orders to the Holy Ghost, he said to the dead, Tabitha, arise. In his faith and obedience there was the "well doing." This is yet more evidenced in his readiness to learn how narrow he had been in thinking to confine salvation to the Jews; and on learning something of God's larger heart, in his willingness to set out at once on a preaching excursion to the Gentiles. Thank God, the stone once set rolling did not stop, and glorious fruit among the Gentiles was gathered to the Lord. And how signally that Lord owned the disciple who was so ready to own Him; neither prison doors nor chains were found sufficient to restrain a man whom Jesus would have to be at liberty, and the same God who thus released Peter caused his persecutor Herod to be eaten of worms and die. This was not the Herod who beheaded John the Baptist, but his cousin.

In the account of

on record, we see the same "well doing;" first in relation to God, and then as regards men. The Church gathered at Antioch in Syria, although perhaps in those days the most important company of believers except the church at Jerusalem, did not dream of choosing workers for either home or foreign missions. They responded to the call of the Holy Ghost to come apart for prayer, and in the time of holy quietude before God the Holy Ghost spoke and said, "Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them." There was no consultation either as to their gifts, their convenience or aught else; immediate obedience left all the consequences with God.

In these two men again we find the same "well doing." Sent forth by the Holy Ghost, they had Him as their Pioneer, and needed no other; difficulties there might be, and there were, but the angel of His presence saved them; whatever God willed, they willed. Thus when Elymas the sorcerer withstood them, Paul called in the present power of God, and the man was silenced; there was no opposition of man to man, Paul preached not himself but Christ Jesus the Lord, and he used each opportunity to manifest Christ's power, not his own. In his many encounters with opposing Jews, who were in those days, as great though not as diabolical disturbers of religious meetings as the skeleton army in our own days, we never read of Paul losing patience; he waxed bold, but only to speak for God, as one under authority, declaring His counsel and in no way defending himself personally. Paul he knew that eternal issues were at stake with every one of them, he knew by experience what life was without God, and he knew the difference of a life in God, and for God; and then he could have some faint idea of what it must be to live eternally without God; and he was ready at His call to venture anything in order that souls might be rescued from such an irremediable lot. Led as always by the Holy Ghost, he and Barnabas were as ready to abide long time with the disciples at Antioch in Syria, as they had been to labor among their beloved heathen. Thus their life as much as their doctrine preached Christ, and overcame opposition. Lord, revive such times and raise up such workers.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Appointment of Lord Lansdowne to the Governor-Generalship of Canada has called forth a protest from Irishmen in Canada and in the English Parliament. One of the Irish members, Mr. O'Donnell, who represents Dungarvan, gave notice on June 7th that he wold move that the appointment of the Marquis of Lansdowne as Governor-General of Canada was calculated to excite grave discontent both among the free Irish Canadians and the oppressed Irish in Ireland, who look upon the appointment as in no sense a conciliatory movement on the part of the Government. The cause of the opposition is that Lord Lansdowne is an Irish landlord, and has been made the subject of attacks for the management of his estates. It is a fact, however, that although he owns 95,000 acres in Ireland, the rental he charges is but fifty cents an acre a year. The hostility to him is chiefly caused by the fact that he has opposed the sub-division of the holdings. They are now scarcely large enough to support the tenants, and he has refused to consent to their being divided, especially in cases when a man gives his daughter in marriage and seeks to establish his son-in-law on the same property and in the same cottage. The correspondent of the Tribune states that Lord Lansdowne is a man of considerabble administrative capacity, and that his appointment is generally approved.

A Suspension of American Commerce with Turkey appears likely to ensue. The Porte recently informed General Wallace, the United States Minister, that the commercial treaty between Turkey and America would terminate on March 13th, 1884. The Turkish tariff expired on the same date of the present year. After the termination of the treaty the importation of all American meats, lard and similar produce will be prohibited. The Porte has virtually increased the duties on spirits by compelling their storage at Smyrna. It also maintains its demand relative to the storage of petroleum. It is stated that during the sitting of the Conference, the Turkish minister informed the delegates that the Porte was desirous of making a new tariff on the basis of an eight per cent ad valorem duty, but the Powers objected on the ground that the tariff was not alterable until the expiration of the commercial treaties. The Porte pointed out that this was impracticable, as the treaties expired on various dates. Almost all the ambassadors recognized the validity of this argument, and consented to appoint delegates to effect an arrangement of the tariff.

A Letter from the Czar to President Arthur had been written, according to a cable dispatch, to the New York Herald, expressing His Majesty's thanks for the courtesy shown in specially accrediting Minister Hunt to represent the United States at the coronation, and also to express His Majesty's gratification at Admiral Baldwin being sent on board the American frigate to attend the grand ceremony. M. de Giers concludes by saying it has been particularly agreeable to His Majesty to see this mark of consideration from a nation "united to Russia by bonds of traditional friendship."

Light on the Situation in the Far East has been thrown, by the Secretary of the Chinese Legation at Washington, who, in an interview with a reporter of the Herald last week, stated that there was no doubt that if France should refuse to recognize the sovereign protectorate of China over its dependency of Annam, hostilities would be inevitable; that while the cause of quarrel was strictly between the Annamise and the French, China could not afford to permit any interference of France, even if countenanced by the King of Annam, the vassal of China, and would interpose at all hazards. For this purpose the Viceroy Li had already been ordered to take command of the Chinese troops and a Chinese fleet ordered to Tonquin. He also remarked that although foreign nations had been accustomed to believe in the impotency of the Chinese as a warlike people, she had made rapid improvements in the modern arts and sciences and great progress in the art of warfare. It must be remembered, he said, that China is a different nation to what it was fifty years ago. They have now all the modern improvements in rifles, muskets, light and heavy artillery, mortars, shells, etc., besides well-drilled troops. Besides this France having no near base of operations as Russia or England would have, must necessarily fight at a disadvantage.

Rumors of Queen Victoria's Serious Illness continue to arrive, and though the English press in some cases contradicts them, there is reason to believe that there must be a foundation for them. The London correspondent of the Boston Herald, who asserts that he derives his information from "a member of the inner court circle," cables to his journal that severe dropsical symptoms had set in, and that the Queen's condition was considered so unsafe that her doctors all protested against the present journey to Scotland. The only reason that caused the doctors to assent to her removal was the fact that the inability of Her Majesty to get about since she hurt her leg has minimized her out-door exercise. This has been most sadly missed, but it was thought the fresh air of Balmoral would in a great degree make up for it. The immediate result of this cessation of out-door life has been fit after fit of serious depression. This melancholia has frightened the doctors, and, added to the internal morbidity of her system, is causing all who have knowledge on the subject to anticipate, at a no very distant date, fears of the Queen being confined a confirmed invalid to her bed.

The Irish Invincibles are Charged with Poisoning by the informers. It is now rumored that the Invincibles have been extensively using poison in removing obnoxious persons. The police are investigating a number of cases of suspicious death which have occurred in the past few years, especially the case of a hotel keeper named Jury, of Dublin, who died a fortnight after the Phœnix Park murders. From disclosures by the informers, the authorities do not doubt that Jury was poisoned. The reason alleged for the poisoning is that he inadvertently opened a letter addressed to Tynan, who was staying at Jury's hotel. Jury discovered that the letter contained directions in regard to a secret society. Fearing the vengeance of the members of the society, Jury destroyed the letter. A waiter, however, informed Tynan that Jury had received a letter for him. It is thought that Jury's "removal," was then decided upon.

The Black Hand Society of Spain, a Secret organization analagous to the Nihilists of Russia and the Invincibles of Ireland, is charged with assassination. The trial has commenced at Xeres of seventeen members of the Society, who are charged with murdering an associate whom they suspected of betraying the secrets of the organization to the government. The Public Prosecutor, in opening the case, claimed that he would submit evidence sufficient to secure the execution of sixteen of the prisoners.

The Last of the Phœnix Park Murderers, "Tim" Kelly, was hanged in Kilmainham Jail, on Saturday last. There was a larger crowd outside the prison on the occasion than at any of the other executions, except Brady's. This was mainly due to the sympathy felt for Kelly, who was only nineteen years of age, and was subject to epileptic fits. He was tried three times before a verdict was reached, the jury in two trials disagreeing. Strong efforts were therefore made to obtain a commutation of his sentence. They were, however, without avail; the fact that Kelly had actually taken part in the stabbing shut him out from any chance of mercy. Carey, the informer, stated that Brady in giving him an account of the murder had told him that when he had "finished Lord Frederick Cavendish" he turned round and "saw Tim at work on Mr. Burke's body." The other informers also stated that in such cases the actual work was left to Brady and Kelly. Now that the last of the assassins is dead, it is well that the men in America who seem anxious to follow their example, should understand that the five men who have been hung were betrayed by their comrades, and convicted on the evidence of a man who directed the crime. Whatever may be said of the Nihilists and other secret societies, Irish plotters are traitors to each other.

An Egyptian Incendiary was Hung on the scene of his crime on Saturday. The trials which took place after the burning of Alexandria resulted in the conviction of Suleiman Daoud, an important ally of Arabi Pasha, who was charged with having assisted in firing the city. An urgent appeal was made to the British Premier on Friday by several members of Parliament to telegraph the Khedive, requesting a stay of proceedings, and a leading conservative declared that the execution was being carried out in order to silence the charges Suleiman brought against the Khedive. Mr. Gladstone finally declared that Suleiman had been fairly tried, and was undoubtedly guilty, and he should therefore decline to interfere on his behalf. He added on Lord Dufferin's authority, that the charges made against the Khedive of conniving at the outrages were unfounded. As the English did not interfere, Suleiman's execution was carried out. He had to be almost carried to the scaffold, and he was nearly comatose from fright before he was finally hanged. Some persons who were present at the execution say that he died before the drop fell. On his way to the place of execution the condemned man murmured that he had been victimized by Arabi Pasha.

The Czar of Russia appears Resolved to maintain the rigor of his government. The London News correspondent at Berlin says the Mayor of Moscow has gone to his estate in Tambow, or, in other words, has been banished, for having expressed the hope in his speech at the banquet to mayors of cities during the coronation festivities that the Czar would institute a constitutional régime. The correspondents sent by English journals to describe the coronation complained on their return of the mutilation of their dispatches and the scrutiny they were subjected to. It was absolutely useless to write anything that did not tell of glory, harmony, and love of the people for the sovereign. One who had written a long letter, in the hope of getting it to London by post, cut it in two and mailed the parts to two different friends at different addresses. Only two sheets of it arrived.

Dr. Joseph Parker, the Eminent Pastor of the City Temple in London, has been elected Chairman of the Congregational Union of England and Wales for the ensuing year. He received 665 votes out of 981. The position is a very honorable one, and it has been a matter of surprise that it has not before been tendered to a minister whose talents and culture have rendered him one of the most popular Congregational ministers in Great Britain.

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman (London), for June, may be obtained at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, price six cents, postage paid.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

In the province of Posen, in Prussia, and about thirty miles from the Russian Polish frontier, the traveller will observe a rather old-fashioned but charming little town, surrounded by lakes, mountains, and dense forests. The town nestles in a complete valley, and a splendid bird's-eye view of the whole spot may be obtained from the adjoining hills, bringing into prominence the school-house and synagogue, where many young Jews have been brought up under the laws of Moses, educated and trained according to the Talmud, and finally prepared for a useful trade or profession. This is the place where Solomon Cohen, the father of Gustavus Cohen, had his home. There in 1853 Gustavus was born. Here he received his education, which consisted of Hebrew, German, Polish, and Russian. Here is the place where, as a leader against rival schools, he fought his battles as a boy.

It is related of him that, though not by any means the eldest boy in the school, he succeeded in carrying off all the principal prizes, and very soon became the recognized leader of his comrades. The school being Lutheran, it was naturally regarded by the boys of the Roman Catholic schools with strong party feeling, which not unfrequently culminated in a serious affray between the rival parties, at which it was the delight of Gustavus, combative even as a boy, to take an active part.

JEWISH CONFIRMATION.

When Gustavus had reached the age of thirteen he was, according to the Jewish custom, prepared for the Bar Mizvah, or confirmation, after having undergone which ceremony a boy is supposed to become responsible for his own sins and actions, which have previous to the ceremony been regarded as resting on the parents. The doctrine is so thoroughly believed by orthodox Jews that a mother will often fast and offer atonement for the transgressions of her son. There is no race which expends so much care and thought on the moral training of the young, as the Jewish, nor any in which the virtues of industry, sobriety, and chastity are more strenuously inculcated.

Gustavus Cohen was of an enterprising, inquiring turn of mind. He inherited from his father, who belonged to an old family of Cohens (priests), a sceptical incredulous temperament; his mind was ever restless, and he yearned for experiences in the world of which he had read and heard at school.

A TRAGIC SCENE ON A BRIDGE.

When between thirteen and fourteen years of age he, in company with a school-fellow, ran away from home. They soon encountered hardship; and hunger and cold soon reduced the comrade of young Cohen to a faint-hearted condition. Surely no scene more characteristic of the dramatic and grotesque forms occasionally assumed by boyish life, than that which was enacted on an old bridge spanning a rapid river, could possibly be imagined. It was here, in the centre of this bridge, that the weaker lad of the two made a stand, and declared to young Cohen that he would go no farther, and announced his resolve, not having the means to return home, to end his life by shooting himself. The desperate youth accordingly produced a loaded pistol, which had been his constant companion since he had decamped; but his strength and determination failed him, and he handed the pistol to Gustavus, entreating him to do the deed. The boy, however, was no murderer; he regarded his companion as a coward, and being himself possessed of a determination and courage which no hardships could conquer, he flung the pistol into the rushing waters, and determined to struggle on alone. (The scene is depicted on the left-hand side of the frontispiece.)

WANDERINGS FOR TWO YEARS.

With a generous impulse he sold everything he had, including even a spare shirt, in an hotel, to Hungarian pedlars, and handing the proceeds to his companion, bade him return at once. After this, for two years, young Gustavus, dependent only upon his own efforts, tramped through parts of Germany, Poland, Russia, Austria, and Bohemia The vagrant life in one so young had its disadvantages, but it gave to the boy a self-reliance and self-dependence which were of use to him in later years. At the end of two years of strange experiences the boy returned to his home, drawn there not by desire for ease, but by love for his mother. His father had died during his absence, and his mother and friends, and more especially his godfather and godmother, who according to Jewish custom were especially held accountable for his future, determined that he should enter upon a useful profession. After a number of vicissitudes, it was resolved to finally dispose of him by sending him to relatives in business in England. Gustavus obeyed, and at the age of eighteen years he commenced work in the factory his brother and other relatives were running in Birmingham.

Before he had been in his new sphere many months he had by close application and study mastered every detail of the business, and was in a position to undertake the sole management of the large factory. Still, he was dissastisfied; for, although he made money, he spent it quite as rapidly, and he saw no good results arising from his work. By this time he had learned the English language, and made a great many friends among the young Englishmen of his acquaintance. Being of a very sociable, agreeable, and sympathetic nature, with a fund of anecdote drawn from his strange experiences while tramping through Europe, a penniless boy, he found a multitude of delighted to listen to his stories, to drink his wine and smoke his cigars, and accompany him in Sunday excursions. With good financial prospects, plenty of ready money, and abundant friends and amusements, Cohen was not disturbed by the possibility of future sorrow, or the consideration of his sinfulness before God. Judaism, as he had been taught it, he regarded as an exploded system of ceremonials, and Christianity, judged by the character of those of its professors whom he knew, he despised.

A CHRISTIAN EMPLOYER.

Having still the old boyish love of change of scene, he left his associates and his brother's factory and went to Nottingham, where he undertook the management of a wholesale clothing manufactory, and having a thorough knowledge of the business, he succeeded in winning the confidence and esteem of his employers. He again made money, and again was surrounded by a clique of friends as gay and thoughtless in character as his old acquaintances. The principal of the firm was a Christian gentleman, who, an abstainer himself, urged all in his employ, especially the chiefs of departments, to follow his example. Gustavus Cohen had heard nothing of temperance and did not like the idea of giving up his wine and ale, and whenever the principal broached the subject, his invariable answer was that he was temperate, but that if at any time he found that drinking interfered with his business, or that he was becoming a drunkard, he would abandon the habit. No arguments could induce him to become an abstainer, and the Christian employer, who was deeply interested in his young manager, prayed for him, believing finally that his prayer must be answered.

Herr Cohen was at this time living among people who were also fond of the social glass, and he was encouraged to have a barrel of beer in the cellar, cases of wine sent home, and hospitably entertain his friends. It was a respectable home, as there are many respectable homes of the same kind. There was no thought of the future or of anything but making the present time enjoyable. Theatres, concerts, operas, balls, occupied his leisure time, and his thoughts were chiefly devoted to dress and amusement, when he was not in business.

AN IMPORTANT CHANGE

was, however, impending. Repeated excesses had preyed upon his mind and wrought upon a constitution which, although healthy and active, was never robust, and after one night of exceptional dissipation with his youthful companions, he awoke the following morning more than usually serious. The recollections of the whole misspent night passed before him; he knew that he had been intoxicated, and that he had been seen in that condition by people whose respect he valued. Overcome by a deep sense of shame, he at last resolved to become an abstainer, and going to his Christian employer the same morning, told him of his resolution. Not many hours passed away before which the grace of God enabled him to keep unflinchingly. When his companions discovered what he had done, they thought it was only the impulse of momentary weakness; but despite every artifice and temptation they placed in his way, he remained firm to his good resolve. The people at whose house he was living expressed their surprise, and tried to induce him to return to wine and beer. They salted his food, and provoked an unnatural thirst, and tempted him in every way; but they only induced him to leave them for another home more congenial to his new and higher tastes.

HE SIGNED THE PLEDGE,

And what of his companions? When they, after waiting patiently, discovered that he was firm, they jeered at and deserted him. Subsequently they did not scruple to impute to him mean motives, and even to circulate slanderous reports about him. And these were the men with whom he had spent the choicest hours of his youth, upon whom he had squandered his money, and whom he had believed his friends. It is a common experience, but it was novel to young Cohen as it is to every one who makes the discovery in his own person.

A CHILD'S EVENING PRAYER.

When, for the reasons described, he left his boarding house, he took up his quarters in the house of a Christian gentleman to whom his principal recommended him. Deeply hurt by the diffidence and desertion of all his late companions, his sensitive nature became doubly susceptible to tender influences. On one of the first few evenings that marked his new career in this home he happened to be present in the room when the little daughter of his host prayed at her mother's knee just before bed-time. She concluded her simple little prayer by "God bless mamma and papa and Mr. Cohen, for Christ's sake." The Christian child in her simple and beautiful way, in her innocent babyhood, praying for him, the despised Jew! (The scene is illustrated in the frontispiece picture.) He was deeply moved. Surely such a religion must be very beautiful.

He expressed his astonishment to the father when the child had retired, and the result was a series of long and earnest conversations on the subject of Christianity, which culminated in the conversion of Herr Cohen. He was induced first of all to attend a place of worship; then to read the Bible, which he studied deeply; the Holy Spirit flooded his mind and heart with light and conviction, and he became an earnest and devout believer. That involved a painful experience, as young Cohen well knew it would. But he had counted the cost, and did not draw back. What followed is best related in Herr Cohen's own words, spoken in the course of a public address before a Christian audience. Describing

he said: "When I parted from my mother her direct divine interposition. For we learn, from Rev. 8 : 9, that when the second apocalyptic angel sounds his woe-trumpet that "a third part of the ships in the (Mediterranean ?) sea will be destroyed." This prediction applies to all vessels, but specially to Tarshish ; for we read (Isa. 3 : 12–16), "the day of Jehovah shall be on all the ships of Tarshish." Nor are we left in any doubt as to the agency which will be employed by God to "bow the haughtiness of man." For an inspired penman reports (Psa. 48 : 7), "Thou breakest the ships of Tarshish with an east wind." Then, as the navy of England sails westward on its godless mission, it will be met by that euroclydon, or Levantes, to which vessels on the Mediterranean are so much exposed, and it will be wrecked and submerged by the whirling gulf.

REFUGEES FROM ANTICHRIST.

But, happily, after this terrible national collapse, there is grace in store for the heir of ancient Tarshish. It would seem that a remnant at least of its inhabitants will escape that guillotine, which will slaughter wholesale the none-worshippers of Antichrist or His image ; (see Rev. 13 : 15, 16 ; 20 : 4). These will probably obey Christ's injunction (Matt. 24 : 15–18). "When ye see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, then let them which be in Judea flee into the mountains." Though this command primarily applies to those who are in the Holy Land, it includes the principle of escaping if possible from the oppression of Antichrist everywhere. If so, we may well infer that, like the woman who will bring forth the man-child, to rule the nations (Rev. 12 : 6), they will be safe guarded by God, for the three years and a half of the supreme rule of the Man of Sin.

During this period not only will they be protected, but fed ; for God has promised that (Isa. 33 : 16), "His place of defence shall be the munitions (stronghold) of rocks ; bread shall be given him ; his waters shall be sure." Again it is possible that a large number of the reserve gathered at Megiddo (Rev. 16 : 16), while Antichrist and his allied ten Kings invest Jerusalem may be included in his forces, not voluntarily, but solely through that conscription which threatens to become the universal law throughout the Roman world. They, therefore, will not be voluntary supporters, much less worshippers, of Antichrist, and so will be comparatively guiltless. It is this section of the Roman army, doubtless, to which Isaiah refers (66 : 19), "I will send those that escape of them unto the nations—to Tarshish, Pul, and Lud, that draw the bow, to Tubal, and Javan ; to the isles afar off, that have not heard My fame, neither have seen My glory, and they shall declare My glory among the Gentiles."

We also learn from Scripture that the navy of

TARSHISH WILL BE FOREMOST

in conveying to their fatherland the long-exiled ten tribes. Isaiah was directed to indicate this important fact in two distinct prophecies—one indefinite, and the other so specific as to leave no doubt as to the nation intended. Thus in Isa. 18 : 1–7, we find an address to some maritime nation which lies "beyond the rivers of Ethiopia"—the analogue of which we have found in British India. To this honored nation he says, "Go, ye swift messengers (steam vessels ?), to a nation scattered and peeled, to a people terrible from their beginning hitherto ; a nation meted out and trodden down, whose land the rivers (Gentile nations) have spoiled." As a result of obedience to this injunction, we find that this unnamed nation will "bring a present unto Jehovah of hosts of a people scattered and peeled," to the place of the name of Jehovah of hosts, the Mount Zion—a restored and rebuilt Temple of Jerusalem.

But what Isaiah first reports in enigmatical terms as to the Gentile nation, who shall be thus honored in bringing the welcome "present" of restored Israel to the Lord in Jerusalem, he afterward indicates in unmistakable language. Thus we read (Isa 60 : 9), "Surely the isles shall wait for me, and the ships of Tarshish first (and foremost) to bring thy sons from afar, their silver and their gold with them—unto the name of Jehovah thy God, and to the Holy One of Israel."

We may infer that this prediction chiefly concerns those lost ten tribes, who people the wilds of Central Asia. For we learn from Zech. 13 : 11–13, that the tribes of Judah, Benjamin, and Levi, will be in Jerusalem when it is invested by Antichrist. We also learn (Isa. 66 : 19–20), that the remnant of the spared Gentile forces, will penetrate into Javan or Arabia, Tubal or Circassia, and Lud or Asia Minor. These will "bring all your brethren for an offering unto Jehovah out of all nations upon horses and in chariots, and in litters, and upon mules, and upon swift beasts—to My holy mountain, Jerusalem."

HOW WILL THIS MISSION BE COMMENCED ?

This honorable mission of the Tarshish navy to convey home the Iraelitish "remnant" will, we infer, spring from the national conversion of Great Britain, through the preaching of the Gospel of Messiah's glory, by the spared Gentile forces of Antichrist. For we learn from Isa. 66 : 19 and 20, that it is after the Gentiles who escape God's terrible judgments at Megiddo, and in the valley of Jehosaphat, have "declared Christ's glory among the Gentiles," that "they will bring the Jews as an offering unto Jehovah to 'His holy mountain' in Jerusalem."

Nor is this the last time that we hear of the alliance of Tarshish with restored and converted Israel. If there is anything which does not admit of two opinions respecting unfulfilled prophecy, it is this—that the representatives of the spared Gentile nations will keep the chief latter-day Hebrew festival in Jerusalem. This striking fact is recorded by Zechariah, who says (14 : 16) that 'It shall come to pass that every one that is left of all the nations which shall come against Jerusalem, shall even go up from year to year, to worship the King Jehovah of Hosts, and to keep the feast of tabernacles." We may assume that such homage will be rendered by their representatives, as it would be impossible for all the Gentiles to keep the feast in the holy city. This, in fact, is implied by the language of Isaiah who writes (14 : 32), "What shall then one answer the MESSENGERS of the nations ? that Jehovah hath founded Zion ; and the poor of His people shall trust in it." Hence wherever a British embassy is sent, there is England, so whoever are delegated to represent Great Britain at the feast of tabernacles, they will virtually be England.

THE GENTILE EMBASSAGE TO JERUSALEM.

Nor are we left in any doubt as to the reasons for this Gentile embassage to Jerusalem. For Messiah will visibly reign there, in fulfilment of the divine promise recorded by Isaiah and repeated by the angel to Mary, (compare Isa. 9 : 6, 7, and Luke 1 : 32, 33). It is to this period that Jeremiah doubtless referred when he wrote (3 : 17) : "At that time, they shall call Jerusalem the THRONE of Jehovah ; and all nations shall be gathered to the name of Jehovah, in Jerusalem."

Nor will the representatives of the Gentiles come empty-handed to Jerusalem to keep the feast of tabernacles. This Isaiah reports of the Gentiles at large, when he says of Abyssinians, and Ishmaelites, and Midianites "The wealth (margin) of the Gentiles shall come unto thee—they shall bring gold and incense—they shall come with acceptance on My altar ; and I will glorify the house of My glory" (see Isa. 60 : 5–7). But this fact that the Gentiles generally shall not come empty-handed to King Messiah is specially stated of Great Britain ; for we read (Ps. 72 : 10), that "the Kings of Tarshish and of the isles shall bring presents," or free-will offerings, to the King of kings.

For many generations, long indeed before the birth of our Lord, the Jews chanted the Great Hallel, or song of thanksgiving—which included the 113th to the 118th Psalm—at the feast of tabernacles. Though we would not urge the opinion dogmatically, we think it is probable that the Gentile delegation, as well as restored Israel, will find in these consecrated Psalms a fitting expression of the universal praise at this ancient festival. Never, indeed, will the Hallel have been sung on so glorious an occasion. For as 5 : 24 of the 118th Psalm says, "This is the day which Jehovah hath made ; we will rejoice and be glad in it." This Psalm was repeatedly applied by Christ both to Himself and to this period ; see (Matt 21 : 42 ; and Isa. 23 : 39). And there is no Hebrew commentator who does not intimate that for its fulfilment we must wait till the times of Messiah. Well, then, may the great Hallel be sung at the feast of tabernacles, during the Millennium, for (Cor. 2 : 17), "the DAY will break and the shadows flee away," which have darkened this earth for nigh six thousand years.

THE "FEAST OF TABERNACLES."

And here it may be intimated that the feast of tabernacles may possibly replace the Lord's Supper, during the Millennium. Precious as is the rite which so strikingly speaks of Christ's substitutionary work and of His second coming, we know that is only of temporary observance, and that it will cease when the King returns, and when again (Zech. 14 : 4), "His feet stand upon the Mount of Olives." This fact is intimated by the Apostle Paul, who says (Cor. 11 : 26), "As oft as ye eat this bread and drink this cup, ye do show forth the Lord's death, TILL He come." With a present Lord, this rite of remembrance will be no longer necessary ; but as personal homage will still be required, the feast of tabernacles, held as it will be in Jerusalem, will give the fitting opportunity in the very presence of the King.

It is thus seen that whether Tarshish is honored to convey to their fatherland the long-exiled Jews, or observe the feast of tabernacles in the presence of Messiah—that its idolatrous commercial spirit will cease, and all its activities be of a religious character.

BRITAIN'S INTEREST IN THE JEWS.

If we are right in our exegesis, and Tarshish is but a synonym for its heir, Great Britain, we may infer that the promise attached to those who obey God (Ps. 122 : 6), and "pray for the peace of Jerusalem—they shall prosper who love thee," is as true now as it will be in the Messianic age. For no people is so interested in Jewish conversion as are the British. Take away, indeed, the societies for Jewish evangelization for which Great Britain is so remarkable, it is not too much to affirm, that little would be done by other nations to save that "remnant according to the election of grace" (Rom. 11 : 5), which existed in the apostolic age, and which has been so brilliantly illustrated by Neander in our days. Nor need we fear that this care shown by Tarshish for His covenant people will be forgotten or unrewarded at the winding up of this dispensation. For the principle which God enunciated to Abraham (Gen. 11 : 3), "I will bless them that bless thee," and which Balaam in the spirit of prophecy extended to the whole Hebrew race, especially in the "latter days" (Num. 24 : 9)—is as true now as when it was first uttered. And, if there were any doubt about the question, the fact that Tarshish or Great Britain will be chief in the restoration of the Jews to the Holy Land, these predictions of Isaiah would settle the question.

The Lord hasten the gladsome day, for then the whole world—Gentile as well as Jew—will be ruled by King Messiah ; and the promise given to Abraham nigh 4000 years ago, be fully realized (compare Gen. 22 : 18, and Gal. 3 : 16)—"In thy seed (Christ) shall ALL the nations of the earth be blessed." Well, then, might David when as a prophet, he foresaw the benign sign of his divine descendant, burst into this rapturous choral (Psa. 72 : 18-19), "Blessed be Jehovah God—the God of Israel—who only doeth wondrous things ; and blessed be His glorious name forever ; and let the whole earth be filled with His glory. Amen, and Amen !"

CURRENT EVENTS.

General Crook's Return from his Expedition against the Indians in Arizona was officially reported on June 12th. The general was then at Silver Creek, Arizona, having with him 383 prisoners including six Mexicans who had been captured and held by the Indians. His report states that after crossing the Mexican border on May 1st, he pressed forward by forced marches for two weeks, and on the 15th the Chiracahua stronghold was discovered and surprised in the heart of the Sierra Madre Mountains, while many of the warriors, under Chief Juh, were absent. Nearly all the Indians, including six chiefs, were captured, a large amount of stolen property was seized, and the village was destroyed. Some of the Indians who had escaped surrendered after the fight. Chief Juh with his band of about 250 warriors are believed to be in Arizona, and General Crook after delivering over his prisoners proposes to go in pursuit of them.

The Acquittal of the Star Route Defendants on Thursday last is regarded throughout the country as a shameful miscarriage of justice. Not one person in a hundred who followed the evidence, arrived at the same conclusion as the jury did. To ordinary, unbiassed minds, the proof of conspiracy and of identity of interest among the defendants appeared incontrovertible. It was also a significant fact that the counsel for the defence directed his efforts, not to proving his clients' innocence of the charges, but to abusing the prosecution, a mode of defence which is always a sign of a weak case. Beside that, one of the men, whom the jury have pronounced innocent, actually admitted his guilt on oath. By what process the jury arrived at their verdict, in consistency with the oath they had taken, has not been disclosed. The responsibility is theirs, and it is a serious one, for it may reasonably by feared that the moral tone of the community will suffer by their act. The defendants may be innocent as the jury say, even Rerdell may have perjured himself in swearing he was guilty, but that is not the general opinion. Rightly or wrongly, the public draws the inference from this trial that with the possession of wealth and the assistance of powerful friends, gigantic crimes may be committed with comparative impunity; that, as a matter of fact, the penniless thief who steals a loaf to save his child from starvation is very likely to go to prison, while the millionnaire who steals dollars by the hundred thousand will be set at liberty amid clapping of hands. That is a baneful lesson to inculcate, and one that the public cannot learn without detriment to the best interests of society. When the government sent to the court and offered one of the defendants, then upon his trial, another star route contract, they voluntarily incurred the grave responsibility of confirming the bad moral.

Another Indictment Against Brady, the Defendant in the late Star Route trial, was brought on Saturday by the Washington Grand Jury. It charges that on July 13th, 1880, the defendant made a contract with J. B. Price to carry the mail on the route from Socorro, New Mexico, to Silver City, and back seven times a week on a schedule of thirty-five hours from August 1st, 1880, to June 30th, 1881, for $41,582, and that on November 3d, 1880, the contractor paid General Brady $1250 as compensation for awarding the contract. The witnesses are John A. Walsh, J. B. Price, Joseph Cochran and J. W. Brady. This is not, like the trial just concluded, a charge of conspiracy; it is a charge against Brady of taking a bribe during his term of office as second Assistant-Postmaster-General. The contract, which is the basis of the trial, was awarded without competition.

The Ohio Prohibitionist Convention Assembled at Columbus on Thursday last. It agreed on a platform and nominated a full State ticket. Ferdinand Schumacher received the nomination for Governor, and H. T. Ogden for Lieutenant-Governor. The platform adopted condemns the policy of both Democrats and Republicans. The delegates in their resolutions denounce the policy of personal liberty advanced by the Democrats and the policy of taxation embodied in the Scott and Pond laws passed by the Republicans; also, the Republican measures repealing the Sunday law and the law prohibiting drinking on the premises. They condemn the taxation proposition of the constitutional amendment, and favor the adoption of a prohibitory clause. Public opinion is divided in the State as to the probable effect of the action of the Prohibitionists. There appears to be a general impression that the Prohibition ticket has no hope of success, but while some politicians believe that it will draw away from the Republican ticket sufficient votes to insure its defeat, others believe that it will as seriously injure the Democratic prospects. It is said that many Democrats desire the restriction of the liquor traffic, but not its prohibition, and that they, finding the Republicans in opposition to the Prohibitionists will prefer the Republican to the Democratic ticket. The Democratic Convention to be held this week is anticipated with some anxiety by all parties.

The News that N. L. Dukes had been Shot down by the son of Captain A. C. Nutt at Uniontown, Penn., on Wednesday, June 13th, excited general gratification, owing to the widespread knowledge of the case of which this slaying was the sequel. Dukes had maligned in a peculiarly mean way the character of a girl who is said to be virtuous, and when her father expostulated with him he had shot the naturally indignant man without warning. Dukes had been tried and acquitted to the indignation of his fellow-citizens, and afterward, meeting the son of the man he had murdered on the street, he had laughed at him with shameless and exasperating effrontery. It is not, therefore, surprising, that when the fact that young Nutt had shot Dukes was announced, there was a chorus of approval of the act. The general unanimity does not, however, prove that the shooting was right, and there is a danger lest that inference should be drawn from it. Young Nutt is a murderer, and his act a crime. Society cannot with safety delegate to any man the right to shoot a man who has done him or his family wrong. If this young man is released without punishment, as is likely, the lesson will be inculcated that there are cases in which murder may be honorably committed, and in a community in which the practice of carrying concealed weapons is prevalent, and is increasing, that is a dangerous lesson to teach. No one outside of the circle of his relatives and friends regrets the death of Dukes—the world is the purer for his leaving it—but all reflecting people deplore the activity of the spirit of lawlessness, which prompted the crime and the vengeance. Both acts are alike sins against God and outrages on society. Much harm may be done by approving either of them.

Dr. McCosh has been Induced to Remain President of Princeton College. It is announced that he will be relieved of a portion of his duties by Dr. J. O. Murray, who will be made Dean of the Faculty, and will also have charge of the order and discipline of the college. Dr. McCosh will continue to control the educational department of the executive office, and will preside at the faculty meetings. The School of Philosophy, for which an endowment of $150,000 has been secured, will open in September. Dr. McCosh will be at the head of the department, teaching psychology and the history of philosophy, while Dr. F. L. Patton, of the Theological Seminary, will deliver a course of lectures on "Metaphysics." The financial and educational progress at Princeton, under Dr. McCosh, has been so marked that all friends of the college will rejoice that he has arranged to continue his work there.

A Remarkable Work among Miners has been conducted by Messrs. Milligan and Turner at Lonaconing, Md. The two evangelists have been trained in Mr. Guinness's College in London, and they have come to this country with the view of carrying on evangelistic work among the miners in Colorado. They were, however, induced soon after their arrival by representations of the urgent need of help in Pennsylvania and Maryland to pay a short visit there before going to Colorado. They visited the miners in their homes and held services in one of the Lonaconing churches and in the open air. The result has been a glorious outpouring of blessing, and many remarkable cases of conversion are reported.

The Thirtieth Annual Report of the Young Men's Christian Association has been issued. Its records show how useful its work has been among the young men of the city and how thoroughly organized are all its departments. Every one who is familiar with its working indorses the statements made in the report as to its extensive and beneficent influence. The work has been extended in many ways during the year, and its expenses have consequently increased. Several large rooms recently let out by the Association are now to be used for its own work, and the income will, therefore, be materially reduced. The managers estimate that they will need over and above their usual receipts $13,000 to defray the cost of the work. That amount will doubtless be speedily contributed, as many Christians of wealth are aware of the necessities of this useful institution.

A Noble Act of Munificence is Recorded by the press. Real estate of the value of $150,000 has been presented by Mr. and Mrs. Oswald Ottendorfer to the German Hospital and Dispensary in New York. Mrs. Ottendorfer presents the land and building for a perfectly fitted dispensary, in which every convenience is offered for the free treatment of the poor, whatever may be their disease, and to this Mr. Ottendorfer adds the building and land for a circulating library and reading-room of an unusually extensive character. The cost of fitting the library with books and journals will be borne by Mr. Ottendorfer, in addition to the cost of land and building. The property is on Second Avenue near Eighth Street.

A Wrongly Accused Boy has been Vindicated after long delay. An English boy was charged some time ago with stealing a diamond pin from a lady in Washington in whose house he was employed. He has parents in England, and Judge Snell agreed not to imprison him if he was sent to them. This was done, and the boy left with a cloud upon his good name. A few days ago, says the Washington Post, the lady who charged him with being a thief found the pin wrapped up in a piece of paper and laid in a casket in which the family silver was kept. The discovery vindicates the boy, but it comes too late to make amends for the wrong which was done him. How many thousands of people have similarly suffered through the carelessness or wrongdoing of others, how many have undergone punishment through the mistakes of judges and juries no man can tell, but it is certain their number must be enormous. It is strange that even infidels do not understand that there must of necessity be a life beyond the grave in which these many wrongs may be righted (I. Peter 2 : 19-21).

The Liberated Jail-Bird who was Immortalized by Charles Dickens applied to the police in Philadelphia last Thursday for permission to return to prison. When the great novelist visited this country in 1842 he saw this prisoner, whose name is Langheimer, and, in the book he wrote describing his journey, described him with words of deep commiseration. Langheimer had been two years in jail when Dickens saw him, and since then he has been out of prison only for short periods at a time, having been convicted and sent back time after time. He was last sentenced two years ago, and his time was up on June 11th. On Thursday he turned up again at police headquarters, and asked to be committed to prison, averring that he found it impossible to be honest. He talked for some time with the detective, and was apparently sincere in his conviction that the prison was the only place in which he was safe from temptation. His petition was necessarily rejected, but the detective expressed the opinion that it would not be many days before he came before the courts for sentence to the place where so many years of his life have been spent. The man is now eighty-four years of age, and his confession that now he "cannot cease from sin" is a remarkable fulfilment of the scriptural warning (II. Peter 2 : 14).

A Stuffed Snake-Skin Occupies a Place of honor in the rooms of a newly-married couple. The Philadelphia Times in reporting a wedding relates a romantic incident. A short time before the marriage there was a church picnic at which two young men and a young lady sat down on a rock to rest. In reaching out his hand to a bed of moss, one of the young men touched something cold. Instinctively he knew that he had placed his hand upon a rattlesnake. At the same moment the snake was discovered by the other young man and the young lady. Both screamed and ran from the spot. Thus left alone to battle with his deadly antagonist, the young man pressed his arm downward with all his strength on the snake's throat, at the same time reaching into his pocket for a knife. Before he could open the knife with his teeth the snake had wound itself around his arm. His companions stood watching him, and the young lady appealed to the young man to go to his friend's assistance, but he dare not. "Then I'll go myself," exclaimed the young woman, springing forward. She found the young man pale to the lips with the pain caused by the tightening folds of the snake, but he was opening his knife, and in a moment he had cut off the snake's head. The snake was nearly six feet in length, and was so strong that the young man's arm was black and blue. The young lady was so impressed by the contrast in the conduct of her two suitors in the moment of danger, that her wavering ceased, and the killer of the snake became her husband. The skin is now retained as a memorial of the crisis in which the young man killed his dangerous antagonist, and by the same act won the prize he sought. So the soul united forever with Christ can often look back to a supreme crisis in life when, assailed by temptation like a deadly snake, he was enabled to overcome the tempter, who would have led him to death, and the moment of his deliverance sealed his allegiance to his Saviour (Rom. 7 : 24, 25).

A Physician's Minute Preparations for his funeral are described in a telegram from Indianapolis. It states that the physician, who died last week, was aware, some time before his death that the end was approaching. He sent for the Superintendent of the Pan Handle Railroad, bargained for a special funeral train, bought a hundred tickets, issued the invitations to his friends, and paid the hotel bills in advance for the party at the town where the burial took place. He arranged for everything, including the floral wreaths, and then resigned himself to death. It may be hoped, though the fact is not mentioned, that while making these careful preparations for the obsequies of his body, the physician did not forget the future of his soul. To have shown solicitude about trifles and neglected the affair that was to him of supreme importance would have proved him irrational in the last degree (Matt. 16 : 26).

A Novelty in Church Architecture is Advocated in a letter to the New York Times. The writer of the letter, after dwelling on the conveniences of the houses, let out in French flats, urges that churches might be built advantageously on the same principle. He advises that "a building be erected say 100 feet deep by 75 feet in width and twelve stories high, which will accommodate twelve different denominations, and the expense of the building would only be one-third of what it would cost to erect twelve separate church structures. The advantages of a building of this kind are very obvious, as persons desiring religious instruction could here find it and all tastes could be suited, for if one particular preacher did not meet their expectations they could take the elevator and ascend to the next story, and, if not suited there, could keep on going up until they found the man to suit." Such a structure the writer claims, in a long and elaborate argument, would be a "mighty power for good wherever it was erected." The advice has probably been given in jest, though no little trouble is taken to convince the public of its practicability. Even if the proposal is only a joke, it is an indication of the current of public feeling on the subject of religion. The people are not in these days so anxious to hear the truth as to listen to teaching that "suits" them. We are warned in the Bible that such a time would come (II. Timothy 4 : 3 Rev. Ver.).

An Interesting Incident in a Car on the Elevated Railroad in New York occurred last week. A colored man entered at one of the stations, when a rough-looking sailor apparently half asleep roused himself and asked him his name, and where he came from. The negro replied that he was raised in "ole Virginny," then the stranger grasped his hand warmly, and thus explained his sudden regard for the colored man: "I was a soldier in the war. I was a prisoner at Libby," said the sailor. "When I got out I was skin and bone, and as crazy with the fever as any lunatic. Who do you suppose saved my life? Don't know? Well, I do. It was a Southern colored man. He took me into his own little cabin. He shaved my head and nursed me, and got clothing, medicines, and food for me. I was delirious for six weeks, but I came around all right, and then he helped me to get back into the Union lines. Yes; he saved my life. Ever since that, wherever I may be, and I rove around a great deal, being a seafaring man, I shake the hand of every Southern colored man that I meet, and do something more substantial, if he's in trouble. I want to shake your hand, my boy—shake." The negro in the Elevated had done nothing for the sailor, but he belonged to a race a member of which had done a great deal for him, and the sailor thus showed his gratitude. Would that Christians would so regard their obligations and obey their Saviour's command (Luke 9 . 48)!

"KNOCK!"

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Knock, and it shall be opened unto you."—MATTHEW 7 : 12.

Gradations of one Thought—Asking, Seeking, Knocking—I. The Door of Mercy Apparently Closed—The Result of Fear—Not Closed Like the Heart—May be Closed by Unbelief—The Rule of God—The Knocking a Blessing—II. A Door Implies an Opening—Sham Doors—The Door Meant for Sinners—For the Empty Handed—The Simple Way of Opening—III. A Knocker Provided—The Promises—The Name of Christ—IV. A Promise to Those who Knock—Spontaneous and Tested—For All Knockers—Malachi the Cornishman—V. A Glorious Opening.

I HAVE no doubt that, taken very strictly, the three exhortations of this verse—which, indeed, are but one—were first of all intended for God's believing people. It was to His disciples that the Lord said, "Cast not your pearls before swine;" and perhaps certain of them who were poor in spirit might turn round and say, "Lord, we have few pearls; we are too poor to have the treasures of Thy grace so plentifully. Thou hast bidden us not to give that which is holy unto dogs; but holiness is rather a thing we seek after than possess." "Well," saith the Lord, "you have only to ask and have; ye have not because ye ask not; you have only to seek and you will be sure to find, for holy things, like rare pearls, are to be discovered if you look for them; you have only to knock and spiritual secrets shall open to you, even the innermost truth of God."

In each exhortation our Lord bids us pray. Beloved, let us abound in supplication. Surely prayer must have become such a joy to you, such a necessity of your being, such an element of your life, that I hardly need press it upon you as a duty, or invite you to it as a privilege. Yet still I do so, because the Master does it by a triple exhortation. A threefold cord is not easily broken—let not my text be neglected by you. Let me urge you to repeated, varied, ever intensifying prayer; ask! seek! knock! Cease not to ask till you receive; cease not to seek till you find; cease not to knock till the door is opened unto you.

In these three exhortations there would appear to be a gradation; it is put into another shape, and made more forcible. Ask—that is, in the quiet of your spirit, speak with God concerning your need, and humbly beg Him to grant your desires; this is a good and acceptable form of prayer. If, however, asking should not appear to succeed, the Lord would arouse you to a more concentrated and active longing; therefore let your desires call in the aid of knowledge, thought, consideration, meditation, and practical action, and learn to seek for the blessings you desire as men seek for hid treasures. Advance from asking into seeking. And if after all it should still seem that you have not obtained your desire, then knock, and so come to closer and more agonizing work; use not alone the voice, but the whole soul; for remember that doing is praying; living to God is a high form of seeking, and the bent of the entire mind is knocking. God often giveth to His people when they keep His commandments that which He denies to them if they walk carelessly. Remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how He said, "If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you." Holiness is essential to power in prayer; while the lips ask and the heart seeks.

THE LIFE MUST KNOCK

Ask as a poor mendicant who is hungry and pleads for bread. Then seek as a merchant who hunts for goodly pearls, looking up and down, anxious to give all that he has that he may win a matchless treasure. Conclude all by knocking at mercy's door as a lost traveller caught out on a cold night in a blinding sleet knocks for shelter that he may not perish in the storm.

When you have reached the gate of salvation ask to be admitted by the great love of God, then look well to see the way of entering, seeking to enter in; and if still the door seem shut against you, knock right heavily, and continue knocking till you are safely lodged within the home of love.

Once again, ask for what you want, seek for what you have lost, knock for that from which you are excluded. Perhaps this last arrangement best indicates the shades of meaning, and brings out the distinctions. Ask for everything you need, whatever it may be; if it be a right and good thing, it is promised to the sincere asker. Seek for what you have lost, for what Adam lost you by the Fall, for what you have lost yourself by your neglect, by your backsliding, by your want of prayer; seek till you find the grace you need. Then knock. If you seem shut out from comfort, from knowledge, from hope, from God, from heaven, then knock, for the Lord will open unto you. Here you need the Lord's own interference; you can ask and receive, you can seek and find; but you cannot knock and open—the Lord must Himself open the door, or you are shut out forever. God is ready to open the door. Remember, there is no cherub with fiery sword to guard this gate, but, on the contrary, the Lord Jesus Himself openeth, and no man shutteth. But now I must drop this line of things, for my desire is to use the text in reference to those who are not yet saved.

THE CLOSED DOOR.

I. First, then, dear friend, whoever you are, if you are desirous of entering into eternal life, I would expound to you the inscription over the gate, by saying, first, the door of mercy may appear to you to be closed against you. This is implied in the text: "Knock, and it shall be opened unto you." If to your consciousness the door stood wide open, there would be no need of knocking; but since in your apprehension it is closed against you, it is for you to seek admission in the proper way by knocking.

To a large extent this apprehension is the result of your own fears. You think the gate is closed because you feel it ought to be so; you feel that if God dealt with you as you would deal with your fellow-men, He would be so offended with you as to shut the door of His favor once for all. Your desponding feelings fasten up the gate of grace in your judgment. Yet, it is not so. The gate is not barred and bolted as you think it to be; though it may be spoken of as closed in a certain sense, yet in another sense it is never shut. In any case it opens very freely; its hinges are not rested, no bolts secure it. The Lord is glad to open the gate to every knocking soul. Had you but faith enough, you would enter in at this present moment; and if you did once enter in, you would never be put out again, for it is written, "Him that cometh to Me I will in no wise cast out." If you could with holy courage take leave and license to come in, you would never be blamed for it. Fear and shame stand in the sinner's road, and push him back; and blessed is he whose desperate need forces him to be bold.

One thing we should remember when we fear that the door is closed against us, namely, that it is not so fast closed as the door of our hearts has been. You know of "The Light of the World." It seems to me to be one of the finest sermons the eye has ever looked upon. There stands the Ever-Blessed, knocking at the door of the soul, but the hinges are rusted, the door itself is fast bolted, and wild briars and all kinds of creeping plants running up the door prove that it is long since it was moved. You know what it all means; how continuance in sin makes it harder to yield to the knock of Christ, and how evil habits creeping up one after another hold the soul so fast that it cannot open to the sacred knocking.

Jesus has been knocking at some of your hearts ever since you were children; and still He knocks. I hear His blessed hand upon the door at this moment; do you not hear it? Will you not open? He has knocked long, and yet He knocks again. I am sure that you have not knocked at mercy's door so long as incarnate mercy has waited at your door. You know you have not. How, therefore, can you complain if there should be an apparent delay in answering your prayers? It is but to make you feel a holy shame for having treated your Lord so ill. Now you begin to know what it is to be kept waiting, what it is to be a weary knocker, what it is to cry "My head is wet with dew and my locks with the drops of the night." It will be no loss to you that the door was shut for awhile, if you do but gain a penitent heart and a tender spirit.

Let me, however, warn you that the door can be

by unbelief. He that believeth entereth into Christ when he believeth; he that cometh in by the door shall be saved, and shall go in and out and find pasture; so our Lord says in the tenth of John. "He that believeth in Him hath everlasting life," there is no question about that; but we read on the other hand, "So then they could not enter in because of unbelief." Forty years the tribes were in the wilderness, going toward Canaan, yet they never reached the promised land because of unbelief. And what if some of you should be forty years attending this means of grace? The moment you have trusted Him with your whole heart and soul you are within the blessed portals of the Father's house, but however many years you may be asking, seeking, and knocking, you will never enter in till faith comes, for unbelief keeps up the chain of the door, and there is no entering in while it rules your spirit.

Do you, however, complain that you should have to knock? It is the rule of the Most High. Am I addressing any who have been earnestly praying for several months? I can sympathize with you, for that was my case, not only for months, but even for years; through the darkness of my mind and my cruel misapprehensions of the Lord, I did not find peace when first I began to ask for it, although I also sought with much earnestness, going to the house of God every time I could, and reading the Bible daily with a burning desire to know the right way. I did not enter into peace till I had knocked long and heavily. Hearken, therefore, to one who knows your trouble, and hear from me the voice of reason.

Ought we to expect to enter into the glorious house of mercy without knocking at its door? Is it so with

OUR OWN HOUSES?

Can every straggler carelessly saunter in? is it not God's way in the world to give great blessings, but always to make men knock for them? We want bread out of the earth, but the farmer must knock at the door of the earth with his plough and with all his instruments of agriculture ere his God will hand him out a harvest. Is anything gained in this world without labor? Is it not an old proverb, "No sweat, no sweet; no pains, no gains; no mill, no meal"? And may we not expect in heavenly things that at least these great mercies should be prayed for with fervency before they can be bestowed?

Besides, to make us knock at mercy's gate is a great blessing to ourselves upon the spot. It is a going to school for us when we are set to plead with God for awhile without realized success. It makes a man grow more earnest, for his hunger increases while he tarries. If he obtained the blessing when first he asked for it, it might seem dog cheap; but when he has to plead long he arrives at a better sense of the value of the mercy sought. He sees also more of his own unworthiness as he stands outside mercy's gate, ready to swoon away with fear; and so he grows more passionately earnest in pleading; and, whereas he did but ask at first, he now begins to seek, and he adds cries and tears and a broken heart to all the other ways of his pleading. Thus the man, by being humbled and aroused, is getting good by means of his sorrow while he is kept for a while outside the gate.

Depend upon it, if the ships of prayer do not come home speedily it is because they are more heavily freighted with blessing. When prayer is long in the answering it will be all the sweeter in the receiving, like fruit which is well ripened by hanging longer on the tree. If you knock with a heavy heart you shall yet sing with joy of spirit; therefore, be not discouraged because for a while you stand before a closed door.

II. Secondly,

A DOOR IMPLIES AN OPENING.

What is a door meant for if it is always to be kept shut? The wall might as well have remained without a break. I have seen certain houses and public buildings with the form and appearance of doors where there were none; the sham doorway being made for architectural purposes; but nothing is a sham in the house of the Lord. His doors are meant to open; they were made on purpose for entrance; and so the blessed Gospel of God is made on purpose for you to enter into life and peace. It would be of no use to knock at a wall, but you may wisely knock at a door, for it is arranged for opening. You will enter in eventually if you knock on, for the Gospel is good news for men, and how could it be good news if it should so happen that they might sincerely come to Christ and ask mercy, and be denied it?

I am sure this door must open to those who have nothing to bring with them. If you have no good works, no merits, no good feelings, nothing to recommend you, be not discouraged, for it is to such that Jesus Christ is most precious, and therefore most accessible, for He loves to give Himself to those who will prize Him most. A man will never have Christ while he has enough of his own; but he that is consciously naked, and poor, and miserable is the man for Christ's money, he it is that has been redeemed by price. You may know the redeemed man, for he feels his bondage, and owns that he must remain therein unless the redemption of Christ be applied for his deliverance.

KNOCKING EASY.

Dear friends, that door of hope will be opened to you though you may be ignorant, and weak, and quite unable to fulfil any high conditions. When the text says, "Knock, and it shall be opened unto you," it teaches us that the way of winning admission to the blessing is simple, and suitable to common people. If I have to enter in by a door which is well secured, I shall need tools and science. I confess I do not understand the art; you must send for a gentleman who understands picklocks, "jemmies," and all sorts of burglarious instruments; but if I am only told to knock, fool as I am at opening doors, I know how to knock. Any uneducated man can knock if that is all which is required of him. A dumb man can knock. A blind man can knock. With a palsied hand a man may knock. The gate of grace is meant to yield admission to unscientific people since it shall be opened to those who knock.

I am sure this door will open to you, because it has been opened to so many before you. It has been opened to hundreds of us now present. Could not you, dear brothers and sisters, stand up and tell how the Lord opened the gate of His salvation to you? That door has opened to many in this house during the last few weeks. Well, if the door has been so often opened for others, why should it not turn on its hinges for you? Only knock, with faith in God's mercy, and before long it shall yield to your importunity.

III. Thirdly, knock, for

A KNOCKER IS PROVIDED.

When persons can be admitted by knocking, a knocker is usually placed on the door; and if not, we often see the words, no admittance. Before bells became so common the habit of knocking at the door was well-nigh universal, and people were accustomed to make the door resound with their blows. There was a nail-head for the knocker to drop upon, and people used to smite it so heavily that it became remarked that such blows on the head were killing, and hence arose the mirthful proverb, "As dead as a door-nail." It betokens a hearty kind of knocking, which I would have you imitate in prayer.

Knock at heaven's gate as earnestly as people knocked at doors in the olden times. Have you not had knocks at your own doors which could be heard all through the house? Some of our friends are vigorous, and knock as if they meant coming in. It may be that gentle folks give such tender taps that they are not heard by the servants, and so they have to wait; but these I am speaking of never fall into that error, for they so startle everybody that people are glad to let them in, for fear they should thunder a second time. In this style let us pray; let us plead in downright fashion, and never cease till we gain admission.

I have said that the Lord has provided a knocker. What is this knocker? First of all, it may be found in the promises of God. We are sure to speed well when we can plead a promise. It is well to say unto the Lord, "Do as thou hast said." What force abides in an appeal to the word, the oath, and the covenant of God. If a man presents to another a promissory note upon the day on which it is due he expects to receive the amount stated therein. God's promises are bills of exchange, and He will duly honor them. He was never known to dishonor a bill yet, and He never will do so.

THE GREAT KNOCKER,

however, is the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. If a person were to call upon you in the name of some dearly-beloved son who is far away, if he brought you due credentials, and a letter, saying, "Father, treat the bearer well for my sake," you would be sure to show him kindness; and if the aforesaid person was authorized to receive a promised amount in the name of your son, would you not hand out the money? Now, when we go to God and plead the name of Christ, it means that we plead the authority of Christ, that we ask of God as though we were in Christ's stead, and expect Him to give it to us as if He were giving it to Jesus. That is something more than pleading for Christ's sake. I suppose the apostles at first did plead with God for Christ's sake, but Jesus says to them, "Hitherto ye have asked nothing in My name." It is a higher grade of prayer, and when we get to pleading Christ's name with the Father, then do we gloriously prevail.

"Alas!" says one, "I see the knocker, for I know something of the promises and of the person of our Lord, but how am I to knock?" With the hand of faith. Believe that God will keep His promise; ask Him to do so, and thus knock. Believe that Jesus is worthy, whose name you are pleading, and so knock in confidence that God will honor the name of His dear Son. Knock with all your might, with all the vigor of your spirit; plead as for life; knock at the door as a man would knock who saw a wolf ready to spring upon him. Knock as one would knock who found himself ready to die of cold outside the door. Throw your whole soul into the work. "Knock, and it shall be opened unto you." There is the knocker.

IV. Next, to you who are knocking at the gate

A PROMISE IS GIVEN.

That is more than having a door before you, or a knocker to knock with. The promise is above the gate in plain words. Read it. You are growing faint and weary; read the promise, and grow strong again. "Knock, and it shall be opened unto you." Observe how plain and positive it is with its glorious "shall" burning like a lamp in the centre of it. In letters of love the inscription shines out amid all the darkness that surrounds you, and these are its words, "It shall be opened unto you." If you knock at the door of the kindest of men you see no such promise set before you, and yet you knock, and knock confidently; how much more boldly should you come to the door of grace when it is expressly declared, "It shall be opened unto you!"

Remember that this promise was freely given. You never asked the Lord for such a word, it was uttered by spontaneous goodness. You did not come and plead with Jesus for a promise that you should be heard in prayer. This inscription has encouraged many to knock; when they have been ready to faint and give up all further seeking, they have read again the cheering lines, "Knock, and it shall be opened unto you," and they have taken heart and made the gate resound again. Oh, that you may never stop your knocking till salvation's door is entered by you! The promise of the Lord was given freely, and on the strength of that promise we knock, therefore we are sure that the Lord will not deny His trusting servants.

The mercy is that this promise is meant for all knockers—"Knock, and it shall be opened unto you." The Lord has not denied to you, my hearer, the privilege of praying, or declared that He will not answer your requests. You may knock, and you may expect to see the door open. I know the blessed doctrine of election, and I rejoice in it; but that is a secret with God, while the rule of our preaching is—"Preach the Gospel to every creature." I would, therefore, say to each one here, "Knock, and it shall be opened unto you." The Lord knows who will knock, for "the Lord knoweth them that are His." But knock, my friend, knock now, and it will soon be seen that you are one of God's chosen ones.

Remember the story of

MALACHI, THE CORNISHMAN.

When a methodist friend had some money to give him he smilingly said, "Malachi, I do not think I shall give you this money, because I do not know whether you are predestinated to have it. Will you tell me whether you are predestinated to have it or not?" Malachi replied, "You put the money in my hand, and I will tell you." As soon as Malachi had the sum in hand he knew that he was predestinated to have it; but he could not know before he had it in possession. So the secret counsel of the Lord is revealed to our faith when it gets Christ in possession, and not before. Knock at once. If you are predestinated to enter, I know you will knock, and knock till you are admitted, for so it stands, and no exception is made to it—"Knock, and it shall be opened unto you." It is a rule with the Lord that to him that knocketh it shall be opened.

Blessed be God, this text of mine shines out as if printed in stars, and it continues to shine from day-dawn of life to set of sun. As long as a man lives, if he knocks at God's door, it shall be opened unto him. I sought the Lord, and He heard me; and since then I had never doubted of any living soul but that if he too will seek the Lord through Jesus Christ he will certainly be saved. Oh, that you would try it! The Lord move you thereto by His own blessed Spirit.

V. So I close with one more point. When the door opens it will be to you. "Knock, and it shall be opened." What will come of it then? Immediately you who have knocked will enter. If you have knocked in sincerity, the moment you see Christ as a Saviour you will accept Him as your Saviour. Enter into Christ by faith. Behold, He sets before you an open door, and no man can shut it. Do not hesitate to enter in. Hitherto you have thought there were many difficulties and obstacles in your way, but indeed it is not so—Believe and live. When, in answer to your knocking, you see the door move, then arise, and tarry not.

Remember that the opening of that door will not only give you entrance, but it will insure you safety. He who once enters into Christ is safe forever. Only pass beneath that blood-besprinkled portal, only rest in the house of the Well-beloved, and you shall go no more out forever. The life which He bestows is eternal, therefore you shall not die. The destroying angel, whenever he may take his flight, must pass you by. Only believe, and you are saved; only trust Christ with your whole heart, and soul, and strength, and salvation has come unto your house, and you have come unto the house of salvation.

I want to say this, and I have done. Some people think if they have begun to pray, and are a little in earnest, that this is enough. Now, praying is not an end, it is only a means. Knocking is you must enter in. If any of you are seeking, I am glad of it; if you are knocking, I am glad of it; but if you say, "I am perfectly satisfied to stand outside the door and knock," then I am grieved for you. You are foolish to the last degree, because you are resting in the means as if they were the end. You must enter by the door or else knocking will be labor in vain. Would any of you be content to visit a friend, and merely to stand for an hour or two outside of his door knocking. Did you ever say, "I do not want anything more; I shall sit down comfortably on the doorstep, and then get up and have another knock or two?" Knocking would not give you a dinner, nor do your business for you. Knocking is only the way of entrance, but if you stop at knocking it is poor work.

The most earnest praying is only a way of getting to Christ; the Gospel itself is, "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." Come, then, to Christ. If you find the door shut, knock. But oh, remember, the door is not really shut; it is only so in your apprehension! Heaven's gate stands open night and day. At once believe and live. Trust in the merit of Jesus Christ, and you are clothed with it; trust in the blood of Christ, and you are washed in it. Faith saves in an instant. It touches Jesus, and the healing virtue pours forth from His garment's hem; faith steps over the threshold, and the soul is safe. The Lord grant that you may enter in at once, and then it shall be our joy, and the angels' joy, and the great Father's joy, forever and ever, to see you rescued from destruction!

SCENES IN THE LIFE OF A PRISON PHILANTHROPIST.

WALTER VENNING has been well called the John Howard of Russia. His work, of which a brief account appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of April 8th, 1880, together with his portrait, is one of the few bright chapters in Russian history. On the next page are three sketches depicting incidents in his life of labor and self-sacrifice.

He was in Russia in October, 1807, when intelligence arrived requiring him to make a long journey. Letters travelled slowly in those days, and the one to Walter Venning had been long on the way. With his natural ardor, however, and quickened by the desire of fulfilling his duty without loss of time, he hired two men to accompany him in an attempt to cross the gulf on the ice, though it was nearly seven miles direct to Cronstadt.

In commencing the enterprise, they had first to traverse a pathless wood for about two miles before they reached the seashore. On their arrival they found the ice was scarcely strong enough to bear their weight. Hoping, however, that it would increase in thickness as they advanced from the shore, they proceeded, as represented in the picture on page 396, trying every step with poles, which often penetrated through the slightly formed ice, and betrayed how Scenes from the Life of a Prison Philanthropist.

NEAR THEY WERE TO A FROZEN TOMB.

As they approached the current of the River Neva they found the water scarcely congealed; to advance in that line it was impossible, to return was extremely perilous; and therefore they resolved to prosecute their course by a circuit higher up the gulf. Here they found their path more firm, yet so slippery that they were thrown down every few yards of their progress, which rendered their situation more hazardous, as every fall, by increasing their weight, endangered the breakage of the ice, which would at once have plunged them into irretrievable destruction.

But the God of his fathers watched over him, and though cold, bruised, and exhausted, yet he arrived at Cronstadt before nightfall, in perfect safety, to the utter astonishment of his friends who heard of his adventure.

Mr. Venning secured the privilege of visiting the Russian prisons through the friendship of Prince Alexander Galitzin, who obtained a mandate from the Emperor Alexander authorizing him "to visit the Russian prisons at all times," on the condition that he should draw up a report of their state, to be laid before his Imperial Majesty. He assured Prince Galitzin that he should think of nothing else but prisons; and, consequently, he not only declined all commercial business, but actually absented himself from the Exchange lest he should be interrupted in his benevolent operations.

THE ABODES OF MISERY

of every name in St. Petersburg were now visited by him day after day, and many a prisoner, bowed down with affliction, was cheered, instructed, and saved by his ministration. He thought nothing of the fatigue of a journey of 520 miles, when he knew that he might obtain additional opportunities of promoting his philanthropic schemes and securing the good of his fellow-creatures.

During one of his journeys to Moscow an accident occurred which, but for the interposition of the Divine Hand, might have had a fatal termination. The darkness of night coming on before the final stage of the day's distance was covered, and the rough road through the forest being longer than was anticipated, the travelling party were suddenly alarmed by hearing most distinctly amid the death-like stillness the deep and the carriage was overturned at the same time, as shown in our picture, and the occupants were in danger from the predatory and voracious monsters. However, through the kind providence of an ever-watchful Father, though some of the party were much bruised, and all were greatly terrified, no life was sacrificed.

During many years Mr. Venning continued his visits of mercy to the Russian prisons. He found in them men who had languished there for crimes comparatively light for many years beyond the just punishment of their misdeeds. Others who had committed no crime at all, yet had been imprisoned in loathsome dungeons, their limbs chained to the stone which served them for a seat and a bed, and all that suffering because they had the misfortune to offend some powerful man miscalled a nobleman. Occasionally the nobles impelled by sensual passions immured in these dungeons men who stood in the way of their gratification, and their poor victims were lost to the sight of those who loved them, forever. In Russia where at that time there was practically no law but the will of the Czar, these things could be done with impunity. There was small chance of the complaint of a prisoner so incarcerated reaching the Czar's ears. Narratives of suffering almost inconceivable in bitterness Mr. Venning heard in those dungeons, and in many cases he was instrumental in obtaining the victim's release.

This good work Mr. Venning pursued regardless of his own health, and comfort, until on one occasion visiting a sick prisoner he contracted his disease. The prisoner was suffering from malignant typhus, and when Mr. Venning left the prison he was himself a doomed man. A few days afterward he was prostrated with the malady, and in spite of all efforts to save his life he died. He went, however, to hear the words of welcome from Him who had said, "I was sick and in prison and ye visited me. Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these ye did it unto Me."

THE BLIND LADY'S SONG.

A LITTLE more than thirty years ago when railroads had not covered the land as they do now, and such people as did not own carriages of their own had to make their journeys in the vehicles that some enterprising citizen provided for public accommodation, strangely assorted parties often found themselves thrown into company. One beautiful summer day a wagon was being driven slowly over a country road with such a company. It contained a fashionably-dressed lady and her little son and daughter, the boy having pleaded for a seat beside the driver on the box had been so accommodated to his intense delight, while the little girl sat demurely beside her mamma. Opposite to them were two ladies, one of whom appeared to be an invalid, as her companion supported her carefully with her left arm and now and again looked tenderly in her face and asked some question of her in an undertone. The other occupants of the vehicle were a poor widow and her little boy.

The first part of the journey was performed in that silence that falls upon parties so thrown together. The widow, however, had more than once cast a kind, sympathetic, inquiring look at the invalid lady, as if she would like to speak to her if she were sure her friendly overture would not be resented as an impertinence. She tried to catch the eye of the sufferer, but though occasionally she seemed to do so and smiled pleasantly, there was no answering glance from the invalid. At length her motherly feelings gave her courage, and addressing the invalid's companion she ventured to ask, "Is the young lady sick?"

The answer came cheerfully in that subdued voice that ladies who have been much in sick chambers unconsciously use. "She is not very strong; she is only just recovering from a severe illness, and she has had to undergo a crushing sorrow. But she is better now; the pure fresh air is doing her good. Is it not, Helen?"

"Yes, dear," said the invalid. "I feel stronger now than for a long time past; this breeze seems to give me new life. We must be among trees and heather, are we not? The air seems laden with fragrance."

"You are right, Helen. I wish you could see the prospect. It is lovely. There is not a house in sight; nothing but the grass and wild flowers, the trees in their richest foliage, hills in the distance, and over all the beautiful blue sky."

Then for the first time the other occupants of the car learned that the beautiful dark eyes were sightless, and that their owner was shut out from the delightful prospect they were enjoying. The widow was deeply moved, and she said gently:

"Yours is a sad lot, dear lady; the Lord comfort you as He only can."

"He has, He has," said Helen, earnestly. "He has blessed me more abundantly than I deserve. I am happier now than I was when I could see. It was not until I lost sight of the outer world that I was able to see Him in His beauty, and know how lovely He is. Now I cannot see this beautiful world, but sometimes I seem to enjoy a more lovely scene, and see 'the land that is very far off.'"

"Ah," said the widow, "that is a blessed vision; there are many folks who have their sight that cannot see that."

The Blind Lady's Song.

The fashionable lady in the corner of the carriage who had listened attentively to this conversation, all the time intently looking at the blind lady, said earnestly, "Are you really happy in darkness? I could not have believed it possible that one who had once been able to see could be anything but miserable so shut out from pleasure."

"I am not shut out from pleasure," Helen answered with a smile, the sweetness of which confirmed her words. "There are better pleasures than any sight can give. Even now, though all is dark, and my body is weak, and my heart is bowed down with the loss of one I loved very dearly, I am still happy in the Saviour's love." Then in a soft, low voice she sang very sweetly:

"Sometimes a light surprises
The Christian while he sings:
It is the Lord who rises
With healing in His wings.

"When comforts are declining,
He grants the soul, again,
A season of clear shining,
To cheer it after rain."

It was a very touching sight to see the eloquent face of the singer as Cowper's well-known lines fell from her lips. Every face was turned to her, and even the driver turned his face to listen the better to the melody.

"That is very beautiful," said the lady. "Can you sing it all? Your voice is a very pleasant one. I am very fond of music. I never heard a voice that so affected me."

Then Helen sang the other verses of the hymn with that pathos and power only one could throw into them who had experienced the blessing they tell of. At its conclusion the lady asked for other songs, and Helen sang until weakness demanded that she should cease. Conversation then became general, and it was then explained that Helen was on her way to a hospital where a celebrated oculist was about to perform an operation on her eyes for the recovery of her sight. She was poor and had no relatives able to support her, and if in God's providence the operation was successful she hoped to earn her livelihood by sewing.

As the wagon was driven into the city the party had become friends, and none of them were glad the journey was ended. The widow and her little boy went off to their destination with many kind words and good wishes, but the lady lingered, reluctant to part from the happy blind lady whose voice and cheerful spirit had impressed her. She obtained permission to visit her in hospital, and then bade her farewell.

The impression of the drive did not fade away from the lady's mind. She was wealthy and had all the comforts of life, but of the joy that could make the blind happy she knew nothing. She wanted that joy, and her visits to the hospital were as much to gain that as to cheer the patient sufferer. The work commenced in the country drive was carried on by the Holy Spirit to her conversion, and when a few weeks afterward Helen left the hospital with her sight completely restored, it was not to earn her livelihood by sewing, but to enter the household of the lady whose soul she had been instrumental in saving, as a welcome, honored companion, bringing with her light and life.

PETER BLAKE'S VOYAGE.

A SERIAL STORY BY HESBA STRETTON.

A Vain Search.

AS if he had heard his name, and answered to the summons, the door slowly opened, and Fleck himself crept into the room.

"Fleck!" cried Arthur Penrose, "here is Blake. Has Simmons broken the news to his poor wife down-stairs?"

"Ay, ay! he's broke the news," muttered Fleck, sullenly. "But I'm come to say it's not Blake's wife and children. I don't know where Bessie Blake's to be found, and I told him so, only last night."

"Not Peter Blake's wife!" cried Arthur Penrose; "who are they, then?"

"They're my wife and children," he answered, in a muffled, though dogged voice. "Bessie Blake called your money Judas's money, and wouldn't even look at it."

"Then you've been imposing your wife and children upon me all this time," said Arthur Penrose, with a darkening face. The imposture seemed heartlessly cruel and mean to him.

"Ay! if you like to call it by a hard name," said Fleck, insolently. "I'd made up my mind never to trust myself at sea again; not after I'd been trapped into one of Penrose's old boats. I lost all I had in the Dolphin; so now we are quits, you and me."

"No," he answered, with indignant anger, "we are not quits in this way. I shall give you in charge for imposing upon me."

"Stop a minute," said Fleck, with a cunning smile; "you might be cutting your own cable. If you give me up, I'll give you up. There's fifteen hundred pound, as I know of, that you've got by imposition, as you call it. What's that to the money you've paid me, or Polly yonder? We've had a little over twenty pound or so, and you've put fifteen hundred in your pocket. Which of us two has imposed the most, Mr. Arthur Penrose? Which of us is the biggest cheat?"

"I do not understand a word you say," he replied; "and you are only making your case worse by your insolence."

"Peter Blake knows what I mean," continued Fleck, "and our captain knew; and Blackburn, the mate, knows. There was a pretty little lot of fire-arms consigned to Algiers, in nice new wooden cases, insured in all to fifteen hundred pounds. What were they, eh? Nothing save cases of salt, not worth fifteen hundred pence. Maybe, the rest of the cargo was of the same value. Do you call that an imposition, eh? If you send me before the justice, I'll tell my tale, and Peter Blake will swear to it."

"It is false," said Arthur Penrose hotly; "it cannot be true, Blake!"

"It is true, sir," answered Peter, "and if I'm called on, I must swear to it. The insurance money ought to be paid back, though it wasn't you that cheated for it. Those cases were filled with salt, and I'm come to speak to your father, himself, about them."

"Oh, my God!" cried Arthur Penrose. He had sunk down upon a chair near the table, and now he hid his face in his hands from the eyes of Fleck and Blake. It was, then, true; his father, whose memory he had hoped to clear from false and envious accusations, had been guilty of, at least, one flagrant fraud. And if one, why not of all which were brought against him by his enemies? Of late he had been happier in himself, and more satisfied by the kind things said to him of his dead father. He had begun to enjoy the idea of succeeding to his position and wealth, believing that no dishonor attached to them. But if this were true—why! then he must keep his solemn vow not to touch his money until full restitution had been made for all the wrongs by which his riches had been accumulated. It was a heavy burden of crime that his father had bequeathed to him.

His face looked aged and careworn when he raised his head. Neither of the two men had spoken or stirred during these few brief minutes of his profound anguish. But now Peter Blake spoke to him in a voice of respect and sympathy.

"I didn't mean to tell you, sir," he said; "nay, I never thought to see your face again. But I promised the captain I'd see right done, and I came here to speak first to your father, the real owner of the Dolphin. Leave your father to settle all about it, sir."

"My father is dead," he answered, with parched lips.

"Dead!" repeated Peter Blake.

"It is my business now," he said, in a broken and faltering voice, "and you must tell me all about it. Fleck, go home for the present you and your wife and children. Mark me! I cannot promise to let you off; but I'll think of it. Get out of my sight now."

Fleck was only too glad to go. It had been a forlorn hope with him that he might wring a last sum of money out of Arthur Penrose before he learned the truth from Peter; and he had brought his wife the first thing in the morning, with some well-arranged story of an immediate need of her next month's allowance. But he was glad to get away free; and leaving a message with Simmons that the woman was to follow him, he hurried out of the house, lest Arthur Penrose should change his mind and detain him.

"Stay with me," said Arthur Penrose, as Peter was about to follow Fleck. "Stay. I have not a friend in the world who will tell me the plain truth. You can help me in this trouble. Do not go away."

"Ay, I'd stay willingly," he answered, "but there's my poor girl and the little ones! When you said they were here I was lifted up so that now I'm ten times more cast down about them. I'll come back to you as soon as I have found them."

"It was a comfort to me, all the time, to think I was taking care of them for you," said Arthur Penrose, "but now that is gone. I'll come with you, and do my best to help you in the search."

But after three days' fruitless search in the vast labyrinth of London, Peter Blake resolved to cross the Channel, and seek out his mother in Honfleur. Arthur Penrose, who was restless and miserable, determined to go with him. There seemed to be more in common between him and Blake than between him and any of his former friends. The peril they had both encountered, and both escaped, united them by a close and firm tie, which was strengthened by Peter's manly and trustworthy bearing. They could share each other's anxiety and sorrow; and Arthur Penrose would not leave him to pursue his painful search alone.

They remained on the deck of the Southampton steamer after all the other passengers had deserted it for the cabin below. To Peter it seemed unnatural to seek shelter in the cabin, and Arthur Penrose cared little for the stinging cold of the easterly wind. He was too wretched to feel it, except as a slight additional element to his state of misery. He was scarcely more than a lad yet; it was hardly three years since he had left school, and entered upon a world of which he knew no more than a school boy. But now, as he leaned over the bulwarks, gazing vacantly at the dim, dark sea stretching away to the distant sky, the sea which so lately had all but engulphed him in its unfathomable and unsearchable depths, he felt as though centuries had passed over him since he was a careless, light-hearted boy.

"Blake," he said, in a low, bitter tone, "what would you do if you found out that your father had been an infamous scoundrel?"

Peter could not answer readily. His father had been a brave, honest seaman, true-hearted and tender, with hardly a fault that he could remember. He had been drowned at sea; and on such a night as this Peter Blake had often looked across the tossing surface of his father's great grave with a feeling of pride in his father's worth.

"I came of age yesterday," continued Arthur Penrose, "and they told me what he had left for me—a fleet of rotten ships, heavily insured, and estates bought by what your wife called Judas's money. I have thirteen crazy old vessels out, any one of which may be going to the bottom, with all hands aboard her, at this moment. Blake, I've bid England farewell. I'll never go back to her. I'll change my name, and get my living how I can. But all that will not give me back my love for my father."

"No, no, sir," answered Peter; "that's being rash and cowardly. You cannot run away from trouble. Just say to yourself, 'Suppose my father had repented in time, what would it have been his duty to do?' Not to run away, Mr. Arthur, nor to change his name, maybe; but to set to work and do what can be done to put things right. That is what God has set you to do."

"I cannot face the world with the name of Penrose," he cried.

"Let that be for a while," answered Peter; "let's see what you can do. Perhaps, if your father had repented, he'd have been so borne down by remorse and shame that he could have done nothing but hide himself from the world. But God Almighty took him away, and left you to stand in his place. Everybody knows you'd naught to do with it; so you can make a fresh start altogether. What would I do? I'd make myself one of the best shipowners in all England. I'd have the finest fleet of good merchant vessels sailing on the sea. I'd move heaven and earth to get wise laws made for owners and sailors. Do? I'd prove that I loved my country by helping to keep her mistress of the seas. I'd never run away and hide myself. I'd remember," and his voice fell into a quiet tone, "I'd remember that if I'd no father on earth, there is a Father in heaven, whom I could love and serve every hour of my life."

Arthur Penrose made no reply, except by giving Peter's hand a strong grip. His own hand was as cold as ice, and he was shivering with excitement and the chilling air of the night.

"Go below now, sir," urged Peter; "I'll turn into the engine-room; and if you can't sleep, just think over what I've been saying to you."

It was a fresh, pleasant spring morning the next day, when they were crossing the mouth of the Seine to Peter Blake's native place. The trees covering the slopes of the steep coast were all in their glory of spring tints. Higher up, he knew, on the great open country beyond in the orchards, and in sheltered dingles, where the sun shone warmest, the apple-trees were all in blossom—snowy blossom, if snow was but tinged through with a flush of crimson and gold.

On the highest point of the cliff stood the crucifix, which he remembered so well from his earliest childhood. Below lay the town, climbing up the slope, street above street, with the sunshine glittering on the windows. Lowest of all, on the very edge of the tide, stood the gray, old hospital; and the deep tolling of the hospital bell fell upon their ears as it had done upon his mother's amid the singing of the birds and the chatter of the passengers on board the little steamer plying between Havre and Honfleur.

It was the busiest moment of the day on the jetty when the steamer came in, for when the tide was out no boat could enter the harbor. The little knot of aged fishermen were lounging about, as usual, and instantly surrounded Peter Blake, talking to him in a language of which Arthur Penrose knew little. Old Michel was foremost among them, his weather-beaten face quivering with excitement.

"Welcome, my son," he cried, hugging him in his arms, and kissing him on the cheek; "welcome! Thy mother thought thee drowned, and Victor also. Come, come! she lives yet. Every day I knock at the door, and ask how Madame Blake is; and it is always the same thing, till to-day. But to-day she is worse."

"Where is she?" he asked, shaking himself free from the hands of the old man, who would have kept him to tell them his story.

"In the hospital," answered Michel, speaking quietly.

It was a bitter pang to hear it. In the hospital, among the lowest and most degraded! Living upon public charity! He had not thought of that. And now the dread flashed across him that Bessie and his little children might be, at this moment, in some English workhouse. He hurried away, with rapid strides, along the pier, to the street which led to the hospital, hardly conscious that Arthur Penrose was following him closely, until he spoke to him,

"Have they told you anything about your mother?" he asked.

"Ay, have they," he answered; "they tell me she's been living in the hospital, where all the beggars and lunatics are. And she such a delicate, tender creature," he said, drawing his hand across his eyes; "my father would scarcely let her put her foot to the floor, and we boys waited on her like a lady. It's been very hard upon her—in her own town, too, where she was thought so much of."

"May I come with you?" said Arthur Penrose.

"Ay, sir; come," he answered briefly. His heart was too full for speech, as he paced rapidly along the roughly-paved street to the deep-arched portal of the hospital. An old porter, in a white cotton night-cap, and with bleared, dim eyes, opened the door to his ring.

"Yes; Mother Blake is alive still," he answered, to Peter's inquiry; "they say she cannot die, poor soul! for she is a heretic, with dwelling so long in England, where there is no religion, and no fear of God."

"I must see her—this instant even," said Peter; "I am her eldest son."

"No, no; that is impossible!" replied the old porter; "she has lost her two sons, and her husband himself, in old English ships, that were left to go out to sea with no capitaine expert to see if they were good and safe. I said, 'Well, there is no religion in England.'"

"But I am her eldest son; I was not lost at sea," said Peter, urgently. The old man tottered away, across an open court, over which the cloudless blue sky was shining brightly, and called one of the nurses, who was busy in the hospital kitchen. She came to speak to the visitors in her long black robe and white cap, with flapping wings, underneath which was a peaceful, gentle old face, which Peter knew well.

"Sister Marie," he said, eagerly, "I am Peter Blake; let me see my poor mother at once."

With hushed and labored tread the two young men followed the sister down the sick ward of the hospital, between rows of beds, where worn and suffering faces lay upon the pillows. It was a dark and gloomy room, for the windows were set high and far apart in the thick stone walls. The low moaning of the sea breaking on the shore filled the air. At the farthest end of the ward, on a low, narrow bed in the darkest corner, lay Peter's mother, with her face turned toward the old cradle, which stood between her bed and the wall. Her dark eyes were half open, and fastened upon it. But she did not stir at the sound of footsteps drawing near, nor as their shadows fell across her.

JOSHUA—SUCCESSOR TO MOSES.

S. S. Lesson for July 1, Joshua 1:1-18. Golden Text, Eph. 6:10. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Key-note of the Book—The Death of Moses Indispensable—Joshua's Record—Failure of Believers to take Possession of the Ground—Intellectual Faith Vain—The Contract with Joshua—Boundaries of the Land—God not Joshua Invincible—The Reservoir of Courage and Strength—The Orders of the People—Questions never Considered—God Responsible—Power with God Inducing Popular Confidence.

THE name Joshua is the same as Jesus, i.e., Saviour or Deliverer, and consequently the book of Joshua is full of God's deliverance. The book of the law, the five books of Moses, tell man what he ought to do, but in the book of Joshua there is power for victory, it is not "you ought" but "you can": the Lord Himself unfolds His truth to us that we may not only get head knowledge about the way of deliverance, but "that we being delivered out of the hand of our enemies, may serve Him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before Him all the days of our life" (Luke 1:74).

One thing was indispensable to the career of Joshua, it was the death of Moses, the representative of the law. Until we are free from the "I must, I ought" of the law, we do not know of the grace of God; "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me" (Phil. 4 : 13). Moses was called "the servant of the Lord;" and it was after his death that the Lord said to Joshua, Moses' minister, "Moses My servant is dead; now therefore arise, go over Jordan, thou, and all this people, unto the land which I do give them." Joshua had faithfully followed Moses for many years. When Moses went up into Mount Sinai, Joshua accompanied him after all the elders of Israel tarried behind (Ex. 24 : 13, 14), and he was with Moses on his return from the mountain (Ex. 32 : 17), and he was in the tabernacle when God descended upon it and "spake unto Moses face to face, as a man speaketh unto his friend (Ex. 33 : 11). Joshua again was one of the two faithful spies who brought up a good report of the land which they had searched unto the children of Israel, and he alone with Caleb was exempt from the judgment pronounced upon that generation, that they should die in the wilderness and not see the good land which God had promised them (Num. 14 : 6–10; 22–24; 36–38).

"Moses My servant is dead, now therefore arise." Joshua may have felt very helpless without the presence of him whom he had served so many years. And just as helpless does a child of God find himself when the impetus of "I ought" and "I must" is taken away, unless indeed he has accepted Jesus as his victorious power and strength, and has learned to glory in his infirmities that "the power of Christ" may rest upon him. Oh, how many believers there are among us who not only accept pardon in Christ but also present their bodies a living sacrifice to Him (Rom. 12 : 1), and yet fail to

of the ground which Jesus has overcome; and who thus remain burdened, anxious, dissatisfied, powerless and inconsistent. God calls for progress in our experience, and leads us on to possession; "Go over this Jordan," let no barrier stand between you and the promises of God. "Go over this Jordan, thou and all this people, unto the land which I do give to them, even to the children of Israel. Every place that the sole of your foot shall tread upon, that have I given unto you as I said unto Moses." Every gift of God's brings responsibility upon us to accept or to reject it. All, all is grace, but God's grace is accepted grace or rejected grace with every one of us. A land lay before the children of Israel, but no inch of ground was theirs until and bore their weight upon it. Exactly thus is it with the promises of God. We do not possess them simply by an assent to the fact that God has given them to us, we have to set the sole of our foot upon them, to put them to the proof whether they will bear or no; and then we know, with the most absolute certainty, that He has given them to us.

No man is saved simply by accepting the fact, intellectually, that Jesus died for his sins, but let a man, awakened by the Spirit of God to know he is on the way to an eternity unprovided for, and a judgment which he cannot escape, let him rest the weight of his guilty soul on the blessed fact that "the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all," and he finds that the salvation of God is his. Let a man who, under the power of some bondage to sin, longs for deliverance, lay hold of the blessed truth that "the blood of Jesus Christ, His Son, cleanseth us from all sin" (1 John 1 : 7), that "sin shall not have dominion over [us], for we are not under the law but under grace" (Rom. 6 : 14), and let him claim this cleansing and this emancipation now as his, and praising God for it, meet ever rising of the sin by the fact that the blood does cleanse him, that the sin has not dominion, that he is delivered from the power of darkness (Col. 1 : 13), and he will know that he is in possession of the inheritance. To know about salvation is not to be saved, to know about cleansing and deliverance from sin is neither to be cleansed nor delivered; and equally so is it with healing of the body. Speculation and theory are one thing, faith and experience another, and it will always be a law of faith, "Every place that the sole of your foot shall tread upon, that have I given you, as I said."

The bounds of the land to be possessed were described by God to Joshua, just as formerly He had declared to Abraham in Gen. 15 : 18 and to Moses in Ex. 23 : 31, and not as in the more limited boundary described by Him to Moses in Num. 34 : 3–12. And his faithful God said to Joshua personally that which He had formerly said to the people through Moses, "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life" (Deut. 7 : 24), and added "as I was with Moses, so I will be with thee, I will not fail thee nor forsake thee." This was a promise of certain victory, and consequently Joshua never expected to be defeated; he had God's Word to rely upon, and he counted upon it. It was not promised that Joshua should never fail, there was it was God who should not fail.

When shall we be weaned from the terrible and God-dishonoring tendency of our natural hearts which expects victory from our own selves, and which says like Peter, "Though I should die with Thee yet will I not deny Thee" instead of reckoning solely on the stupendous fact that the God who created us has Himself guaranteed our success so long as we look off from all else unto Him. Let us examine any failure of ours, in patience, gentleness, unselfishness, or aught else: How did it come about? Some unlooked-for circumstance arose, we determined not to fail the Lord, and perhaps did our poor best, only to be defeated. Why did we not praise the Lord, that under no provocation from men or circumstances we could find that He had failed us?

The Lord called on Joshua to "be strong and of a good courage." This was in repetition of what He had formerly said to Joshua by Moses, before he died (Deut. 31 : 7, 23), and now. He repeated the same command thrice. God never wastes words, never repeats unnecessarily. He knew that it needed strength and courage to face the giant inhabitants and the cities walled up to heaven which awaited the people in Canaan, and above all He knew that it needeth strength and courage then, as it needs strength and courage now, to obey His Word unswervingly. "Only be thou strong and very courageous that thou mayest observe to do according to all the law which Moses My servant commanded thee: turn not from it to the right hand or to the left, that thou mayest prosper whithersoever thou goest." In the midst of a world in which the majority are really unbelievers, really unconverted, it takes no small strength and courage to go against the grain of those around us, of society in general, and to find ourselves alone, because we will not turn from the Word of God to the right hand or to the left. But while we stand our ground, firm on the Word of God, no man can stand against us. Men may argue, may conceit themselves that in argument they have the best of it, but they cannot get away from the consciousness that there is a something about a God-filled man which is unconquerable, that behind and beneath all their reasonings there are facts and realities which they can neither explain away nor disprove. The moment we come down to man's level and argue point to point, men can get the better of us; "The children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light" (Luke 16 : 8). But when like our Lord with His opponents, we take them out of their depth and bring them into His presence, they cannot stand before us.

AGAINST THE CURRENT

OUR REAL STRENGTH

and courage is in the constantly realized fact that the Lord our God is with us withersoever we go. Circumstances and experiences may be apparently altogether against us, what does it matter? if the Lord be with us He is equal to them all; He sees where we cannot see; and He brings the blind by a way that they know not (Isa. 42 : 16). The strength of Joshua was not in any gift imparted to him, we have no evidence of his being a learned man like Moses, and physically he was certainly less strong (comp. Josh. 23 : 1; 24 : 9, with Deut. 34 : 7). The sole source of Joshua's strength was the presence of his God, maintained by his use of the written Word. We find that although the Lord spoke to Joshua directly as He had done to Moses, nevertheless Joshua was in no way independent of the then written Scriptures (Deut. 31 : 24–26), they were not to depart out of his mouth, i.e., he was to speak in Scripture language, and he was to "meditate therein day and night," i.e., to let them sink into his heart and mind and conscience. Oh, how many come to the Word of God in a critical spirit as though they were masters of divine and spiritual knowledge just as they may be of some earthly science! But in the revelation of God we can understand only as we submit; our reason is not the key to it, the Spirit of God alone is the key, and only as we come to it in the Spirit are its truths clear to us, "because they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. 2 : 14).

Straight from his communing with God, Joshua went forth to the officers of the people and gave orders that the people should prepare food, for within three days they should pass over Jordan, to go in and possess the land which the Lord gave them to possess it. Did it strike him to think what means were to be taken to cross the river? That was

GOD'S RESPONSIBILITY;

He could not in His capacity of Father to Israel (Ex. 4 : 22), command an impossibility without Himself undertaking to make it possible; the officers and people saw that Joshua trusted God, and we do not read of one individual who disputed, or even asked a question. Joshua went, strong in the Lord to the people, and found them prepared of God to receive all which he said to them. More and more do we find in experience that in all our dealings with others, especially those who are in any way committed to our care, the more we deal with God about them, the more power we have over them; the way of the throne is always the most direct way to reach our end.

It was no easy thing for Joshua to step into the place of such a man as Moses, but God made everything perfectly easy and natural. He reminded the Reubenites, Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh of the word of Moses that though they had chosen their inheritance on the wilderness side of the Jordan, yet they should pass over before their brethren around all the mighty men of valor and help them until they had obtained their possession, and then return to inherit their own. This would have been just the opportunity for rebellion on the part of these tribes, but the hand of the Lord was upon them. There was a unanimous agreement among the people to submit to the man of God's choice. And they answered Joshua, saying, "All that thou commandest us we will do, and whithersoever thou sendest us, we will go. According as we hearkened unto Moses in all things, so will we hearken unto thee; only the Lord thy God be with thee as He was with Moses. Whosoever he be that doth rebel against thy commandment, and will not hearken unto thy words in all that thou commandest him, he shall be put to death; only be strong and of a good courage." What had Joshua now to fear? The walls of Jericho, the waters of Jordan were nothing compared to wills of a "stiff necked and rebellious people;" if these were subdued, God was indeed with him. Well may we believe his heart overflowed with gratitude for the faithfulness of his God. And we, standing on the ground of God's faithfulness to His promises, may know uninterruptedly the same experience of victory, if only we are "strong in the Lord and in the power of His might" (Eph. 6 : 10).

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Shocking Disaster Occurred on Saturday last in Sunderland, England, by which 188 children lost their lives. The accounts of the calamity bear a striking resemblance to the circumstances of the recent disaster on the Brooklyn Bridge. At the close of a conjuror's entertainment in a public hall which was attended by several thousand children, twelve hundred of the little ones came rushing downstairs from the gallery. At the foot of the upper flight of stairs there was an obstruction, and one of the children fell and was unable to rise, owing to the others crowding on. The result was that a great number were pushed down, trampled on, and either suffocated or crushed to death. The scene was terrible, and no effort could stop the mad rush of the affrighted children. They came on madly pell mell, and soon 188 of them were knocked down and killed by others trampling upon them. Many of the victims and others who were not killed had their clothing torn from their bodies in the struggle. The ages of the children known to have been killed ranged from four to fourteen years.

The Trial of the Dynamite Conspirators in London has ended in the conviction of four of them and the acquittal of two. The four convicted men, Dr. Gallagher, Wilson, Whitehead and Curtin were each sentenced to penal servitude for life. The lawyer who defended one of the prisoners used language in the course of his speech which elicited the condemnation of the judges and the government lawyer. He said it must be remembered that the prisoner was a resident of Brooklyn and could not be judged by the same standard as an Englishman was. It was a matter of common knowledge that plots existed in America for the manufacture of dynamite for use against England, almost with the connivance of the American Government. Judge Brett declared that counsel had no right to make such a remark. He said there was no proof of the existence in America of plots or of connivance thereat on the part of the government of that country. Lord Chief Justice Coleridge also rebuked the lawyer for his remark. He said: "I think it is only due to our friendly relations with a great government that you unreservedly withdraw your statement." The lawyer then obediently made his retraction.

The Danger Impending over the Informers in the recent trials for the murder of Lord F. Cavendish and Mr. Burke has increased as the convicted men were executed. It is believed that the police are cognizant of the fact that a society has been recently formed in Dublin for the purpose of removing all informers, particularly James Carey. It is also stated that houses in which the society has held meetings have been closely watched, and a raid was made recently on a house where it was supposed a meeting was being held, but no arrests were effected. James Carey has been permitted to go out of Kilmainham Jail occasionally of late, but this has now been stopped, as the police decline to hold themselves responsible for his safety.

The Chinese Minister at St. Petersburg has been interviewed by a correspondent of the New York Herald, and in the course of a lengthy exposition of the international difficulty with France said that before entering upon her present campaign in Tonquin France had been explicitly warned that such an expedition would involve Chinese hostility. He said: "The Chinese Government has not allowed the French to go so far without giving them an opportunity of retiring gracefully from their untenable position. As far back as 1880 the Chinese Minister at Paris explained to the French Foreign Minister—then M. de Freycinet—the relations which Tonquin, as a part of Annam territory, bore to China. M. de Freycinet declared distinctly that the French Government had no intention whatever of doing anything in Tonquin. About the end of the same year rumors of a French expedition again cropping up, I again reminded the French Minister that the King of Annam was a vassal of China, and clearly informed him that China would not remain a passive spectator of another attempt to disturb the relations of her vassal. From then to now correspondence has been going on between the two governments."

That China is being Encouraged by Germany to resist the French advances in Tonquin is a growing conviction in Europe. The German correspondent of the New York Herald cables that he is assured that China will by simply leaving the Tonquin question unsettled, by secretly encouraging the warlike Tartars to take service in Annam, by making a semblance of continued preparations, by being constantly alert—in short, by executing Fabian strategy on a most gigantic scale—create a permanent drain on the fighting strength of France and diminish her importance as a factor in the politics of Europe. Meanwhile orders have been received from Pekin giving employment to extra hands in the Krupp factory, and telegraphic instructions have been received at Stettin from Shanghai to construct a steel cruiser, several steel guns and torpedo boats, and a floating dock. It is reported that at least five officers of the Prussian staff have received tempting offers to enter the Chinese service.

The Czar of Russia has Displayed his Clemency in a few isolated cases in honor of his coronation. He has commuted the death sentences of three Nihilists to penal servitude for an indefinite period, and reduced the life sentence of another to eight years' penal servitude, and the sentences of two women to four years' penal servitude. He has also mitigated the sentences of three less conspicuous offenders. It is stated that in consequence of the riots which occurred during the coronation week the chief of the Moscow police is about to replace the chief of the St. Petersburg police. The principal firms are required to furnish written promises not to give their workmen a holiday on the occasion of the Czar's state entry into the capital, the object being to prevent further disorders. Mr. George Augustus Sala, the well-known newspaper correspondent, who reported the coronation for the English press, says that the real story of the coronation pageant has not been told. The mobs cheered by order of the police. The officials simulated a confidence they did not feel in the loyalty of the people, but were actually in constant dread. All the telegrams sent were carefully scrutinized and adapted. The newspaper dispatches were opened and doubtful passages obliterated.

Further Details of the Treaty of Peace Between Chile and Peru are telegraphed from Lima. These dispatches state that Chile will not alter the arrangement about guano and saltpetre made in February, 1882, that the net profit of 1,000,000 tons, deducting all expenses, be equally divided between the Chilean and Peruvian bondholders. These profits only come out of the islands now worked, as future mines found in annexed territories belong exclusively to Chile, who can dispose of such newly-discovered mines at will. Chile does not hold herself responsible for any indebtedness of Peru. Chile holds the sovereignty of the Lobos Islands until sufficient guano is extracted to fulfil the sale of 1,000,000 tons. When the treaty is ratified Chile turns over to Peru fifty per cent of the net proceeds from the Lobos Islands. Lastly, the commercial relations and indemnities to Chilean citizens will be discussed afterward.

A Long Debated Reform in the English marriage laws has at length advanced a stage in the House of Lords. The English law forbids the marriage of a widower with the sister of his dead wife, and many efforts have been made to obtain the repeal of the statute. They have until last week always been defeated by the Bishops who have seats in the House, and by peers whom they influenced. On June 11th, however, the bill passed its second reading by a vote of 165 to 158. The Prince of Wales, the Duke of Connaught, and the Duke of Albany voted for it, and the two archbishops and nineteen bishops voted against it. One of the royal princes gave a reason for supporting the bill amusing for its inadequacy. When asked why he and his brothers took so much interest in the measure and gave it their support, he replied that they had seen in the colonies the frequent introduction of deceased wives' sisters into society, and that it had become necessary to adapt the general law of the empire to that which was already the law of the colonies.

An Enthusiastic Celebration in Honor of the Right Hon. John Bright took place last week in Birmingham, England, a town he has represented in Parliament for more than a quarter of a century. It commenced with a procession of delegates from various liberal societies, a mile and a half in length, which passed in review before Mr. Bright and saluted him. One of the chief features of the day's celebration was the presentation of a gold medal to Mr. Bright. The demonstrations at the railway station when Mr. Bright arrived and throughout the line of march resembled a royal progress. The route of the procession, which was five miles long, was densely crowded with people.

The Livingstone Inland Mission Inaugurated by Mr. and Mrs. H. Grattan Guinness is making progress on the Congo. Mr. Guinness writes: "Dr. Sims and Mr. Clarke [whose portraits have been published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD] announce the completion of our chain of stations through the Cataract Region, by the erection of one at Leopoldsville on Stanley Pool. With the location of Dr. Sims and party at Stanley Pool ends the first section of the history of the Livingstone Inland Mission. The doubtful dream of 1878 is, thank God, the accomplished fact of 1883; our chain of mission stations and boats connects at last the coast with the Upper Congo. Half Africa now lies open before us, no longer shut out by an impenetrable barrier, but comparatively easy of access. The new stage in the progress of the mission which now opens before us is the transport of the Henry Reed steamer from London to Stanley Pool, and her reconstruction there. She is now ready to be launched, and is a beautiful little vessel, exactly adapted to the work and to the sphere for which she is destined."

An Eight Days' Gospel Temperance Mission in Exeter Hall, London, commenced on May 27th, and was largely attended. Mr. R. T. Booth, Mr. F. Murphy, and T. E. Murphy were among the speakers. It is estimated that about a million persons have put on the blue ribbon in connection with Mr. R. T. Booth's meetings since he went to England, and nearly twice the number in connection with meetings of Mr. F. Murphy and his son. Among the eminent gentlemen who presided at the meetings were four members of Parliament, each of whom wore the blue ribbon. Among the speakers were Rev. C. Spurgeon, Hudson Taylor, W. Noble, and Henry Varley. In connection with the mission there have been two noon prayer-meetings daily, which were conducted by Mr. Francis Murphy and Mr. T. E. Murphy.

Herr F. Van Schluembach, whose Work was so signally blessed in this country, is laboring successfully in Germany. He has been enabled to raise funds for the purchase of The Prince Blucher, a disreputable rumshop on the Weddingplatz in Berlin, and has fitted it up as a centre for religious work among the workingmen. It contains comfortably furnished rooms where they can find rest, refreshment, and Christian literature, and the Christian Association meetings and Sunday-schools are also held there. The Emperor and the Crown Prince contributed toward the fund for its purchase.

ON the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week appears the portrait of a gentleman whose name is held in high honor throughout the whole of Canada. The Hon. Samuel H. Blake, though still in middle-age, has won a reputation in political, social, legal, and religious circles such as few men of his years have ever attained. He is respected as an able statesman, a learned and just judge and a genial, accomplished gentleman; and above all his sterling Christian character has commanded the esteem of the whole community. It has too often happened that men, who in public life have by their splendid genius attained honorable positions, and gained the admiration of their fellow citizens, have by their private lives forfeited their esteem. Of such men we speak as the inspired penman wrote of Naaman the Syrian: "He was a great man and honorable; he was also a mighty man in valor, but he was a leper." So numerous have been these sad cases in the roll of history of all countries, that men and especially young men have been led to think that success in public life is only to be won by those who have little principle and no religion. It is therefore with especial gratification that we dwell on the life of Mr. Blake, who is a conspicuous example of the possibility of achieving one of the highest places in his chosen profession, and yet retaining his integrity unblemished and his Christian character unsullied.

Mr. Blake comes of a family eminent for its legal talents. His father, the late Hon. W. H. Blake, held for thirty years the honorable and responsible position of chancellor of the province of Ontario, and during the whole of that time conducted the business of his court, which is the most difficult of all branches of judicial work, with conspicuous ability and success. The legal profession of Canada also numbered among its honored members an uncle and a brother of the subject of our sketch.

Mr. Samuel H. Blake, who was the second son of the Chancellor, was on August 31st, 1835. He received his early education at the Upper Canada College, where the characteristics which have distinguished him through life were conspicuously displayed. It was evident there that the boy was endowed with brilliant talents and that he had the energy, application and perseverance which so many talented boys lack. He set himself vigorously to work, and he left behind him in the college a record of which any boy might be justly proud.

At the conclusion of his college course the young man entered a house of business. He had not finally decided on a career, but it was rightly judged that a few years' application to commercial pursuits would be a valuable training for him. He remained there four years, and though at the end of that period he decided on following his father's profession, there is no doubt that the four years, experience proved beneficial. In after years, lawyers and suitors alike were astonished by the rapidity with which the affairs of his court were dispatched, a result in all probability largely due to the business-like, methodical habits acquired in his brief commercial career.

SELF-IMPOSED LABOR.

Mr. Blake commenced his legal studies in the office of his uncle. He had more extensive ideas of the qualifications necessary for success than the majority of young men so situated, and he resolutely set himself to the task of acquiring them. Like Lord Brougham he had a vigorous appetite for work, and not content with the labors demanded of him in the office, he resolved to read for a University degree. The spectacle of the young lawyer's clerk thus doing double service is one that is worthy of notice. We are sufficiently familiar with the perfunctory studies of most young men so situated. A day spent in the arduous legal study necessary to insure successfully passing the examination at the end of the course, naturally leaves both mind and body weary and spiritless. It is then that the temptations of the theatre or the concert-room appeal most powerfully to the jaded youth in need of change and recreation, and none but those who have passed through the ordeal can realize the courage and resolution required to sit down again to study. It is by men capable of performing such self-imposed labor that the prizes of life are won. The young man who cannot say "no" to an invitation to a party, who yields to the solicitation of friends, who succumbs before the inevitable headache and the terrible weariness of protracted study, may manage in after life to perform his duties efficiently, but he is little likely to win the more brilliant prizes of his profession. It is only by unremitting arduous labor that such prizes are gained, and the honors that afterward fell to the lot of Mr. Blake were so purchased. It was a period of intense application and of persevering toil, and it had its reward. In 1858 Mr. Blake had gained both the honors for which he had struggled; he received his B.A. degree, and passed his legal examination admitting him to practise as a lawyer.

Mr. Blake then commenced business in partnership with his brother, the Hon. Edward Blake. He did not, however, diminish his labors; he at once commenced studying for the higher branch of the profession, which under English customs is separated from that of a solicitor. Two years of patient study carried on simultaneously with his practice as a solicitor sufficed, and Mr. Blake rose from the ranks and was "CALLED TO THE BAR."

The duties of his new position were essentially different from those of an ordinary lawyer. The Canadian and English barrister does not attend to the routine duties of the legal profession. He appears in wig and gown in the superior courts, and there pleads from a brief prepared by the solicitor in the case. His "opinions" are sought by solicitors in difficult cases, and are paid for at high rates. Mr. Blake speedily became known as a barrister of learning and eloquence, and his services were in general requisition. Now he began to reap the fruits of the harvest he had sown in the toil and weary plodding of his early years. It was unnecessary for him to search through legal authorities before writing his opinion on the cases submitted to him, or to search for precedents before pleading in court. That work had all been done in the nights when he had stored his memory with dry facts and records, while other young men were seeking pleasure and recreation in more or less questionable scenes. He thoroughly knew all the legal lore with which the successful barrister must be familiar, and his opinions were sound and his arguments convincing. At the end of twelve years Mr. Blake had attained the most prominent position at the bar, and was invested with which marks the coveted rank of Queen's Counsel, and was entitled to append the initials Q.C. to his name.

That distinction, however, was speedily eclipsed. In December of the same year—1872—Mr. Blake was raised to the bench as Junior Vice-Chancellor. In Canada as in England the judicial office is not an elective one; the judges are appointed nominally by the Queen, but really by the Premier and his Cabinet. The honor of the appointment in Mr. Blake's case was peculiarly gratifying to the recipient. It marked in an especial manner the public appreciation of his talents and acquirements. The Premier of the day, who had the vacant office at his disposal had doubtless many political allies in the legal profession, but in making the appointment they were all passed over, and overlooking the claims of friendship and political affinity he appointed Mr. Blake, who was his uncompromising opponent in politics; thus rendering homage to proved capacity.

Mr. Blake accepted the proffered honor, though at some personal sacrifice. So splendid a reputation had he made at the bar that his annual income from his profession amounted to $15,000, while the stipend of the post he accepted was but $5000. Three years afterward a further tribute was paid to Mr. Blake's abilities and character. In 1875 he was made Senior Vice Chancellor, and was probably the first man who ever occupied that exalted position at the age of forty. On the bench as at the bar, in the lawyer's office, and at college, the same characteristics manifested themselves. Mr. Blake's most conspicuous trait of indomitable energy made itself felt in his court. Careful and painstaking as he was, anxious above all things to ascertain all the facts in a case, and to do justice without fear or favor, there was no block, no delay in his court. Concentrating all his attention on the issue before him, that was adjudicated before anything else was attended to, and by patient, methodical industry, the docket was kept clear. When in the fall of last year Mr. Blake resigned, there did not remain a single unadjudicated case awaiting his decision. The fact is eloquent in praise of his industry and judicial ability. As a leader in

THE CAUSE OF RELIGION,

Mr. Blake has been distinguished by the same characteristics as have marked his legal career. Whatsoever he has found to do, he has done with his might. The Sunday-school has found in him a regular, punctual, and efficient teacher, and though burdened with serious responsibilities, and having to perform duties demanding severe mental labor, he has never suffered his duties as a Sunday-school teacher to be neglected. He has also assisted other teachers by holding a class for their benefit every Saturday afternoon to aid them in the study of the International lesson for the following day. When the International Convention of Sunday-schools assembled in Toronto last year Mr. Blake was appropriately chosen President, and very ably performed the duties of the office.

The Young Men's Christian Association of the city has also availed itself of Mr. Blake's abilities and his obliging disposition. He has during the past four years held the office of President of the Association, and has labored indefatigably to promote its efficienty and extend its usefulness.

PUBLIC SERVICES.

In addition to these duties Mr. Blake has been an active and earnest public speaker in the cause of Christ. A devoted adherent of the Episcopal Church, he has taken a lively interest in all the agencies adopted by her to extend the kingdom of Christ on earth, and he has neglected no opportunity of speaking when it was thought his eloquence would be the means of stimulating Christian effort, or increasing Christian benevolence. That he has been able to fulfil so many engagements while neglecting no judicial duty has often caused the surprise of those who have observed him. He has often been seen on an evening when he was announced to speak or preside at a meeting in some distant city, sitting in his court patiently listening to counsel or delivering an elaborate judgment on some intricate case. The last train departed, and those who knew of his engagement have concluded that for once the Vice-Chancellor would miss an appointment. But punctual to the minute, the judge would be seen entering the place of meeting, having driven over in his sleigh undeterred by the cold of the winter night, after his court had closed. The subject of the meeting would have his undivided attention; he would listen and speak upon it as if it had been the one study of his life, showing familiarity with all its details, and giving wise, practical counsel on its operation; he would wait until the close of the meeting, and then wrapping himself in his familiar fur robe would ride back quered the emotion, he begged my pardon for his conduct, and since then every boy in the class has professed to have given his heart to the Lord Jesus. How faithful God is! Oh, that we may be faithful to Him!"

Thankful for an Annoyance.—The Rev. Mr. Scott said: "The other day I was a little put out by a certain thing for which I was to blame. At night I was thinking over the events of the day, and of course this thing recurred to my mind. I was much troubled about it, and turned for consolation to the Word of God The text I lighted upon was 'Giving thanks always for all things.' I found it very difficult to give thanks for this annoyance, but by laying it before the Lord I was enabled to do it. We should give thanks to our Father, even when we suffer, because we know that if it were well for us, He would take away the suffering of whatever kind it might be. 'All things work together for good to them that love God.'"

A Sick-Bed Bargain.—Dr. Cameron said: "I know an instance which illustrates very graphically the insincerity of sick-bed repentance. Lately a young man was stricken with an alarming illness while in the height of this world's frivolous enjoyments. Lying on his bed in a darkened room, his mind was deeply stirred with a ghastly fear of future punishment for his sins. Moved by his selfish dread of hell, he thought he would bargain with God, and vowed that, if he recovered, his life would be dedicated to the Saviour, and, as a natural consequence, he would lead a different life. The Lord heard his vow, and gave him an opportunity of performing it by restoring him to health. For a month he endeavored to keep a part of his promise by leading a less dissipated life, but did not cast himself at the feet of Christ for mercy, or seek the new birth by the Holy Spirit, or obtain cleansing in the precious fountain of the blood of Jesus. Within thirty days of rising from his sick-bed he returned like the dog to his sin, and is now a very leader in wickedness."

How to Win the Battle.—Mr. Stewart said: "If there is one thing which pleases me more than another in the meetings in Cowcaddens, it is the perfect equality which prevails among the workers. Earnest, willing, hearty work is all that is needed to secure respect. In the battle of Balaklava, a company of Highlanders lost their officers just before a certain charge was made. Each man was therefore doing the best he could, but not one thought of turning back, or quarrelling with his comrade. One stalwart Highlander had fired his gun, and before it could be loaded again the Russians were upon them. Using the butt-end of his musket, he made terrible havoc among the Russians. While engaged in this hand-to-hand fight, an officer rode up with a message from the Commander-in-chief. Seeing no officer, he shouted, 'Who is in command here?' The Highlander shouted back, 'Hoot awa mon, we're a' commandin' oursels here.' That's how our Christian work goes on so smoothly; all are in earnest to serve Christ, and to defeat the great enemy of souls."

An Amused Artist.—Major Colquhoun said: "I remember a gentleman by birth, and an artist by profession. A few weeks ago he entered this church, and I noticed him, standing in the passage on my left among a small group of men who were urging him to give his heart to the Saviour. He was much amused at strangers taking so great an interest in him, and hardly understood the motives which caused them to do so. The minister who spoke that night was pressing home the truth upon his mind when I joined them, but the artist, in a careless sort of way, said, 'I'm not so bad as you seem to think; though I've been drinking lately, it is only once or so in the year that I give way as I have done this time.' When we parted he was impressed with the need of a change in himself, and said, 'Call upon me at my studio.' I had a feeling that if I could visit him the Lord would give me that soul to garner in. I called three times, but the door was locked each time. Again I called, and this time I left a card, saying that I desired to see him about his soul's salvation. This was the last message he received on earth about the eternal truths of the Gospel. One day shortly afterward I saw him in the street talking with a friend, and though I desired to speak with him, I could not do so. Next day a notice of his death appeared in the papers. 'Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation.'"

A Coal-heaver Saved.—Mr. J. C. White said: "One night I met a young man in the inquiry-room, about thirty-five or thirty-six years of age, and he told me he had lost about a dozen excellent situations on account of his indulgence in strong drink; in fact, he has been brought so low that he is now carrying coals for a livelihood, and his wife is almost broken-hearted. He added, 'Three nights ago I yielded my heart to the Lord.' As I was going out of the church, he said, 'Can you tell me what to do to resist this demon of drink that has been breaking me down? for I am determined, by the Lord's grace, to overcome it.' Several Christians had conversation with him, and we have reason to believe that he is trusting in Christ to give him the victory. He was full of joy to find that salvation and deliverance lay wholly outside of himself. He remarked, 'I was allus told before that I must do my best; but I find I cannot do my best.'"

A "Silly" Girl's Salvation.—The Rev. Mr. Torrance said: "An old Scotch minister from the north of Scotland, on his way to the General Assembly, in Edinburgh, put up for a night at a roadside inn. Before going to bed he proposed to the host to have family worship. This was readily agreed to, and the inmates of the house were assembled together. The minister inquired of the host, 'Is every soul in the house or about it gathered here?' 'Oh, yes.' 'Are you quite sure?' 'Yes, I am; there's only a half-silly girl left out, and there's no use asking her in, as she wouldn't understand a single word you said.' 'Send for her immediately.' When she came, the minister paid her special attention, but found she was so ignorant that in the time he had to spare it was useless to try to instruct her. He knew that God could do what he could not, and asked her to repeat morning and evening the prayer, 'Lord, show me myself.' The lassie did this at first without knowing what she asked for, but soon the Lord troubled her about the daily sins of her life, and she could get no rest. On the minister's return he was gratified to see her really anxious, and told her to pray, 'Lord, show me Thyself.' God heard this cry, and showed that poor half-witted girl Jesus in all His beauty, and made her to be glad in His free and infinite salvation."

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY ON THE SECOND ADVENT.

AT a missionary meeting held in Exeter Hall, London, on May 10th, the Earl of Shaftesbury presided. His opening address was one of the most remarkable of his many speeches delivered on similar occasions. Its matter displayed a vigor of thought and there was a physical vigor in its delivery which could not have been expected on the part of a veteran of eighty-two. He referred to the fact that we must expect the conversion of the world, not from missionary efforts, but from the Second Advent of Christ. He said: "Missionary societies no longer claim the right and the power almost to cover the whole world with the Gospel, and to bring every soul to the knowledge and love of the Lord Jesus Christ. They now know what they can do, and what they are called to do. They are not called to convert the whole world—that is reserved for One greater; they are called to carry the Gospel to every living creature, and to preach it over the whole surface of the globe, to offer the Bible-message of heaven to every soul that breathes, that has a heart to feel, and a mind to understand. We have to present that in preparation for the greater event. And the greater event is the second advent of our blessed Lord and Saviour, which is the grand solution of all difficulties and the consummation of all things."

The London Christian remarks on some criticisms which a subsequent speaker made on Lord Shaftesbury's address:

"The question, as millenarians would put it, is, What is the part the Holy Spirit has undertaken to perform in connection with this present dispensation? Dr. Kennedy says it is to convert the world by the preaching of the Gospel. Lord Shaftesbury, and multitudes who with him study carefully the statements of the Word of God on the matter, say this is nowhere taught in Holy Writ. On the contrary, the purpose of the Gospel dispensation is an elective one, designed to gather out of the world a people for the name of Christ, a multitude whom no man can number, out of every kindred tribe and tongue.

"This purpose demands the most earnest and devoted energies of the Church to be directed to its accomplishment, and that right on until the Lord returns. It also becomes, when scripturally understood, one of the most powerful motives to missionary zeal, and personal concern for the salvation of men, it is possible to employ. We must honor the Holy Ghost when we accept His own teaching, and look to Him to perform His own work in His own time and way. That it is the function of the Church to present the Gospel to every creature, as far as it is possible to do so, no millenarian would deny; but to say that the commission of the Church is to convert the world is to assert what no word of Scripture implies, but what is contrary to its teaching throughout.

"The work of the Spirit in connection with the personal return and reign of Christ will be no less honoring to Himself, and blessed in its effects upon the world, than it is now in its relation to the mission of the Christian Church. The exaltation of Christ in personal triumph on the earth which was the scene of His humiliation will not detract from the glory of that divine Spirit whose office it is to testify of Christ and to glorify Him. The dispensational purposes of God form the grand and glorious theme of revelation, and as in the past of the world's history, so in the present age the divine Word shall accomplish, not what the crude theories of men deem most probable, or most desirable, but as Jehovah Himself has said in the prophecies of Isaiah, 'It shall accomplish that which I please, and prosper in the thing whereto I send it.'

"After eighteen hundred years and more of Church work we see to-day three fourths of the world still in darkness, and Christendom developing with frightful rapidity all sorts of rationalistic and antichrist forms of thought. From Dr. Kennedy's point of view, no wonder many speak of the Church's failure in face of her commission, failure for which in great part the Church, by reason of her apathy and divisions, is herself responsible. But in the light of Lord Shaftesbury's truly scriptural way of presenting the matter, while there is ample room and urgent call for ever-increasing consecration and effort on behalf of the claims of Christ and of a perishing world, there is no ground for the charge of failure, but everywhere cause for deep thankfulness and joy that the savor of Christ's name is being made manifest in every place.

"The bride is making herself ready, the Gospel is being preached in all the world for a witness, and signs everywhere being given of the near approach of that day when our absent Lord shall return, and take to Himself the heathen for His inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth for His possession. Missionary societies have nothing to fear from the views the Earl propounds, and he deserves the cordial thanks of all lovers of God's truth in its dispensational aspects for having on such an occasion drawn attention to them. If they were but studied in their Bible light and accepted in their true significance, we should see the cause of world-wide evangelization gloriously sustained and advanced."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Ohio Democratic Convention on Thursday last nominated Judge Hoadley for governor. The convention was even more uproarious than was expected, and the struggle between the friends of Judge Hoadley and those of General Durbin Ward was a severe one. The unit rule, which has been in the past a prolific source of contention, caused trouble on the first ballot, when the chairman of the Butler County delegation, which was divided, cast its vote solid for Hoadley. After a period of wild excitement Mr. McSweeney, who presided, ruled that every delegate was entitled to vote individually if he pleased. After the second ballot Judge Hoadley's nomination was made unanimous. The result is a serious disappointment to General Ward and to ex-Senator Thurman, who enthusiastically supported him, and claimed on his behalf that his splendid record of thirty years' loyal service to the party entitled him to the nomination. General Ward, in a speech delivered at a later period in the convention, intimated that he was an aspirant for a seat in the United States Senate. The Democratic candidate is said to be a vigorous advocate of unrestricted liquor traffic or of the traffic restricted only by license. The platform adopted, however, thus deals with the liquor question: "The Democratic party is, as it always has been, opposed to sumptuary legislation and unequal taxation in any form, and is in favor of the largest liberty of private conduct consistent with the public welfare and the rights of others, and of regulating the liquor traffic and providing against the evils resulting therefrom by a judicious and properly graded license system." The issue between the Republican and Democratic parties on the tariff is also sharply defined. On this question the Democrats say: "We favor a tariff for rev nue limited to the necessities of a government economically administered and so adjusted in its application as to prevent unequal burdens, encourage productive interests at home, and afford just compensation to labor, but not to create or foster monopolies." The convention also characterized the action of Congress in decreasing the duty on wool while increasing the duty on woollen goods as "iniquitous legislation discriminating in favor of monopoly and against agricultural interests." It is evident that there will be a spirited contest in the State, and a lively interest is taken in it throughout the country.

The Niobrara Contract Awarded to one of the defendants in the recent Star Route trial has been annulled. This intelligence relieves the government of a weighty responsibility. The telegram announcing the withdrawal states that it has been annulled by Second Assistant Postmaster-General Elmer. The contract was awarded on April 4th, while First Assistant Postmaster-General Hatton was Acting Postmaster-General. Judge Gresham was appointed on April 3d, and his appointment was made known on April 4th. He did not reach Washington to be sworn into office until June 11th, and when he arrived the contract was perfected. Mr. Elmer now holds that the contract was executed without express statutory authority, and that the route must be again advertised.

A Summary of the Results of the Iowa Republican county conventions yet held, on the Prohibition question, is sent to the Times by its Des Moines correspondent. From this it appears that so far there is a large majority in favor of prohibition. The correspondent states, however, that the majority will not hold good for the rest of the State for the populous counties of Dubuque, Clinton, Scott, Des Moines, Lee, and Pottawattomie, with probably others, will doubtless instruct against the measure, but making allowance for all opposition, it is safe now to predict that the State Convention will concede about all that was asked by the resolutions of the Temperance Alliance adopted on May 2d.

The Disastrous Rise in the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers last week has caused widespread anxiety. Until Thursday it was hoped that but little damage would be done; but on that day a heavy wind and rain storm raged in St. Louis and the vicinity, and gave new impetus to the raging waters. The Chouteau Island Levee, which protects east St. Louis, gave way, and the deluge flowed over a thousand acres. The water rose at the rate of a foot a day. On Saturday the Madison Dyke between St. Louis and Alton, Ill., gave way in two places, and the crevasses, though but small, at first rapidly increased by the force of the water, which caused an enormous loss of property. The farmers near the river have taken refuge on the bluffs, and at places five or six miles inland, taking with them only such live stock as could be quickly collected. The destruction of crops already reported will amount to $100,000.

The Practice of Carrying Pistols, to which reference was made in these columns last week in connection with the Dukes-Nutt shooting case, is again before the public in a conspicuous manner. On June 16th the Rev. B. F. Jenkins, a Methodist minister, at Mansfield, La., shot and killed the Rev. J. Lane Borden, who for two years has been President of the Mansfield Female College. The shooting was done on the street without a word of warning, and with a reckless disregard of the safety of bystanders. This murder is also claimed to be an act of justice inflicted as a punishment for crime. It is, however, a most deplorable state of society in which one minister of the Gospel shoots another minister, not even ascertaining whether he is guilty or not. Many other shooting cases were recorded last week, in one of which, reported in the Evening Post, two young men who attended a school exhibition, being asked not to make a noise, produced their pistols and fired at the man who spoke to them. That man, too, had his pistol ready, and promptly returned the fire. One of the combatants was mortally wounded, another badly wounded, a bystander shot dead, and one of the school-girls was struck in the cheek. In another case in New York a lady shot another lady in a physician's office. These are only a few of the many cases reported in a few days. The growing prevalence of this evil demands that all organs of public opinion resolutely and emphatically denounce the practice of carrying these deadly weapons as a disgrace to a civilized Christian community

Precautions Against Yellow Fever are Under consideration at Memphis, Tenn. The Memphis Avalanche calls the attention of all citizens to the necessity of taking steps in time for their own protection. It says: "If a quarantine is of any avail against the introduction of yellow fever, then it should be established without delay, and made rigid when deemed necessary. It does not seem to be generally understood that the Marine Hospital service is not authorized to expend any money on quarantine, nor indeed to expend a nickel until the fever actually appears or breaks out at some point; then a military cordon will be established around the plague-stricken place, and every effort made to stamp out the dreaded disease. To await its coming and then have the Marine Hospital service go to work, would be the ruin of Memphis. An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. Memphis must keep the fever out by means of a quarantine—to do otherwise would be suicidal in a business sense."

A Ghastly Discovery was made in Philadelphia on Thursday last. A family dispute was brought into court in which Dr. Hathaway, a physician, was charged with assaulting his wife and other disorderly conduct. Considerable feeling was manifested against Dr. Hathaway by one of his relatives, who made a disclosure which was reported to the district attorney. Acting upon the clue, a house the doctor had formerly occupied was searched by the police. It was found that the cellar had been used as a place of interment, and when the floor was dug up twenty-five skulls were found and other bones which were the remains of infants, and one or two adult skeletons were discovered. The doctor is over eighty years of age, and is said to have had an immense practice. The investigations are still in progress, and other houses he has occupied are being searched.

Christian Work among Commercial Travellers has been prosecuted with much success during the past two years by the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A. A report in The Watchman says: "In many cities the Association committees issue invitations to church and Association services and to the secular privileges of the societies. In many associations meetings are held specially for commercial travellers, either at the Y. M. C. A. buildings or in hotel parlors. Commercial travellers have been led to work for each other on the road, and attendance at and interest in the conventions has increased. Associations not doing anything in behalf of this class should write Mr. Watkins, 52 East Twenty-third Street, New York, for particulars and documents full of suggestive hints concerning the work."

Revival Services are Being Conducted with proofs of the divine blessing at Elmira, N. Y., by Mr. and Mrs. Clark Willson; at Kansas City, Mo., by Evangelist Harrison, and at Council Bluffs, Iowa, by Ben Hogan, the reformed pugilist.

Ten Dollars were Received at the Office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD last week by post-office order from "A Friend," who desired that it might be so acknowledged in these columns. In the letter accompanying the order, the donor says that the money is sent to pay for the paper being supplied to ministers in the South who cannot afford to pay for it themselves. "Hoping it may be productive of much good, and that the eyes of many may be opened to see the true light." We are happy to inform our friends who have contributed to this fund that the colored ministers who have received the paper, through their kindness, acknowledge the valuable aid they have derived from it.

The Mysterious Disappearance of a Baby has caused some excitement in the neighborhood of Pottsville, Pa. On June 10th a farmer and his wife with two children left their home for a stroll in the woods, intending to spend an hour or two in a favorite shady resort a quarter of a mile distant. They left their baby sleeping in the cradle. The doors of the house were left unlocked, but a faithful watch-dog remained in the yard. When the family returned, they were horrified to find that the baby was missing. The parents instituted a search, which was only terminated by darkness. No trace of the child could be found. The circumstances are extremely mysterious, and the detectives are baffled in their attempts to solve the problem. There is less mystery, and unhappily less hope, of other cases in which while parents are taking their ease and enjoying themselves, Satan has made a prey of their little ones (I. Sam. 3 : 13).

The Difference in the Value of Real Estate at two dates a quarter of a century apart is often noticed. A remarkable instance was made public last week. A well-known citizen of New York, who died a few days ago, held title in 1847 to a large estate in Ithaca, N. Y. Its value in the market at that time was comparatively small, and the owner sold portions of it for trifling amounts. One section of eight acres he sold for three thousand dollars, which was then considered a fair price, but if the same section were placed in the market to-day it would readily bring $100,000 or more. When the Christian sings of his title to "mansions in the skies" he is often despised as a credulous fanatic, but though that title cannot be bought or sold, the time will come when its value in the eyes of the world will be so great that they would count all they ever possessed well paid for it (James 2 : 5, 6).

The Unintentional Mystification of a Jury was very thoroughly effected by a judge and two eminent lawyers. The incident is related in a biography recently published. The jury was empannelled to try a patent right suit at Albany, N. Y., before Judge Nelson. William H. Seward was counsel on one side. In summing up he occupied a whole day. The counsel on the other side made a long speech, and the judge charged. After the jury had been out about two hours they came into court, and the foreman said: "Your honor, the jury would like to ask a question." Judge.—You can proceed. Foreman.—Well, your honor, we would like to know what this suit is about? Both the counsel doubtless delivered very eloquent and learned speeches, and Judge Nelson's charge was probably a profound address, but as the jury did not know what the case was about after listening to all three, the harangues could not be considered successful. Sinners anxious for salvation frequently leave our churches after very learned and eloquent sermons similarly unenlightened (I Cor. 1 : 17–19).

An Aged German Lady's Long Journey is described in a press telegram from Wheeling, W. Va. It states that the lady, who is eighty-three years of age, is lying sick in that city, having travelled there on foot from a distant town in Ohio. She has until recently resided in the Ohio town with her daughter, who is a widow. But the daughter contemplated a second marriage, and the man she intends marrying stipulated that the old lady should quit the house before the ceremony. The heartless daughter complied, and on June 11th turned her mother out of doors without a dollar in her pocket. The old lady set out to find another daughter at Pittsburg, Pa., a journey of over two hundred miles. She begged food from farmhouses on her route, and arrived at Pittsburg on June 19th, having covered most of the distance on foot. Disappointment awaited her there; the daughter was dead and her husband had left the place. Weary and heartbroken, she turned back to make another appeal to her daughter in Ohio, but she could get no farther than Wheeling, where she fell ill and is likely to die. Ingratitude such as this excites universal indignation, but even the conduct of the unnatural daughter in casting off her mother to please her suitor does not equal in baseness the conduct of men who deny, to please the world, or to secure a position in society, the Saviour who died for them (Heb. 10 : 29).

A Woman's Energy Saved a Large Number of lives in New Hampshire on June 14th. She had occasion to cross the track of the Nashua and Rochester Railroad near Nashua about noon of that day, and was startled at seeing a large pile of lumber laid across the track. She knew that a passenger train would be due in a short time at the spot, and quickly realized that some wicked men had placed the obstruction there with the design of wrecking the train. She looked around for a man to remove the lumber, but in vain, and she calculated that before she could give an alarm at the depôt and the company could send a gang to clear the track, the train would have arrived. It was evident that she alone could save the train. She did not hesitate, but commenced the arduous task of removing the lumber, and had the satisfaction of dragging the last piece off the track just before the train came in sight. It was a noble act for a woman to perform; it was a type of the work that has been done in the moral and spiritual world in which gigantic obstructions have often been overthrown by apparently inadequate agency (1 Cor. 1 : 26–29).

A Remarkable Avowal was Uttered at an execution on Friday last by one of the four culprits who paid the last penalty of the law. The men had been convicted of attempting to rob a passenger train on the Little Rock and Fort Smith Railroad on March 7th. They had boarded the train near Van Buren, Ark., and soon after the train started they commenced firing their pistols, and one of them shot the conductor. They made their escape without succeeding in the robbery, but were captured and tried and convicted. Immediately before the execution on Friday, the leader of the gang, Gov. Johnson, who was the son-in-law of a minister in Illinois, declared himself a fast disciple of Colonel Ingersoll, but admitted that his doctrines had failed as a rule of life and would not at all serve as a basis of hope in death. He attributed his moral lapse to his acquaintance with Ingersoll's doctrines. If seamen's charts were being sold in our ports, conspicuously indorsed with a publisher's name, and there came news from a wrecked ship that one of those charts had been the cause of the wreck, no one would ever rely again on that publisher's charts. This executed man's warning is such news from a wreck, the most deplorable of all wrecks, a wrecked life (Prov. 1 : 32, 33).

A Guest's Defective Memory Led to an Interesting stratagem in Washington recently. A journal of that city says that General Sherman, who is a very popular guest in Washington society, has a very unreliable memory. "The other night he came out on his doorstep in a great hurry. He was in dinner dress, but hesitated after he came out of the door. Mrs. Sherman, who was in the hall, asked what was the matter. 'Why,' said the general, 'I was to go to dinner somewhere to-night, and to save my life, I cannot remember where.' Mrs. Sherman came to the door, and, pointing to old General Van Vliet, who was going quietly up the street, said, 'There goes General Van Vliet. He is generally at dinners where you are invited. You follow him, and go in where he goes.' 'What a splendid idea! I can't miss it following that lead. Van Vliet can be trusted.' Away walked General Tecumseh, and, as he did not return, it was safe to conclude he found the right place." It would appear from this incident that a man may not only be known by the company he keeps, but that sometimes he may find his way by following them. There are some Christians who also appear from their conduct to have forgotten whither they are bound. In their case, however, it is better not to trust to human guidance, but to rely on their Father and His word (Jer. 3 : 12).

SUPPOSING HIM TO HAVE BEEN IN THE COMPANY.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Supposing him to have been in the company."—LUKE 2 : 44.

Lessons from a Mistake—I. A Natural Supposition—Jesus Fond of Society—Never in Wrong Places—II. It Brought Sorrow—Danger of Supposing about Jesus—Spurious Evangels Do not Suppose Him to be in the Heart—Nor in the Assembly—Nor in Christian Labor—III. Instruction from the Supposition—How He would have Behaved—Singing—Listening—Helping—How He would have been Treated—His Representatives—IV. If He is in the Company: What Then?—Mr. Payson's Solemn Question—V. Jesus has been in the Company—Hearing Disputes—Seeing Tricks of Trade—Noting the Silence of Christians—Dr. Chalmers and the Highland Chief.

ALL who were present on the occasion are sure to remember our meditation upon "Supposing Him to be the gardener." Although it was only supposition, and evidently a mistake, yet it yielded us most profitable thought. Here is another supposition, a mistake again—a mistake which yielded a good deal of sorrow to those who made it; and yet in the hands of God's Spirit it may bring forth profitable instruction to us as we think it over.

I. We will begin our discourse by saying that this was

A MOST NATURAL SUPPOSITION.

That the child Jesus should have been in the company returning to Nazareth was a most likely thing. When the Jews came up from their different allotments once in the year to Jerusalem, they formed family groups at their first starting, and then as they got a little on the road these groups combined and made larger bands; and as the roads approached to Jerusalem, the people gathered into great caravans; thus they went up to the House of God in company. It was natural enough that, when all was over at Jerusalem, the child Jesus should return home; knowing the time when His parents would return, He would be ready to start with them, and failing to meet with them He would join the company with which He came, and so go back to Nazareth.

His parents did not expect to find him wandering alone: they looked for Him in the company. Jesus was a child who loved society. He was not stoical, and thus selfishly self-contained; and He was not sullen, avoiding society. He did not affect singularity. In the highest sense He was singular, for He was "holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners;" but throughout His life He never aimed at singularity either in dress, food, speech, or behavior. He grew up to be a man among men, mixing with them even at weddings and funerals; no man was more truly human than the man Christ Jesus. It is to be believed that as a child He was like other children in all things but sin; even as a man He was like other men in all but evil. Jesus was not one whose company would be shunned because of His ill manners; rather would it be courted because of the sweetness of His disposition. He would not make Himself disagreeable, and then crown that disagreeableness by stealing away from those whom He had vexed. They knew the sweetness of their dear child's character and the sociableness of His disposition, and therefore they supposed Him to have been in the company.

This supposition would even more readily occur to us, knowing what we know about Him, which is more than His parents knew. As a man He never seemed happier than when He was in the midst of His disciples, or surrounded by publicans and sinners, or feeding famishing crowds. He was so great a lover of mankind that He loved to be "in the company." Living and working in such a city as this, with all its millions, the burden is enough to break one's heart as we consider the city's sin, its irreligion, its neglect of God. It is sweet to hope that He who loved to be "in the company" when He was here, will certainly come and bless these throngs of men.

They never suspected that He would be found in any wrong place. No thought ever crossed their minds that He would be found in any haunt of vice, or in any assembly of vanity, though such could have been found in Jerusalem. We do expect to meet our Lord amid the throng of perishing men and women, seeking and saving them; but we know that we shall not find Him among those who find pleasure in noisy laughter and lawless mirth. We never look for Jesus in the theatre or the drinking saloon; it would be profanity to suppose Him there. We never look for Him where a question of morals might be raised, for He is undefiled. Let His example be followed by us; let us never go where our Master would not have gone.

SORROW FROM SUPPOSITION.

II. But secondly, this supposition brought them great sorrow; from which I gather that we ought, with regard to the Lord Jesus Christ, to leave nothing as a matter of supposition. By supposing Him to have been in the company, they were made to miss Him, and to seek Him sorrowing for three days. Why did they lose sight of Him at all? Why did they not abide with Him? We may not blame them, for He did not; but, at any rate, they fell into days and nights of trouble by supposing something about Him. Do not suppose anything about Jesus at all. Do not suppose anything about His character, His doctrine, or His work; go in for certainty on such points. I have heard of a German who evolved a camel out of his own inner consciousness; what kind of a camel it was I do not know; but many persons evolve a Christ out of their own imaginations. Do not so; for if you do this you will make to yourselves a Christ nothing like Jesus; it will be a mere image, a false Christ, an idol Christ. No human thought could ever have invented our Saviour.

We put it to all those who doubt the inspiration of the four evangelists—would they kindly write us a fifth evangel? Would they even suggest another action of Jesus which would fit into the rest and be of the same order? They cannot do it. The whole conception of Jesus is original and divine. It is not possible that the most ingenious fancy can add anything to the life of Christ which would square with that which is recorded. If you chance to read the Prot-evangelion, or the Gospel of the Infancy, which are spurious narratives of the childhood of Jesus, you will throw them into the fire, and say at once, "These do not fit in with the records of the true evangelists; the stories are ludicrously unlike the child Jesus." In fact, all the books which pretend to be a part of the canon will be detected and rejected at once by the simplest reader who is thoroughly versed in the four evangelists. Do not, therefore, suppose anything concerning Jesus, but read the word of God and see what is revealed about Him.

"Supposing Him to have been in the company." This supposition caused them great sorrow. Again, I say, beloved, do not take anything about Jesus at haphazard and peradventure. Let this truth apply to your personal dealing with Him; as, for instance,

DO NOT SUPPOSE

Him to be in your hearts. Do not suppose that because you were baptized in infancy you are therefore in Christ and Christ in you. That is a dangerous supposition. Do not say, "But I have been baptized as a professed believer, and therefore Jesus is in my heart." The inward grace is not tied to the outward sign. Water baptism does not convey the Spirit of God. Blessed are they who, having the Spirit, can use the ordinance to their profit; but do not suppose that the grace of God is tied to any outward rite. Do not say, "I have eaten at the communion-table, and therefore Jesus is in my heart." You may eat and drink at His table, and yet never know Him, and He may never know you. Outward ceremonies convey no grace to graceless persons.

Do not suppose that Jesus is in your heart because you are an elder, or a deacon, or a pastor. I will not make any supposition in my own case, for woe is unto me if, after having preached to others, I myself should be a castaway! Such things have happened; Judas was one of the twelve. Men have been sweet of voice, and yet bitter of heart; they have been taught in the word of God as to the letter thereof, but they have not known the power of the everlasting Spirit, and so they have perished. Verily, I say unto you, in Christ's name, unless the Spirit of God do actually rest upon each one of us personally, it will be all in vain for us to suppose that He is in our hearts because of professions and ordinances, for the supposition may be a damning falsehood, and may lull us into a fatal slumber. How terrible to be taken out to execution with our eyes bandaged by a supposition!

Again, dear friends, do not ever suppose that Christ is in our assemblies because we meet in this house. Do not go up to a place of worship and say Jesus is sure to be there. He may not have been there for many a day. Is it not sad that out of the tens of thousands of assemblies held on this day there will be many in which Jesus will not be present? For His Gospel will not be preached, or if preached, it will not be set forth in the living power of the Holy Ghost. Christ is not present where He is not honored. All your architecture, all your millinery, all your music, all your learning, all your eloquence are of small account; when all these things are present in profusion; and then your public worship will only be the magnificent funeral of religion, but the life of God will be far away. It brings great sorrow in the long run to a church if they take it for granted that Jesus must be among them.

JESUS MAY BE ABSENT

Once more, let us not take it for granted that the Lord Jesus is necessarily with us in our Christian labors. Do we not too often go out to do good without special prayer, imagining that Jesus must surely be with us as a matter of course? Perhaps we thus conclude because He has been with us so long, or because we feel ourselves fully equipped for the occasion, or because we do not even think whether He is with us or not. This is perilous. If Jesus is not with us, we toil all the night and we take nothing; but if Jesus is with us, He teaches us how to cast the net, and a great multitude of fishes are taken.

He will withdraw from us if we fall into a careless, prayerless habit. Why was He not with His mother that day? Truly He had to be about the business of His heavenly Father, but why did He permit His human mother to miss Him? Was it not because she needed to be taught, as well as the rest of us, the value of His company. Perhaps, if we never missed Him, we might not know how sweet He is. I can picture Mary, when she had lost the dear child, weeping floods of tears. Then she began to understand what old Simeon meant when he said, "Yea, a sword shall pierce through thine own heart also." The sword was piercing her heart even then to prepare her for three other days in which she would mourn Him as dead with still bitterer grief.

Do, then, learn the lesson, brethren, as I desire to learn it for myself, that we must not take anything for granted about Jesus.

WE MUST MAKE SURE

work concerning eternal things, for if these be allowed to slip, where are we? Grasp the truth, and know that it is the truth. Never be satisfied with "ifs," and "buts," and "I hope so," and "I trust so," but make sure of Christ! If you are not sure about the health of your body, yet be sure about your being in Christ, and so healthy in soul. If you are not sure about the solvency of your firm, if you are not sure about the deeds of your estate, if you are not sure about your marriage lines, yet at least be sure that you have Jesus within your heart. If you have any doubt to-day, give no sleep to your eyes nor slumber to your eyelids until the Holy Ghost Himself hath sealed upon your spirit the certainty that Jesus is yours. Thus have I used the supposition in two ways.

III. Now for a third lesson: the supposition made by these two good people may instruct us. Let us use it at this time, and turn to "Supposing Him to have been in the company." I speak now to children who are hearing this sermon. This is for you. Jesus was about twelve years old, and you are of much the same age. Suppose He had been in the company returning to Nazareth.

HOW WOULD HE HAVE BEHAVED

Himself? Think of Jesus as an example for yourselves. I am sure when the whole company sang a psalm that bright-eyed boy would have been among the sweetest singers; He would have sung most heartily the praises of God His Father. I feel persuaded that Jesus would have been found in that company listening to those who talked of holy things; especially would He have been eager to hear explanations of what He had seen in the temple.

I feel sure also that if He had been in the company going home He would have been the most obliging, helpful, pleasing child in all the company; if anybody had needed to have a burden carried, this boy of twelve would have been the first to offer, as far as His strength allowed; if any kindly deed could be done, He would be first in doing it. He grew in favor both with God and men because He laid Himself out to be everybody's servant. Mary's son won the love of all around, for He was so unselfish, kind, gentle, and willing. He did all that he could to make others happy; and blessed are those boys and girls who learn this lesson well. Oh, children, you will be happy yourselves if you live to make others happy! Act thus to your parents, brothers and sisters, friends and schoolfellows, and you will in this be like Jesus. I am sure, also, that Jesus would not have done in that company as too many boys are apt to do. He would not have been mischievous, noisy, annoying, and disobedient: but He would have been a comfort and delight to all about Him. Take this little word home with you, dear children—ask yourselves often, what would Jesus do? for what Jesus would have done is the best rule for you.

And now to you elder folks, "supposing Him to have been in the company," and you had been in the company, I will warrant there is not one father or mother but what would have been

WILLING TO CARE FOR HIM.

Every matron here says, "I would have taken Him under my wing." You say that honestly, do you not? You mean it, I am sure. Well, you have an opportunity of proving that you are sincere; for Jesus is still in our company. You can find Him in the form of the poor. If you would have watched over Him, relieve their wants; do it to the least of these, and you have done it unto Him. You can find Jesus in the form of the sick; visit them. I wish more of God's people would addict themselves to calling upon the sick, visiting them in their loneliness, and cheering them in their needs. As you say you would have taken care of Jesus, prove it at once by remembering His words, "I was sick, and ye visited me."

Many among you have such fond maternal hearts that you would have said, "I must look after that bright, beautiful boy who is now without parents. Evidently He has lost them. Come here, child, come here!" You would have felt a joy to have kissed Him, and folded Him to your bosom. Prove it by looking after oprhan children wherever they are, and let each represent to you the Jesus of that day as He would have been had His parents' supposition been correct. Let us see that the love you feel to Jesus when you read your Bibles is not mere emotion or sentiment, but that practical principle lies at the back of it, and this day affects your life and conduct.

IV. But now I change the line of our thought altogether for a little while. Forget the child Jesus now, and let me use the words concerning

Jesus in the fulness of His power. Supposing Him to be in our company in all His gracious influence, what then? Then, brethren, first, how happy will such company be! For with Christ known to be in their company saints cannot but be glad. You may have seen a picture representing certain of the martyrs sitting in prison together. They are to be burned by and by, and they are comforting each other. Now, supposing Him to have been in their company, as I doubt not He was, I could wish to have been there even at the price of sharing their burning—would not you? Or see, a few poor people met together in a cottage as people seldom do now; Jesus is there, and their hearts are burning within them! How favored they are! If their hearts might otherwise have been sad, yet supposing Him to be in the company, how restful all the mourners become; how light every burdens grows, how every aching heart rejoices, for in His presence there is fulness of joy. Get but Christ into your family circle and it is a ring of delight.

TALKING ABOUT JESUS,

Supposing Jesus to be in the company next how united His people will all become! Whenever Christian people fall out, it is because Jesus is not in the company. "Supposing Him to have been in the company," how holy they would all grow. Sin dies as Jesus looks upon it, and men's wayward passions yield to His sweet sway. How devout would all hearts be "supposing Him to be in the company!" What prayer there is, and what praise! There is no hurrying over morning devotion, no falling asleep at the bedside at night when Jesus is in our company. Then our heart is praying all day long, and we delight to pray together for His coming and His kingdom. How teachable we are, too, when Jesus is in the company, opening the Scriptures and opening our hearts; and what sweet communion we enjoy. When Jesus is in the company how lively they all are. Why, in these warm mornings some seem half inclined to fall asleep, even in the house of prayer—"The spirit truly is willing, but the flesh is weak." But when Jesus is in the company the spirit triumphs over the flesh, and we feel full of life, and power, and energy in the divine service. If Jesus be in the company, how earnest we grow! How zealous for His glory! How intent to win souls! I am afraid it is because Jesus is not in the company that we allow many sinners to go by us without a warning, and we neglect fine opportunities for serving our Lord.

You have heard of holy Mr. Payson,

THE AMERICAN DIVINE,

a man who walked with God in his ministry. He was out one day with a brother minister who had to make a call at a lady's house, and Payson went in with him. The lady pressed them both to stay to tea. She was not a Christian woman, and Payson had other business, and therefore he demurred; but as she pressed him very earnestly he sat down, and invoked the divine blessing, which he did in terms so sweet and full of holy unction that he impressed everybody. The lady waited upon him with great attention, and when he rose up to go he said to her, "Madam, I thank you much for your great kindness to me; but how do you treat my Master?" A work of grace was wrought in that lady by the question; she was brought to Jesus; she opened her house for preaching, and a revival followed. Now, if Jesus had not been with Payson, what had become of that woman? I fear that we go in and out among dying men and women, and we let them perish—yes, we let them be damned without an effort for their salvation, and all because we have not obeyed the voice which speaks to us as it did to Abraham, "I am God Almighty, walk before Me, and be thou perfect." We shall never be perfected as the servants of God except we walk in His conscious presence; but if we walk before Him, and He is with us, then shall we be earnest in the winning of souls.

V. Lastly, I want to dwell, for just a minute, by way of touching the conscience, upon the reflection that whether we have seen Him or not. I want you now to look back upon what He has seen in your company, supposing him to have been there, when you were disputing the other night. Yes, a point of doctrine had come up, and you differed over it. Did you not wax very warm, my brother, even so as to grow red in the face? Did you not go away from that friend with whom you disputed almost hating him? You know you did. Supposing Jesus to have been in the company, He did not smile on that dispute. He was there, and He was grieved at the way in which you remembered His doctrine but forgot His spirit. You know that you did not yield a point you ought to have yielded; you knew you were wrong at the time, but your friend pushed you hard, and you said to yourself, "I will not give way, though I feel that he is right."

Although I suppose that we shall differ about many points till the Lord comes, yet when differences arise they will present fair opportunities for holy charity and mutual edification, and these will gladly be seized if Jesus be in the company. When next we argue let each one say, "Jesus is in this company; therefore, while we speak up for what we believe to be true, let us do it in a loving spirit." Our arguments will not lose force by being steeped in love. Truth is never stronger than when it walks with charity.

Then, again, it may be that some little time ago certain of you were acting in such a way that no common observer could have seen any difference between you and worldlings. You were out dealing with one who was trying to do his best for himself, and you were trying to do your best for yourselves. Do I blame you? Not for being prudent and circumspect; but I hope you will blame yourselves for going far beyond this. You did nothing which I may style dishonest—but did you not sail dreadfully near the wind? You stated something which I must not call a lie, but still it was not true as you meant it to be understood; was it? Business men too often aim at getting undue advantage of each other; it is "diamond cut diamond," and rather worse at times. If Christian men in all their dealings would suppose Jesus to be in the company, how it would change their manners.

Think of Jesus on this side the counter along with you who sell, and on that side of the counter along with you who buy. You both need His presence, for the buyer is generally quite as intent upon cheating as the seller; he wants the goods for less than they are worth, and the seller therefore baits the hook for him. Trade is growing rotten right through, but the blame is not all on one side. When persons must have goods far below the price for which they can be produced, they must not marvel if they find that they are sold an inferior article which looks well enough, but turns out to be worthless. Oh, that you Christian people would always suppose Jesus to be in your company.

COWARDLY SILENCE.

Do not accuse me of being personal this morning, for if you do, I will plead guilty. If the cap fits you, wear it. The other day you were in company, and certain persons were talking profanely, or was it scepticism which they vented? And you, as Christ's disciple, heard them, and what did you do? Did you bear witness for the truth? They made a joke—it was not over clean, but you laughed! Did you not? But, alas, you said nothing for your Lord! Yet He was in the company, seeing all! You had several opportunities, but you did not put in a word for truth and holiness. Now, supposing Jesus to have been in the company, I think He must have been sorely grieved. Surely your Lord must have thought, "What! all this said against me, and never a word in reply from him whom I redeemed with My own blood!"

Think, again, of those evenings when a few friends meet together; are they not often a waste of time? "Supposing Him to have been in the company," as He really is, do you think the evenings would be spent as they frequently are? Dr. Chalmers, a truly devout man, tells us that once at a nobleman's house he spent an evening with various friends, and talked over the question of the cause and cure of pauperism—a subject most suitable for conversation. An aged Highland chieftain among the company listened with great attention to the doctor, for Chalmers was master of the subject. Surely they had not spent the evening amiss; but in the night an unusual noise was heard, and a heavy groan. The chieftain was dying. In a few minutes he was dead, and Dr. Chalmers stood over him, the picture of distress. "Alas," he cried, "had I known that my friend was within a few minutes of eternity I would have preached to him and to you Christ Jesus and Him crucified." With how much more reason may many Christians repent of their conversation!

Did I not hear the other day of some Christian friend who was going to give up working for Christ? and of a dozen Christian friends who were going to break up, and no more go on with their holy service for Jesus? One was going to leave the Sunday-school in which he had been for years; another was going to allow a weak church to break up and go to pieces, for he had grown tired of working under discouragements; another said, "I have had my turn, let somebody else do the work now." Supposing Jesus to have been in the company, do you think that such observations pleased Him? Do not suffer any difficulty, or infirmity, to prevent your persevering in the service of Jesus in some form or other, and when you do feel as if you must leave the ranks, suppose Him to be in the company, and march on! Forward, brethren! Jesus leads the way! Forward, for His presence is victory! God bless you, dear friends, and all this day may Jesus be in the company to make it a hallowed Sabbath to your souls. Amen.

A RACE FOR LIFE.

FROM a small posting town in Central Russia Alexis Ristoff and his wife set out in their sleigh toward their home some fifteen miles distant. Only dire pressure could have induced them to undertake the journey alone in the exceptionally severe weather. But they had both agreed that they must press on without delay. Intelligence had reached them at Moscow that an epidemic had broken out in the village where they lived, that one of their children was lying dangerously sick, and that the other two were stricken. They had set out immediately for home, and had travelled over four hundred miles by the fastest route. They were now nearly at their destination, and the remaining distance must be traversed by sleigh. There were no attendants to be procured in the town, owing to the severity of the weather, and it was clear they must either brave the risks of the journey alone or remain in the town all night. Confronted with the alternative parental love triumphed, and they were soon gliding swiftly over the frozen snow.

One half the journey was performed safely, and in less than two hours they hoped to be by the side of their suffering children. They had spoken but little by the way. Their hearts were too full to speak; each was anxiously looking forward to the same moment when they would learn the condition of their little ones.

"Listen," said Madame Ristoff, "I hear something behind us."

Ristoff checked the horses for a moment, and listened intently. There was no mistaking the noise they heard. It was far away in the distance, but the Russian knows too well that terrible cry not to recognize it, however distant. "Yes, love," he said, "I hear it, it is the wolves. Pray God they may not be on our track." He urged the horses to the top of their speed, and another mile was quickly covered. But the cry unmistakably grew clearer. Their track was fringed with pines on one side, and it was from that side the sound seemed to come. It was a cruel, fierce savage sound telling of hunger and remorseless fury.

At length, Ristoff, turning to look behind them as he had done constantly since the cry had first struck their ears, saw a dark mass on their track. It was almost indistinguishable in the distance, but he knew well what it was. A few wolves were ahead of the pack, and were coming on swiftly for their prey. "Now, dear," he said, "you will be brave and help me for our children's sake."

Her face was very pale as she clasped her husband's arm in token of acquiescence. "Tell me what to do," she said calmly.

"Take the reins and guide the horses," he replied. "They will need no urging, they know their danger as well as we do." He handed them to her, and Madame Ristoff knelt down in the front of the sleigh to be well out of her husband's way, and so that she might pray for themselves and their children.

Ristoff examined his double-barrelled rifle carefully, and poised it on the back of the sleigh. He must wait until the foremost wolf came nearer lest he waste the ammunition on which their lives depended. He could see now that five wolves were approaching, but there were doubtless many more behind them. He took careful aim, and when the first wolf was but forty yards away from the sleigh he fired and the animal dropped. Instantly its companions tore it to pieces, and Alexis shuddered at their ferocity, though he was grateful for the brief delay it made in the desperate chase. Soon the surviving four were again in full chase, baying savagely as they followed, but in the meanwhile the horses, terrified almost to madness, had galloped with the speed of racers, and he heard his wife's cheering cry, "I see the village."

Now there was hope. Alexis fired again, and again a wolf fell, and in that moment he tried to reload, but it was too late; there were only three wolves near, but one of them sprang on the back of the sleigh. Quick as thought Alexis drew his long hunting knife, and with a blow nerved by love and fear drove it through the beast's neck, pinning him bleeding to the sleigh; then turning quickly round he saw that another wolf was alongside not six feet from the horses' flanks. He reached forward, and with the butt of his rifle struck a powerful blow. It shivered the creature's head, and it, too, fell dead. Only one wolf remained, but the baying of the pack behind was growing more distinct. He looked ahead, his heart sinking within him. But there he saw the gladdening sight of the village. The wolves shrank back from the sleigh, and they were saved.

It was an experience never to be forgotten, and father and mother knelt down on their own threshold to thank God for their deliverance. Their hearts were still further gladdened by the news that the children for whom they had risked their lives were recovering. That journey had been the very shadow of death, and their struggle for life had been fierce and desperate, for they knew how remorseless were the foes that sought their lives. So would men struggle to escape from the enemy of souls, if they only knew their danger, and that the safe refuge is still near them.

PASTOR CHINIQUY'S SUCCESSES.

PASTOR CHINIQUY, the famous Canadian convert from Roman Catholicism whose portrait and life appeared in this journal on March 8th, describes the work he is doing across the Atlantic in the following letter:

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "CHRISTIAN HERALD."

DEAR SIR: Though it has been the good Master's pleasure to try my faith in many ways, these last three months that I have been working in England, you will allow me to ask your Christian readers to bless Him for the manifestations of His infinite mercies toward many of the precious souls to which it has been my privilege to preach the truth.

How can I tell you my joy when, after my second address in Exeter Hall, three Roman Catholics came to shake hands with me in the presence of many, and said, with tears of joy, "Now we see the light, and we understand the errors of the Church of Rome. We give up those errors from this very hour. We will never invoke any name but the name of Jesus, and the Word of God will be our only guide."

But the very next week my joy was not less when one of the most venerable Episcopal ministers of London came to me and said: "Do you remember that old gentleman with white hair who was just before you when you were speaking in our large hall? He is a wealthy and very influential man, enjoying the confidence of all by the stern honesty of his conduct, but unfortunately, a couple of years ago, he fell into the hands of Ritualists, who poisoned his mind with the subtle poison of their half-concealed Popish doctrines and practices. So much so, that he determined to give up his position in our church in order to submit himself to the Pope. All my efforts to prevent him taking that unfortunate step were of no avail, and next week was chosen to make his public recantation. It was then that he heard you were to give us a public course of lectures on Romanism, and he determined to come and hear you. The Lord evidently guided your thoughts and your words for the salvation of that honest and intelligent man. The first person I met when back to my parsonage after the lecture was that dear old friend of mine. He threw himself into my arms, and with burning tears of joy, he said, 'Help me to bless the Lord, I now understand the mummeries and idolatries of Rome. By the grace of God, nothing will any more shake my faith in the glorious Gospel truths which our heroic ancestors have bought for us at the price of their blood.' And the rest of the night was spent by him and me in blessing God for the admirable and so sudden change just wrought in his heart by the Holy Spirit."

A FRENCH LADY CONVERTED.

Recently, also, a Baptist minister of London said in a public meeting: "After your lecture in my church, a French lady came to tell me that though she had been till then a most devoted and sincere Roman Catholic, she felt that her duty toward God and herself, as well as toward her relatives, was to break forever the ties which had united her to the Church of Rome, in order to unite with one of our evangelical churches. Not only has she kept her resolution, but full of joy for the great gift she had received, she has just gone back to France to persuade her friends and relatives to give up the errors of Popery, in order to accept Christ as the only light and life of sinners."

KITTY'S LIFE WRECKED.

"A LADY drowned!" A hundred voices told the news on the sands, in the bath-rooms, in the restaurants, everywhere. It was like an electric current, or like a communication by a telephone, with which everybody had a connection. That seemed to be all that was known for some time, for in answer to the eager questions "Where? Where?" "How did it happen?" "Who saw it?" etc., contradictory answers were given.

The rush of the people toward the pier, however, indicated that the centre of interest was there, and the idlers on the seats along the shore of the little holiday resort quickly joined the current in the direction of the pier.

On the pier were hurrying men and women, pressing eagerly forward toward the end farthest from shore, and at that end men and women were bending over the iron railing, watching intently some men beneath, who, with boat-hooks, were drawing something out of the water.

"What is it, Robson?" asked a young lady in the crowd.

The man addressed, a fisherman who had apparently only just come up from assisting in the work, turned as he was spoken to, and said: "Ah! Miss Romaine, is that you? It's a bad business, I'm afeared. The poor young leddy seems to be dead. Doan't go, miss; it isn't a sight for the likes of you," and he gently barred her way with his arm.

"But tell me who it is, Robson? Has some one fallen off the pier, or is it a boat upset?"

"I can't rightly tell, miss, just how it came about," said the boatman, as the crowd, eager to learn, pressed around him. "I was on the pier smoking my pipe and looking out for the Lily, as my boys are in, and wasn't noticing any one much. I see there was one or two people sitting about, but not many, 'cause the sun is hot on the pier about this time. I noticed one leddy sitting by herself right at the end, and she seemed to be crying. I didn't pay any heed, but was a-looking out to sea, when I heard a rustling noise and a sort of scream very quiet like, and I looked around and the leddy was gone. I called out to my mates down in the boats, and they tried to get her out, but she drifted under the pier among the piles, and then they got out on the beams and are getting her out with their hooks. I ha' been down helping 'em, but I'm getting too old for that sort o' work, and there was plenty there to do it."

"Aw, my good fellah," said a fashionably-dressed man in the crowd, who wore an eyeglass and carried his cigar in his fingers, "was it a young lady, did you—ah—notice?"

"No, sir," said Robson, "I did not—ah—notice. I don't loaf about mashing the ladies as some folks do." Robson could not resist the opportunity of expressing his contempt for his questioner, whom he knew well enough as a wealthy loafer about the sands, who had his quarters at the fashionable hotel, and whom he had more than once said he "should like to dump into the sea."

"Do go and see if she is living, Robson," said Miss Romaine anxiously. "They may take her to our cottage, if she is alive; it will be quieter than the hotel. Papa and mamma are both away, and there is no one there but the servants. I'll go and look for Dr. Homer." So saying, she turned away and went on her errand.

Half an hour later, Miss Romaine hurried to her home with the physician, and as she approached it she saw by the crowd outside the garden gate that her request had been obeyed. She and the doctor quickened their steps, for moments were precious. Entering, they found the poor creature lying unconscious on a lounge, the men who had carried her there, headed by Robson, trying such rude means as they knew of to restore life. The doctor turned them all out, and aided by Miss Romaine and her attendants commenced his struggle for the life trembling in the balance. It was two hours before the struggle ended, and then Dr. Homer, having exhausted every means known to science, confessed himself beaten. "It is of no use," he said, raising his ear from the region of the heart. "She is dead. Poor thing, she had no stamina to work upon in such a time as this. If she had had but a very little more strength she might have been saved. Do you know her, Miss Romaine?"

"No, I do not recollect ever to have seen her, but this note fell from the bosom of her dress when we undressed her; it may give us some clue to the mystery." Miss Romaine handed the note, which was without address, to the doctor, who opened and read it. Thus it ran:

"This note I write intending to place it in my bosom, so that when I am dead the world may know why I go to my death. Three years ago I lived in a happy Christian home far away from this. My father and mother loved me and were proud of me. I was beautiful, clever and witty, and I had many friends and admirers. One man among these I thought I loved. He flattered me, gave me handsome presents, and professed love for me. I was dazzled and fascinated by his fine talk, and when he asked me to marry him I consented willingly. But my father refused his consent to my marrying a stranger, and then I consented to elope with my lover. He cheated me with a mock marriage, and in less than six months deserted me. Then after several efforts to earn a living, in which I failed, I resolved to go home. But I had disgraced that home. My father and mother refused me admission. I saw my brother, and he spurned me, and my sister turned from me in scorn. Not a friend would speak to me. I left, and travelled to a distant city. I put on common clothes and tried to obtain work as a hired help, but it was of no use. I was ignorant of all the domestic duties. No one would pity me or help me. More than once I was invited to live a life of vice, but I dreaded that above all things. I have come here to drown myself. The world has cast me out. I am going to One they say is more merciful than the world. May God have mercy on my soul.

"KITTY."

That was all. Miss Romaine read through to the sad end, and looking at the inanimate form on the lounge, a flood of tears of sympathy and unavailing sorrow fell from the eyes of the Christian girl. She fell on her knees beside the corpse, not to pray for the dead girl; alas! it was too late for that. She was asking God to help her to do some good work for such outcasts as the poor despairing creature there. God heard her prayer, and out of her earnest desire sprang a mission work which has been the means of rescue to many a sin-tossed, despairing soul.

"Doan't go there, Miss Romaine."

PETER BLAKE'S VOYAGE.

A SERIAL STORY BY HESBA STRETTON.

Watching a Deathbed.

WRONGDOING was bearing its fatal fruit. Sorrow, suffering and death were the inevitable results of the shameful speculation of the shipowner. Penrose had insured the Dolphin for a sum far greater than the value of the ship and cargo. That she should be lost at sea was his hope. If she arrived safely in port he would be a heavy loser. She had been lost as he intended. The gain had been realized; but he was where gain cannot help. He died believing his only son had been drowned with the ship. Now the son for whom he had speculated and schemed and sinned was loathing his memory, and hating the wealth stained with the blood of brave men. On the bed in the French Hospital lay one of the victims, dying a heart-broken, childless widow, and by the side of his son stood another victim suffering as only the brave can suffer. It is no fancy picture. Hundreds of cases are on record, the truth of which have been proved beyond the possibility of doubt, in which that crime has been deliberately committed, and it is only within five years that a law has been passed to prevent its repetition.

The scene in the hospital was a very sorrowful one. Arthur Penrose and Peter Blake stood beside the little cot watching earnestly the dying woman. Her face bore marks of the sorrow through which she had passed. It was seamed and puckered with the lines the tears had run down many and many a time. Her husband had gone from her and been drowned, and then her two sons, she had reason to believe, had been drowned too. Then had come her parting with Bessie and the children. All bitter, bitter sorrows, and the tears had flowed for each. Now she had come into harbor like a battered ship tossed of the waves, and bearing the marks of the enemy's guns. It seemed to be a peaceful harbor too. Despite the sorrow-graven lines there was a look of peaceful calm on the face as though she were glad to enter into rest. Such a look often comes on the face of the dying Christian. The time for tears and groans is past. Sorrow and disease have fought their fight and are victorious. The enfeebled body sinks wearily on the couch and the spirit, catching a glimpse of the glorious rest provided, prepares to take its flight. A few moments before and anxieties about those left behind disturb the dying, but now the world recedes they have no concern with it, and they "languish into life."

"She has never spoken since the day she came," said the sister; "she lies silent and tranquil as you see her. Speak to her, my son; she may perhaps hear your voice."

"Mother," said Peter, quietly; "mother, I am your eldest son. Look at me and see."

He laid his hand tenderly on hers, and knelt down beside her to bring his face on a level with her eyes, so feeble and dim. For a minute or two she lay still, but her lips quivered and her eyelids closed.

"Look at me," cried her son, laying his mouth close to her dull ear; "oh! my mother, open your eyes and look at me."

Still she did not speak, or stir; and the thin, cold hand lying in his remained lifeless. "Oh, mother!" he called, so loudly that the quiet room rang with the cry; "look at me but once! Speak only one word to me!"

Slowly her dim, dark eyes opened, and a smile broke upon her wasted face. She gazed at him wonderingly, and then turned to look at the old cradle. She could see nothing but it and him. "It is my son!" she whispered, "not lost at sea. How good God is! He holds us all in His hand."

The eyelids fell again over her eyes, and her voice died away in tones so low and faint that no ear save his own could catch the words. But still her cold hand stirred a little when he pressed it, as if she knew that he was there. The lines of care and trouble seemed to be smoothed away from her face, and she smiled faintly now and then, as she caught the sound of her son's voice. But after a while the three who were watching her knew that the last moment was come. Her lips trembled again for an instant as if she were trying to speak, but no word came. She was dead.

It had been harder for Arthur Penrose to stand by, and watch Peter Blake's mother dying, than even for Peter himself. The thought that all this sorrow, with other unknown scenes of misery, were the direct consequence of his father's love of gain, was more than he could bear. At the moment that the poor, helpless woman died, he turned away hastily, and hurried from the hospital, not knowing whither he went. Unconsciously to himself his steps led him up to the brow of the cliff, which he had seen from the river, where the Cross stood. There was an open unenclosed plot of ground, planted with trees, underneath which were many seats. He threw himself upon one, and sat still, crushed and benumbed in spirit. He was very young, and the young have a vast, unlimited capacity for a sense of agony and shame, before their sensibility is blunted by the daily fretting cares of life.

The spring sunshine glinted down upon him through the half-open leaf-buds on the swaying branches overhead. Little rainbow-colored clouds of mist floated here and there upon the broad river, which joined the sea at its feet; and on the sea itself snowy streaks of foam played and disappeared, sparkling with light. Birds were singing and flitting to and fro from every bush and tree, and in the topmost boughs the rooks were chattering among their nests. There was a scent of violets and primroses in the fresh, sweet air, and he could hear children calling one to the other as they sought for the blossoms among the green tufts of grass in the hedgerows. At the foot of the cross a group of them were playing and making garlands and crowns of the spring flowers, and one of them had climbed up to place a little crown of primroses as high as she could reach upon the cross. He saw and heard all keenly; so keenly that the memory of it could never pass away from his brain.

But his agony remained unabated. He felt himself cut off from all this outer joy and gladness. It was he whose wealth had been bought by the deaths of men; by widowhood and orphanhood. It was his ships that were sailing now, with rust-eaten iron and rotten timbers, and decaying rigging, sailing over yonder treacherous sea, which was smiling up to the sky above it, but hiding a black gulf of death beneath its glittering waters. Could he do anything better than abide by his first resolve? To exile himself forever from his native land; to forget, if possible, his father's name, and to leave his sad heritage of shame in any hands that would take it up.

How long he sat there he did not know. People came and went; glanced at him, and passed by; but he paid no heed to them. The sun sank lower and lower in the sky, and the shadows about him moved silently eastward, and stretched farther across the sward. The tide, which had been at low water when he gained the height of the cliff, was coming back now, and the fishermen's boats were returning with it to the town. But he did not move.

It seemed to him as if there would be greater pain in the effort than if his limbs had been crushed instead of his spirit. Presently two of his own countrymen came up the steep road, and, giving him but a momentary glance, sat down beside him. The intrusion vexed him, but before he could resolve to change his seat their conversation attracted his attention.

"Old Mitchell tells me," said one, "that Blake, that fine young fellow who was said to be lost at sea, has turned up again. They are talking of it everywhere."

"Yes," answered the other, "they say he had a narrow chance, and only two more of the crew were saved. It is the old story; an unseaworthy craft, and overladen into the bargain. Ships that ought to be broken up are sold for what they will fetch; and the owners know they are bought to be sent to sea in an unworthy condition. Bless you! they wouldn't think of sending them to sea themselves, not they! They are upright, honorable men. But they will take three or four thousand pounds for them, knowing very well what they are bought for. I'm an honorable, upright man, and I sell you a jibbing horse, more likely than not to break your neck if you get astride him. Why not? Am I to lose the price of my horse to save your neck? It is your fault for getting astride him."

"Exactly," said the first speaker, laughing; "the sailors ought not to go aboard the vessels. They say the English sailors, as a class, are rapidly deteriorating; a set of scoundrels, who are better at the bottom of the sea than corrupting the land by their lives."

"What can you expect but scoundrels?" asked the other, "when their lives are reckoned of so little value? I am amazed that a fine fellow like Blake should follow the sea; only it is in his blood. But mark my words! if matters go on as they are, the dangers and disasters at sea will take such hold of the minds of boys, aye, and of boys' mothers, that they won't be sailors at any price; and shipowners will have only the scum and dregs of the streets to man their ships. They talk of the carrying trade of England. How will they like it, when there are none but foreign sailors to be met with? I say, when a nation begins to look at her material wealth as greater in importance than the moral and physical welfare of her people, she has taken the first step downward. And England is doing it."

"Yes," said his companion, rising from his seat to pursue his walk, "and I say good men must submit to laws that bad men may be curbed and restrained by them."

The night was falling, but Arthur Penrose did not quit his place. The electric light in the light-house off Havre glittered like a diamond against the pale clear green of the evening sky. The opposite banks of the river were fading softly in the gathering gloom, and the sea was growing dark. Close beside him the Cross stood out sharply against the gray of the twilight; and he could still see the fading crown of primroses hanging upon it. Some long-forgotten words, which he had heard he knew not where, flashed across his memory, and his brain caught them, and repeated them over and over again: "Who for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of God."

What did the words mean? At first his wearied and torpid mind could only repeat them mechanically. He had heard every word his countrymen had said; but they did not seem to have any connection with him and his misery. But there was something that touched him in these words, if he could only catch their meaning. "Despising the shame." An intolerable burden of shame was his; could he ever despise it? Could he ever endure the cross?

That was what Christ had done. He had suffered, not for His own sins, but for the sins of others. He had submitted, not to death merely, but to shame and ignominy such as was shared with Him only by the veriest wretches and villains upon the earth. He had seen the people laughing Him to scorn as they passed by His cross, and heard them mocking Him with cruel raillery, in His hour of bitter anguish. He had endured it all; yes, and despised the shame of it. With no fault found in Him, without spot or blemish of His own, He had given Himself up to the death of a criminal, and had closed His eyes upon earth amid the jeers of His enemies.

His own burden was light when compared with that. Shame there was, but it could be outlived. The cross was heavy, but it could be borne. He must not shrink from enduring either cross or shame.

At last he lifted up his eyes to the dark blue sky of the night above him with a new-born sense of courage and hope. A fresh field of work opened before him. He had thought of fleeing from the past and present; but now he would turn and front them. His rotten vessels were on the sea still; he must hasten home, telegraph to every port where it was possible any of them might touch, and send instructions how to act to each captain, so as to insure the safety of his seamen. His father's ill-gotten riches had descended to him; they should be used to atone for the miseries by which they had been amassed. Those who were dead were beyond his reach; but for their sakes, and in memory of them, the living should have his whole life devoted to their interests. England had been disgraced by his father, and men like him; but he would leave no means untried to wipe out the blot.

He looked once again at the darkening Cross; and gently took away the child's little crown of flowers. If ever his crown of thorns should pierce him too sharply, this withered wreath should remind him of the hours he had just passed through. He could never be a light-hearted, sanguine boy again; but he could face life as a man, with nerve enough to encounter opposition, and contempt, and shame, and with a secret confidence in God and right, which would bear him through to the end.

He did not try to meet with Peter Blake in the town; for he thought he would probably wish to be left to himself. But he wrote a letter to him, telling him of his new resolves; and by the steamer which started early in the morning he returned to England, to set out at once upon the path he had planned for himself.

(To be concluded.)

PASSING OVER JORDAN.

S. S. Lesson for July 8, Joshua 3. Golden Text, Isa. 43 : 2. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Long-Expected Crisis—Arrangements for Crossing the River—Need of Guidance—General and Particular Leading—Need of Retirement—The First Step of Faith—The Command to the Priests—Standing Still in a Crisis—A Memorial Ordered.

THE children of Israel, the people of the Lord, were about to enter upon the most momentous crisis of their history. Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, many of their descendants during the slavery in Egypt, and still more the fathers of the present generation who had died in the wilderness, all had longed for the fulfilment of God's promises, and that they might see, might enter and possess the land of promise. The people were now at its very border, Joshua had risen early in the morning, and, following God's direction, was ready to his hand for service. He and the people had left Shittim, and were now on

THE VERY BANKS OF THE RIVER

Jordan, looking wistfully over to the other side, the land "which flowed with milk and honey." An apparently insuperable barrier lay between, but no one appeared to be occupied with it; God was with them, and especially with the man whom He Himself had chosen as their leader.

After the appointed three days, the officers went through the host, and "they commanded the people, saying, When ye see the ark of the covenant of the Lord your God, and the priests the Levites bearing it, then ye shall remove from your place, and go after it. Yet there shall be a space between you and it, about two thousand cubits by measure; that ye may know the way by which ye must go; for ye have not passed this way heretofore." To the teachable child of God, who stands in his true position of grace, a saved, cleansed, delivered, anointed man, no question is of more intense moment than that of guidance. His own will quite laid down, he wants to be completely and in all points assured about the will of God. In the journeys of the children of Israel the ark of the covenant was sometimes in their midst, sometimes it went on before them. When "they departed from the mount of the Lord three days' journey;" "the ark of the covenant of the Lord went before them in the three days' journey, to search out a resting-place for them" (Num. 10 : 33). Here in face of Jordan there was to be a space between the ark of God and the people. How often have we sought for guidance so plain and palpable that it would give us no trouble to recognize it, and which would be no exercise either to our attention or our faith! Anything which is close before us we can follow mechanically, the blind could do the same, but the Lord in His leading seeks to absorb all our spiritual faculties in tracing the way which He takes. We learn more of God and have, so to speak, a better view of Him, when we are exercised about His guidance, than we should have if He dealt with us as mere machines.

COME NOT NEAR UNTO IT,

Sometimes God gives us a direction which is in the main to guide our whole life, just as in the case of Saul of Tarsus; after the Holy Ghost had separated him to the life of a foreign missionary, and he kept steadily on at this work; but He was by no means rendered independent, for still in the detail, he sought and received guidance as to what countries and what cities he was to go to. There is a divine way and a carnal way, the way of God and the way of man which both lie before us, whenever and wherever begins. God's way is not that of blind superstition, but of intelligent co-operation with Him. Every child of God is brought in his experience from time to time, into a position in which a decision must be made which may change the whole current of his life. It may be a call to yield himself to missionary labor, and he must face the death to all plans of earthly comfort, distinction, etc.; be solitary and very much unknown on earth. But for what? To be God's instrument and fellow-worker, making known His great truths among the heathen, to come down to the lowest and most degraded of human kind, to carry out the thoughts of God's heart of love, and thus to fit into the very place to which His infinite love has called him. Where the will is not wholly given up and the body is not fully presented to God in living sacrifice, the conflict is sometimes terrible; but where the will is yielded, where the question is only, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" the only fear is lest a mistake should be made about His direction. Sometimes the decision may be about the taking an uncompromising stand as one wholly the Lord's, and that, in the midst of a family more or less worldly; all the members regarding every separation from them in conversation, in habits of life, in principle, in expenditure as a reflection upon them; and as an entirely personal matter; and so imputing the meanest motives to one who is quite single-eyed in seeking God's glory. Such may think, "Can I bear the cost?" and so looking near to self instead of off unto Jesus may miss His direction as to what to do or not to do.

Joshua said unto the people,

for to-morrow the Lord will do wonders among you." We find this same command was given on other occasions. Before the giving of the law from Mount Sinai, God said unto Moses, "Go unto the people, and sanctify them to-day and to-morrow" (Ex. 19 : 10). Before the seventy elders were appointed, and before the Spirit of God rested on them, the command of God went forth, "Sanctify yourselves" (Num. 11 : 18). For great and special occasions, when the power and deliverance of God was signally manifest it was but becoming that the people should be set apart, free from all distraction, all ordinary occupation. There are times when God calls us thus apart, and the press and crush of occupation comes upon us so overwhelmingly that it seems impossible to get free. God has permitted it so that we may be placed in the position to choose whether God or business, God or Christian work, God or our reputation for work shall have the first claim. Before the Jordan can be crossed, there must be such a setting apart unto God, that we may be willing, if necessary, to neglect even what seem to be necessary duties, in order that we may be completely free for God.

Then Joshua gave the word of command, and the priests took up the ark of the covenant and passed on before the people. This was committing themselves; the first step of faith was taken. How ridiculous it would have looked in the eyes of unbelievers, when a whole nation of people began to move right into a river, which was unfordable, and where there was no bridge! Yet this is like the way of faith from beginning to end. It was just then when they had begun to act faith, that the Lord said to Joshua, "This day will I begin to magnify thee in the sight of all Israel, that they may know that, as I was with Moses, so I will be with thee." Oh, how precious must this word have been to Joshua marching on as he was, apparently responsible for a nation, and right in face of impossibilities. Now God could trust him with the command to the priests, "When ye are come to the brink of the water of Jordan, ye shall STAND STILL IN JORDAN."

In face of the Red Sea God commanded the people to "stand still." It is just when a man has no fear, no care, no press, no hurry, no difficulty that he stands still. "He that is entered into His rest, he also hath ceased from his own works, as God did from [illegible]" (Heb. 4 : 10). This was complete confidence in God; an absence of all apprehension. The priests were to be the leaders; if they could stand perfectly still, then the people would feel there was nothing to fear.

Now Joshua unfolded the deliverance which God was about to work for them. "Come hither," he said, "and hear the words of the Lord your God." At the time of the giving of the law, they were to stand off, at a distance, the Deliverer, the Joshua-Jesus draws them nigh. "Hereby ye shall know that the living God is among you, and that He will without fail drive out from before you" all your enemies. "Behold, the ark of the covenant of the Lord of all the earth passeth over before you into Jordan." Yes, wherever the Lord calls us to go, He is on before. "When He putteth forth His own sheep, He goeth before them" (John 10 : 4). Thank God, our Shepherd leads us into no path where He has not tried the difficulties Himself. He "was in all points tempted like as we are" (Heb. 4 : 15). The proof to all His children that He will overcome, is that He is on the spot, never at a distance, never out of reach.

Then Joshua told them that as soon as the priests' feet should rest on the waters of Jordan, the waters below them should flow away and be cut off, and the waters above them stand up in a heap, unable to overflow the ark and the priests of the Lord. Oh, how blessed a type! As soon as we see ourselves or by Jesus our Priest, bearing our ark of the covenant, then the waters which have touched His feet, cannot come near to ours. There stood the priests, bearing the ark of the Lord, and not one drop of water could come upon the shielded people! Let us be willing to go down into any Jordan, any river of judgment, judging ourselves in any light which God may shed upon us, taking any low place which may become us, but let there be no despondency, Jesus is with us, the land of promise lies beyond, and there is victory. Family difficulties, church difficulties, difficulties in Christian work are sometimes the Jordan to be passed, the venture to trust a sick body to the Lord, the venture to commit a child to Him may prove the barrier which holds us back from the continuous victory of the land of promise, flowing with milk and honey. But the ark is on before, our Priest's feet are in the Jordan, let us go on. He who has borne sin and sickness and death for us, will not move from His place of intercession till we are all gone over. Oh, how foolish we are to be occupied with difficulties!

When all the children of Israel were passed over Jordan, the Lord commanded Joshua to take a representative man of each tribe, who should take up a stone out of the midst of Jordan, and set it up in the lodging place where they should lodge that night. Such a deliverance was not to be forgotten. The people had passed through death but for the special intervention of God; and God would have it memorialized that in time to come their children might ask regarding the stones, and might hear of the great things which God had done for them: "and these stones shall be unto the children of Israel forever." And Joshua set up twelve stones in the midst of Jordan. Our Jesus has His memorial stones in Gethsemane and on the cross, that we may have memorial stones of resurrection. It was not until all the people were passed over and the stones set up in Jordan that the command went forth that the priests should come up out of Jordan. Forty thousand men of war, all the women and children, and one old man, Caleb, had passed over; many hours must have elapsed, and then, last of all, came the priests bearing the ark. The people on the Canaan side were, no doubt, all looking on to see what would happen. No sooner had the feet of the priests left the bed of the river, than the heaped-up waters curled mightily round, and like some enormous serpent betook them to the channel, spread out over the banks, to the same extent and no more than before; but the deliverance was wrought, the people were safe, and God had kept His word.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

An Extraordinary Charge against the Jews has been made in Hungary, and four men of that race have been placed on trial at Nyiregyhaza. A boy, the son of one of the prisoners, alleges that on April 1st his father and three other Jews enticed a Christian girl named Esther Solymosi into their synagogue, where they cut her throat, and caught the blood in a pail and used it to mix with the flour for their passover bread. The boy states that when he witnessed the crime he was outside the synagogue, but peeped in through the keyhole. The girl in question is certainly missing, but the body of a dead girl wearing the clothes of Esther Solymosi was taken from the river near the town in which she lived. It had been in the water so long that identification was almost impossible, and while some of her friends assert that it is Esther Solymosi, others who knew her deny it. The boy, who is the chief witness, is known to be under the influence of the Roman Catholics, who are savagely hostile to the Jews. The whole region has been affected by Judæophobia, and there is little probability that the men will have a fair trial. The correspondent of the London Times states his conviction that the boy witness is a maniac. Whether he be a maniac or only the dupe and instrument of the Papists, it is certain that his statements have excited the Hungarians to a pitch of frenzy little short of madness, and that the whole Jewish race in Hungary is in danger of massacre. The Hungarians of the locality are ignorant and superstitious, and they give ready credence to charges which would be scorned in a more enlightened community.

The Death of Dr. Colenso, Bishop of Natal, in Africa, was announced on June 21st, at the age of sixty-nine. Dr. Colenso's name will be long remembered across the Atlantic as the author of several popular mathematical works much used in schools. In theology he was opposed to the Orthodox Church, though he was one of her prelates. He published a work, subsequently to his becoming a bishop, in which he expressed serious doubts of the authenticity and inspiration of the book of Joshua and the five books of Moses. The work was widely read, and it was made the basis of an attempt in the law courts to deprive him of his bishopric. The effort failed, and Dr. Colenso remained Bishop of Natal until his death. He was greatly beloved by the Boers, the Zulus and other natives, and had the courage to become their champion in Great Britain. Had the English Government followed his advice they would have been saved from two disastrous wars.

The Rt. Hon. John Bright has been Called to account in the British House of Commons for a speech he delivered at the recent festivities in Birmingham. Sir Stafford Northcote, the leader of the Conservative party, to which Mr. Bright has been opposed all his life, called the attention of the House to the fact that Mr. Bright had said that the Conservatives are in alliance with the "Irish rebels" in thwarting the House from doing work. He claimed that the charge was unfounded, and moved that the utterances of Mr. Bright be declared a breach of privilege. Mr. Bright, in reply, said that he had a right to speak with great freedom to his constituency. The term "alliance," he said, was used in the sense of combined action between the conservatives and the Irish members, in both debate and division, to worry and destroy the Ministry. He was pained to witness the manner in which some members of the House clamored at the Premier. Such conduct was a modern innovation. As to the word "rebels," Mr. Bright commented on the existence of societies in America which were disloyal to the British Crown, and which were sending funds to similar disloyal societies in Great Britain. If, he said, the Irish Members of Parliament would disavow connection with the disloyal societies in America and declare their loyalty to the Crown, he would withdraw the word "rebel" and apologize for having used it. The only response from the Irish members was the one that was expected from men of that race. They taunted Mr. Bright with his age, and accused him of being vain. Their conduct provoked the condemnation of members of all parties, and Sir Stafford Northcote's motion was rejected by a majority of thirty-four.

An Indictment of the Khedive of Egypt has been submitted to the British Premier by Lord Randolph Churchill, a member of the House of Commons. He claims that it proves the Khedive guilty of inciting the massacre of Europeans and the attempt to burn Alexandria. He asked Mr. Gladstone to grant a commission of inquiry for the investigation of the charges. Mr. Gladstone replied that in any step the government might take the position of the Khedive, as ruler of Egypt, would be duly regarded. Lord Randolph Churchill, in a second communication, states that he will be prepared to co-operate to the utmost extent of his resources in bringing up such witnesses as may be necessary to prove the truth of the statements as to both the arson and murders.

The Action of Admiral Pierre, the Commander of the French fleet off Madagascar, in bombarding Tamatave, is applauded by the government and people of France. Before attacking the city he presented an ultimatum which the Hovas rejected. In that document he demanded the acceptance of a French protectorate over the north-west coast according to the treaties of 1841, the payment of an indemnity of 1,500,000 f. ($300,000), and the acknowledgment of the right of French citizens to own land in Madagascar. The admiral does not purpose attacking Antananarivo, the capital of Madagascar, but intends remaining at Tamatave, which is the commercial capital. He expects that by collecting the customs duties he will starve the Hovas into submission. The Malagasy embassy has now returned to London to endeavor to enlist English sympathy and mediation. The cordial welcome it has received there has offended the French Government.

The Marquis Tseng, the Envoy from China to the courts of western Europe, has been interviewed by a correspondent of the New York Herald in Paris as to the probable results of war breaking out between his country and France. Among other statements the following remarks are ominous: "I will call your special attention to the fact that should France force China into war, then it is scarcely possible that with the best intentions in the world the Chinese could make any distinction between nationalities. The terrible consequences of war would fall upon all western foreigners alike. Englishmen, Frenchmen, Americans and Germans would all be placed in the same category by the people of China, who apply to all the designation of 'yang jen,' or 'men from beyond the sea.'"

The Trial of Louise Michel, the Notorious French Communist, for her participation in the riots in Paris, took place last week. She defended herself, but Henri Rochefort, well known as the editor of the famous periodical La Lanterne, gave evidence in her favor. Her own address was of a violent character, and she seemed anxious to justify herself rather than to clear herself of the charge. She violently attacked the government, and declared that the issue of the pamphlets to the soldiers inciting them to burn their barracks and murder their officers was justified. She declared that the soldiers at Sedan would have done well to shoot their officers and save their honor. The jury rendered a verdict of guilty, and she was condemned to six years' imprisonment and ten years' police supervision.

Parties of Jews are Gathering at Cyprus under British protection awaiting the opening of Palestine by the Turkish Government. The Committee of the Syrian Colonization Fund have recently received news of the safe arrival of the second party sent out by them to the East. The party consists of eighty-six Jews, men, women, and children, and they are now settled at Cyprus, where they will be established, by permission of the government, until the difficulties which at present hinder Jews from settling in Syria can be removed. The committee are providing implements, dwellings, and all other necessaries for the people. Thus it is evident the prophecies are nearing fulfilment, and as was recently shown in an article on prophecy in this journal, it is under British guidance that the return of the Jews to Palestine will be accomplished.

A Proposal Dealing with the Irish Land problem of a most significant character has been introduced into Parliament. Its object is the creation of a proprietary tenancy by the erection of local boards to take charge of fixing the price of the property and raising the money to pay off the landlord on debentures. It proposes that the State shall guarantee the interest, the tenant to become owner, and his annual payment not to exceed his present rent. The scheme was not adopted by the government, but the favorable terms in which Mr. Gladstone spoke of it led to the belief that some project of similar principles might eventually be introduced by him.

The Visit of Dr. Somerville, the Veteran evangelist, to South Africa, is already bearing fruit. The Diamond Fields Advertiser thus speaks of his services at Kimberley near the mines: "Early on Sunday evening dense crowds assembled outside the entrance to the spacious Town Hall, and half an hour before the advertised time of opening the service every inch of accommodation was taken advantage of, while masses of people surrounded the doorways unable to gain admittance. At the request of Dr. Somerville those still outside assembled in the adjoining Presbyterian Church, and a simultaneous service, conducted by the Revs. Barton and Pritchard, was held there. The meeting in the Town Hall was enlivened by the singing of a large choir, consisting of ladies and gentlemen representing all our Protestant churches in Kimberley, under the leadership of Mr. Cumming, at present assisting Dr. Somerville in his South African tour. The address, which was most impressive, simple, and pointed, was listened to by the vast audience with the greatest attention. Dr. Somerville intends holding public meetings in the same place during the whole of this week, and before leaving will specially address the young men, and we believe arrangements are being made by him to address a vast gathering of native laborers in our mines."

THE EMPEROR AND EMPRESS OF RUSSIA—Scene at their Coronation on May 27.

ALEXANDER III., THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA, AND THE EMPRESS.

Birth in 1845—Marriage in 1866—The Empress's Early Betrothment—Previous Sympathy with Secret Societies—Reason for Changing His Opinion—The Religion of Russia—The Coronation Ceremonies on May 27—How the Czar was Received—Influences at Work.

THE Czar Alexander III., whose portrait with that of his wife appears on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, succeeded to Imperial rule over all the Russias on the assassination of his father on Sunday, March 14th, 1881, but his coronation was postponed until about a month ago. He was born on March 10th, 1845, and has consequently just entered his thirty-ninth year. He is not the first-born son of the late Emperor, but succeeded to the throne because of the death of his elder brother, the Grand Duke Nicholas, born September 20th, 1843, which occurred at Nice in April, 1865. The present Emperor was married in November, 1866, to Maria Dagmar, daughter of the King of Denmark, sister to the Princess of Wales and to the King of Greece. Previous to her marriage she joined the Russian Greek Church and on being received into that church she took the name of Maria Feodorovna.

THE EMPRESS'S EARLY BETROTHMENT.

She was affianced at an early age to the late Czar's first-born son, the Grand Duke Nicholas, and—as in the case of Catherine of Aragon—espoused the brother of her betrothed husband shortly after the term of mourning prescribed by etiquette for the death of the latter at Nice, in 1865, had expired. An alliance with the reigning house of Denmark appeared at that time desirable to the late Czar's political advisers, and thus the bride of the youthful Czarewitch was transferred to his robust and vigorous brother, who now wears the Imperial crown.

The correspondent of the New York Herald, who was one of the six foreign correspondents permitted to attend the coronation ceremonies, thus writes of the character of the royal lady who is now Empress of Russia: "The Empress is as much liked in Russia as her sister, the Princess of Wales, is in England. The two sisters resemble each other, not only in looks, but in sweetness of character. Alexander's domestic life has hitherto been pure and wonderfully happy, and unless something happens to mar this, we may look for a considerable change in the ideas of the court on the subject of morals. The Czarevna has four beautiful children—the eldest, Nicholas, a fine boy of twelve; the second, George, about nine, who bears a striking resemblance to the early pictures of Alexander II., and two much younger ones, Xenia and Michael. She has accompanied her husband to all parts of European Russia and has gained the affection of the people, particularly of the Poles. In the winter, at the Anitchkov Palace, she has an annual Christmas tree, but it is not invariably the children of the nobles who are invited, but a number from the most squalid homes in St. Petersburg, recommended by some of the members of the Society for the Relief of Distress, and these are always sent away with a good stock of warm clothing as well as the customary Christmas presents.

THE SECRET ASSOCIATIONS.

Alexander, like most Crown Princes, allied himself during the lifetime of his father to the most progressive party in politics, and is believed to have coquetted as lately as four years ago with the more advanced Panslavistic organizations, which were acting in concert with though not openly allied to the associations formed for the promotion of a revolutionary movement in Russia. Upon more than one occasion the Grand Duke's relations with native patriots of the advanced Panslavistic school are stated to have led to distressing differences between himself and his father, to whom, moreover, his admitted dislike to Germany was particularly painful.

When, however, it became evident, not only to the Imperial family, but to the public that the chief aim of the Nihilistic conspiracy was the assassination of the Czar, his son, the present Emperor, broke off all communications with every description of secret society in and out of Russia, and identified himself unreservedly with the line of action adopted by his father's advisers for the perpetuation of the Romanoff dynasty.

The new Emperor is said to be a strong, determined man, though his nerves have been severely shaken by the continual peril of assassination in which the last two years of his life have been passed. His face has none of that pathetic melancholy peculiar to his father's. His expression is active, keen and somewhat severe. His manners are quick, decided and occasionally brusque. He is not quite so tall as other members of his family, being a little under six feet in height, but his frame is large, thick-set and muscular. He is the first Emperor since Peter who has married elsewhere than in Germany. The Herald correspondent says: "That the Czar has been no carpet soldier is evident from the marks of frostbites on the third and fourth fingers of his left hand and a slight scar on his temple, where a bullet grazed his head in one of the battles in the Turkish war. He is very popular in Copenhagen, where he and the Princess Dagmar, as she is still fondly called by the Danes, walk about the town together in the most unceremonious manner and are always ready to take their part in any popular entertainment during the long visits which they periodically pay at her father's court. It also speaks well for him that he is supposed to require no extra amusement there, but to be perfectly happy, leading a simple life with his wife and children, roaming about in the park and spending quiet evenings in the castle."

The Czar's study in the Anitchkov Palace is a small room fitted up with maps and globes and well-filled bookcases, in which historical works in all languages predominate. That he is a reader is shown by the pile of newspapers which he collects at the different stations when on a railroad journey to peruse on the road, and he has taken personal interest in the publication of the State correspondence in Russia. The Czar is an early riser, and the labors of his day commence at nine in the morning. Till one o'clock he is occupied in his study receiving the Ministers, who present their weekly or daily reports, and consulting with them over affairs of State.

It is especially significant of the policy of the present Czar that while high officials have often a difficulty in obtaining an interview, His Majesty is always accessible to provincial deputations, which are sometimes composed of wild Khirgiz, sometimes of swarthy Kalmuks or skin-clad Samoyedes, and sometimes of illiterate Russian peasants who desire to present a holy picture to their great father and to express their loyalty and devotion to his person. The Emperor receives one and all with a stern dignity which though accompanied in most cases by a certain kindness of manner, always leaves the conviction that Alexander III. feels himself an autocrat, and is determined to yield none of his prerogatives, but to impress on all who approach him that they are in the presence of an absolute, though kindly master. This species of self-assertion was a trait in the character of the Emperor in his very earliest days.

THE RELIGION OF RUSSIA.

The greatest weakness of Russia is the absence of a pure religious faith. The Gospel of Christ is hidden by human devices. The Greek Church, which is the Russian State Church, is not so superstitious or intolerant as the Roman Catholic, although similar in other respects. While the Russian people are intensely religious as regards forms and rites, the idea of religion as a moral power is known only to a few.

THE CORONATION.

The coronation of the Czar is purely a religious rite, being almost void of political meaning. It does not add anything to his rights except sanctioning his right to wear the crown and the Imperial purple cloak, the sceptre, and the Imperial globe (derjava). But these are only the symbols of the prerogatives which he actually wields when once the oath of allegiance is taken by his subjects. The ceremony took place in the Kremlin at Moscow on Sunday, May 27th, with a great deal of pomp and solemnity. In the Uspensky Sabor, or Cathedral Church of the Ascension, the Emperor and Empress walked under a canopy of cloth of gold with embroidered eagles, plumes of ostrich feathers, and a crown surmounting all. The poles supporting the canopy were borne by sixteen generals, while sixteen more held the cords and tassels. The Metropolitan Archbishop of Novgorod threw holy water upon the Emperor and Empress, who kissed the cross in the Metropolitan's hand. They then proceeded to their places in the church, while the clergy were singing.

THE CZAR CROWNS HIMSELF.

The Metropolitan ascended the platform, and gave the Emperor an open book, from which he read the articles of faith aloud. After having read a chapter from the New Testament, the Emperor rose, took off the small chain of the Order of St. Andrew, and put on the ermine mantle and a large chain of diamonds. Then the Metropolitan pronounced a blessing, and prayed with the Emperor. A high functionary approached with the Imperial crown upon a crimson cushion. The Metropolitan took it with both hands, and presented it to the Emperor. The Emperor received it, and himself placed it upon his head, while the Metropolitan read a speech composed for the occasion. In the same manner the Emperor received the sceptre and the Imperial orb of gold. He then sat down with the sceptre in his right hand and the globe in his left. The coronation ceremony is supposed to have the same meaning as the anointing of David performed by Samuel. And the Metropolitan of Moscow, while laying his hands on the Czar's head, prays that God would bless him as He formerly blessed David anointed by Samuel. In the further prayers the Metropolitan says that the Czar's visible and material ornaments are a sign of the invisible God's blessing and of the gift of the Holy Ghost.

While the Czar puts on himself the purple cloak, the Metropolitan prays God to grant him protection from above. The Czar puts on his head his crown, and the Metropolitan says that that signifies that God makes him the head and master of his people. Further on the prelate asks God to grant to the new autocrat "the sceptre of salvation, to seat him on the throne of truth, to arm him by the might of the Holy Ghost, and to anoint him with the chrism of heavenly joy."

THE EMPRESS CROWNED.

After the Czar had placed his crown upon his head, and assumed the sceptre and orb, and had taken his seat upon his throne, he called the Empress. The Herald correspondent says, "She rose from her throne and, her train being borne by eight courtiers, knelt before the Czar, bending reverently her head, upon which the Emperor rested his crown for a moment, symbolizing her share of his glory and his woes. This was

A BEAUTIFULLY TOUCHING SCENE.

Then four grand duchesses approached the Empress and assisted the placing of the small and beautiful crown upon her head, where it rested a mass of sparkling light. Rising from her kneeling attitude she approached the Czar and bent her head on one side to receive the Emperor's kiss, tears the while filling her eyes; and the great, strong man, deeply touched, with misty eyes too, bent down and kissed lovingly and tenderly the white, earnest face that looked up to him and that seemed so expressive of mingled happiness and tender anxiety. It was a scene that will ever linger in the memory of those who witnessed it."

The Emperor also placed the ermine mantle upon the Empress's shoulders, and fastened it with the chain of St. Andrew. Then both their Majesties took their seats, and all the bells of Moscow began to ring at once, while a salute of one hundred and one guns was fired, and the

The evil chieftain, whosoever he may be, that shall arrive at this "bad eminence," will then be in the position to begin a war of extermination against the "good." These, living in the world, while not of the world, will take no part in the fiery contests around them; nor, when the wicked supremacy is established, will they be forward to profess an allegiance to it that will render questionable their loyalty to Christ. This negation of his authority and supremacy will be intolerable to the king, and hence persecution and

EXTERMINATION WILL BE PROCLAIMED.

This, no doubt, is the rationale of these events; and it is in various ways confirmed by Scripture.

The kingdom represented by the iron of the quadrimetallic image of Daniel 2 was, like iron, to break in pieces and subdue all things, and to this kingdom belongs the evil chieftain of the last days. The fourth beast of Daniel 7, on which appeared the Little Horn, was dreadful, terrible, and strong exceedingly; it had great iron teeth, and devoured and brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with his feet; and it had ten horns, representing subject kings. The King of Fierce Countenance of Daniel 8 waxed exceeding great (the prophetic mode of expressing continual conquest over rival powers) toward the south and east, and toward the pleasant land—even to the host of heaven, casting down some of the host and of the stars to the ground. The Wilful King of Daniel 11 shall do according to his will, and exalt and magnify himself above all. He will be involved in contests with the king of the south, and other powers. Of the Man of Sin of St. Paul little is said to connect him with war or warlike proceedings and conquests; but his identity with the Wild Beast of the Apocalypse is undeniable; and it is not easy to conceive how he could in this world reach the exalted position assigned to him by Paul, except by means of

SUCCESSFUL WAR AGAINST ALL OPPOSERS.

But the apocalyptic Wild Beast, without doubt, is a great warrior. The outcry of wonder from all the world, "Who is like him? who is able to make war with him?" cannot be sent forth until he has made his prowess felt. All the characteristics of Daniel's iron kingdom, Little Horn, King of Fierce Countenance, Wilful King, and Paul's Man of Sin, and Son of Perdition, meet in him. After his establishment upon the earth as King of the Locusts, there are indications in the prophecy of an indescribable conflict of great powers under the second woe-trumpet, in which two hundred millions of horsemen are engaged, and the third part of men are slain. Whether this is to be literally understood is not the question here; it implies war and bloodshed in a struggle for power and conquest; and as it occurs before the war against the saints and slaughter of the witnesses, it confirms the position before implicitly arrived at—that the last conflict between good and evil can only take place after a tremendous struggle among the nations for supremacy; and this position is thus established by Scripture, as well as by reason.

THE WORLD IN THE LATTER DAYS.

The course of the argument has unfolded a view of the condition of the world in the latter days that most strikingly answers to the prescient description given by our Saviour to His disciples as He sat upon the Mount of Olives.

ORDER AND NATURE OF FINAL EVENTS.

It is time, however, to make some distinctions that are necessary to give the mind a definite apprehension of the order and character of the events of the last days. By the last war must be understood the war which will be waged by the evil chief against the Lamb—the Lord Jesus Christ. It is this which stamps its character as a contest between good and evil; for the evil, then, is all evil, and the good is all good.

The war with the saints and witnesses, though designated a war, will more properly be a raid of persecution and extermination; for in proportion as the followers of Christ are true representatives of the good will they refrain from the sword and from all acts of offence and reprisal. "Here is the patience and the faith of the saints;" and, "from henceforth, blessed are the dead which die in the Lord." In the extremity of their peril the Lord will appear for their salvation, and will then avenge their blood upon those that dwell on the earth. This raid upon the saints will be a movement totally distinct from that in which "nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom," as described by our Lord. The former will be projected and carried on by the Antichrist, or evil chief alone, and the latter will be the process of his rise to supreme power by the subjugation of all worldly antagonists.

COMMOTION AMONG THE NATIONS.

This period of commotion among the nations and kingdoms must necessarily be a time of terrible "distress and perplexity." It will not be surprising that the pretensions of some to be deliverers and saviours will excite the hopes and foster the credulity of multitudes, who will be led after false Christs and false prophets only until himself shall appear with signs and lying wonders, aided by all the power of Satan, and so able to delude the world into the worship of himself as its God and Saviour. This will inaugurate the last stage of this world's impiety and blasphemy, which, supplemented as it will be by the raid of Antichrist upon the saints, will call down the predicted vials of Divine wrath and empty them to the last drop of their indignation upon the destroyers of the earth.

THE "TRAVAILING WOMAN."

But it is not to be supposed that a period of commotion like that thus alluded to can come upon the world without previous preparation. The rise of the Beast, or Antichrist, from the bottomless pit, must occur in order of time before that Beast can wage war with and overcome the saints; so, before the ascension of the Wild Beast from the pit, there must come the travailing in birth of the Woman of Revelation 12, and the casting out of heaven of Satan, who then, in his wrath at the escape of the Woman, raises up the Wild Beast to perform his will. This sequence of events is undeniable. It is only the varying methods of interpreting the symbols of this chapter that introduce confusion.

The period of time, then, that is covered by the events symbolized by the travailing in birth of the Woman clothed with the sun, the war between Michael and the Dragon, the casting out of Satan, and the flight of the Woman, is an interval of the utmost interest and importance—not inferior, in fact, to that which follows it. For anything that can be discovered from the tenor and sequence of the prophecy, it is just that series of events that may begin now at any time, and lead on from the present ordinary aspect of worldly affairs to

THE RISE AND REIGN OF ANTICHRIST.

However important it may be to obtain a right understanding of the symbols used in the twelfth chapter of the Apocalypse, it is much more essential to a proper appreciation of the general sense of the whole prophecy that the correct sequence of the events portrayed should be made apparent. Only by such a method can anachronisms be avoided. Whatever becomes of the symbols, or any particular explanation or application of them, a clearly deduced sequence in the action, or order of events, must be a prime necessity, and, when made out, should be unflinchingly held, no matter what the necessities of an attractive exposition may be.

This remark is not intended to discourage attempts to explain the symbolical representations, but rather to facilitate that object by indicating the

TRUE METHOD OF APOCALYPTIC ANALYSIS.

In determining sequences the following positions are impregnable:

1. Beginning with the travailing Woman, she must appear with child before Satan can appear to be watching to devour her offspring.
2. She must travail in birth before the Man-child can be born.
3. The child must be born before he can be caught away to God's throne and delivered from the Dragon.
4. Satan's attempts to devour the Man-child, if that be the occasion of the war in heaven (as the text would seem to indicate), must precede that war.
5. The war necessarily precedes the expulsion of Satan and his angels.
6. The expulsion of the Dragon, being consequent upon his attempt to devour the Man-child, the wrath that rages in him must be caused by his combined failure and defeat, and must precede his persecution of the Woman and her flight.
7. The Woman's flight, again, precedes the flood sent after her by the Dragon.
8. The failure of the flood to carry her away precedes the devil's next movement—to wage war against her seed by means of the Wild Beast, whom he raises out of the flood.
9. The Beast's rise must precede his attainment of worldly supremacy.
10. He arrives at supremacy before he overcomes and slays the saints and witnesses, etc., etc.

It is not requisite that this series of sequences should be lengthened; it is full and explicit enough to show that the important period, from the beginning of the Woman's travail to the rise of the Antichrist, is well defined in prophecy, and fitly introductory to of his times. With reference to the remark already made—that the events foreshadowed by the symbolical representations of the twelfth chapter of the Apocalypse, are just those which might begin at any time and lead on to the rise and reign of Antichrist—one or two observations seem to be relevant.

1. They are undeniably first in order of time. This is sufficiently shown by the above list of sequences, and calls for no further remark.

2. Travailing in birth is a most appropriate figure for the rudimentary stages of a great event, when the principles and motives that lead to it are working in embryo. It is the figure commonly used to illustrate the condition and feelings of the Jewish nation when seeking to return to their own land in the latter days, and "The Lord shall set His hand again the second time to recover the remnant of His people." (See Micah 4:9, 10; Jer. 4:31; 30:6; Isa. 66:7, 8; Micah 5:3; Hosea 13:13). If this be the meaning of the figure in the Apocalypse (and its probability is very great), it seems to imply that a signal movement and agitation among the Jews on the subject of their restoration to Palestine, will indicate the beginning of those "wonders" of which Daniel (12:8) inquired the end.

3. That such a travailing in birth may begin now at any time, even in the present condition of the world, considering its proclivities—which tend toward that sort of universal action which a general agitation among the Jews must presuppose, from their wide dispersion over the world—is self-evident. All great movements, either in the moral, religious, or political world, have such beginnings; great principles and great institutions being brought to the birth by comparatively slow and painful degrees. Taking our standpoint, therefore, in the present year, it is not possible for any human being to declare, from the nature of the case and the position of human affairs, that the process here foreshadowed shall not begin at any moment subsequent to the present day. And when once begun, the course of events will not tarry or be set aside. This we may be assured of, because supernatural agency will speedily come upon the scene to work for a specific purposes and end, beginning its action upon the original tempter, whose expulsion from heaven brings "woe to the inhabiters of the earth."

CURRENT EVENTS.

Action has at Length been Taken by the Commissioners of Emigration to prevent the landing of the crowds of Irish paupers now being sent here by the British Government. It has been discovered that a large proportion of the "assisted emigrants" have been the inmates of poor houses, and are likely to become a public charge. The Secretary of the Board of Commissioners has been instructed "to report in writing to the Collector of the Port all immigrants coming to this port from almshouses or eleemosynary institutions of foreign countries as unable to take care of himself or herself without becoming a 'public charge,' unless authentic evidence is produced to show that said persons are able to take care of themselves." Collector Robertson has also notified the steamship companies that their vessels will be boarded in the bay, and if any persons are found thereon who are paupers, or likely to become a public charge, the steamship company will be required to take them back at their own expense.

The President's Plan for the Reduction of the Internal Revenue Districts was issued last week. President Arthur has slightly exceeded the reductions suggested by Congress. It will be remembered that Congress suggested that the districts might be reduced by one-third. The President's consolidations reduce the number from 126 to 82. One-fourth of the consolidations are made in New England, New York, and Pennsylvania. The changes were to go into effect on July 1st. In some cases the collectors of the consolidated districts are new men, but in the majority the collector of one of the districts consolidated is made collector of the enlarged district. While, therefore forty-four districts disappear from the list, there are more than forty-four collectors discharged. This exceedingly difficult and delicate task has necessarily provoked considerable criticism, and must have caused the President some anxiety. It is unfortunate that in performing it he should have had as adviser such a man as Commissioner Evans, whose extraordinary conduct since he has been in office has brought discredit on the administration, and has, if the numerous reports may be trusted, elicited a reproof from the President. Vigorous protests come from all quarters where removals have taken place, the friends of the decapitated officials being indignant over the President's decision. The journals representing the section of the party known as the Half Breeds are loud in denunciation of the changes, averring that Stalwart collectors have been retained and Half Breeds dismissed. That question, however, does not trouble the public, which is concerned rather that the revenue service should be managed by honest and efficient men, than that they should be selected from any particular section of the party.

An Inquiry has been Ordered in the Case of Mr. Charles M. Horton, whom Commissioner Evans recently appointed special agent on the recommendation of ex-Secretary Blaine and others. Serious charges were made against Mr. Horton soon after his appointment was announced, and now a distinct charge is made that when he was in the public service before, he accepted a bribe of $600. Mr. Evans stated that Mr. Horton was his personal friend, but that defence for the appointment does not cover this particular question. Mr. Horton emphatically denies the charge, and an investigation is now proceeding before Mr Horton enters on his duties.

The Scott Liquor Law in Ohio was on June 26th pronounced constitutional by the Supreme Court of the State, Judge O'Key dissenting. This was the law passed by the last legislature when it became evident that the Pond Law was unconstitutional. The leading features of the law are an annual tax, for beer and wine only, $100; an annual tax for selling spirituous liquors, with or without beer and wine, $200. Unpaid assessments, and penalties thereon will attach as a lien on the real property, so that the landlord is responsible for their payment. Saloon keepers who return their business as dealers in malt or vinous liquors and who shall sell spirituous liquors shall have $250 added to their $125 assessment; and if any of these increased assessments are not paid when due the penalty shall be twenty per cent added. The revenues and fines from this law are to be distributed as follows: One fourth to the poor fund of the county; the remaining three fourths equally between the police and the general funds; where corporations have no police fund, the three fourths shall be placed in the general fund. Any person who sells intoxicating liquors to minors or drunkards shall be fined from $25 to $100 or be imprisoned ten to thirty days or both. The Dead Letter law which forbids the selling of intoxicating liquors to be drunk on the premises is repealed. The decision of the Supreme Court is likely to have an important influence on the campaign.

The Iowa Republican Convention Assembled on Wednesday, June 27th, at Des Moines. This convention has been anticipated with some anxiety, owing to the failure in the courts of the prohibition amendment, and uncertainty as to the action of the Republican party with regard to it. The attitude of the party was explicitly defined in the platform. In the second resolution the following decisive statement is made: "We plant ourselves on the side of the homes of our own people in their contest against the saloons; that when the Republican party of Iowa pledged itself, in 1879, to give to the people, at a special non-partisan election, the opportunity to vote on a proposition to so amend the constitution of the State as to prohibit the manufacture and sale as a beverage of intoxicating liquors, it acted in good faith, and the special election of June 27th, 1882, gave evidence of the redemption of the pledge so given, and we now declare that we accept the result of the election with its majority of 29,974 in favor of the adoption of the amendment so voted on as the verdict of the people in favor of constitutional and statutory prohibition, and without making any test of party fealty we recognize the moral and political obligation which requires the enactment of such laws by the next General Assembly as shall provide for the establishment and enforcement of the principle and policy affirmed by the people at said non-partisan election, and to that end the faith of the party is pledged." On the tariff issue which was regarded as only next in importance to the liquor question, the convention joined issue with the Democrats, and declared for protection. Governor Sherman and Lieutenant-Governor Manning were renominated, and Judge Reed received the nomination on the second ballot for judge of the Supreme Court.

A Beautiful Statue of General R. E. Lee was unveiled on June 28th, at Lexington, Va. The ceremony was the occasion of an interesting gathering of prominent people from all parts of the country. Mr. Valentine's statue of the general has cost $15,000. It is a life-size recumbent figure of white Vermont marble. The floor of the chamber is tesselated in white marble and encaustic tiles. Slabs of gray Indiana marble set in dark red Baltimore brick form panels on the wall, and above them are niches for medallions in low relief of Confederate generals. The general seems at rest on his camp-bed, one hand resting on his bosom, the other touching his sword, the head turned partly to one side. The covering and drapery are faithfully represented, and the expression of the face is one of repose.

A Steady Decline in the Western Floods was continuous through last week. It commenced on Tuesday, and on Saturday a telegram from St. Louis stated that nearly all the sidewalks along the river front were visible, and business was being resumed. The work of relieving the distress of families is progressing, but not as much has been done as was desired, owing to the scarcity of money. It is expected, however, that more funds or provisions will be available in a day or two, when the relief will be more effective. The railroads are getting into pretty good shape again, and there are no longer any delays to trains in any direction. The dread of a June rise from the mountains is fast passing away, and the general belief now is that there will be no additional damage done, even though the river should rise again. The losses in cattle and crops cannot at present be calculated with accuracy, but it is certain that it will be several millions of dollars.

A War on Trade Dollars Agitated the Business community in New York last week. Rumors were in circulation early in the week that the value of the coin would soon be depreciated by legislation, and those traders who had many of them hastened to unload. Before the close of the week the price had fallen, until it was difficult to obtain more than eighty-five cents for them. The present condition of the Treasury balance with its perpetually increasing store of standard silver dollars, leads to apprehension lest that coin, too, should cease to be legal tender and depreciate, but until Congress meets in December there is no danger of any change in that direction.

We Acknowledge with much Pleasure the receipt of several contributions to the fund for supplying The Christian Herald to colored ministers in the South. A Baltimore subscriber who sends $2 says: "The paper has often brightened my pathway through life, and I pray that the blessing of God may ever rest upon it." Five dollars are received from a subscriber in Cambridgeport, Mass.; $10 from a subscriber in Verona, Wis., and $10 from a subscriber in Illinois, who asks, as others have done, that his name may not be published. We heartily join our prayers with those of our friends that God may continue to bless The Christian Herald and make it instrumental for good as He has done hitherto.

A Little Girl was Killed by a Carpet-tack at Lockport, N. Y., recently. On June 19th a little girl, only sixteen months old, while playing at her mother's knee fell upon the floor, and the point of a tack penetrated her forehead. The matter caused no uneasiness at the time, but the child continued to get worse each day since, and finally the wound developed symptoms of blood poisoning which grew more dangerous in character, until on June 27th she expired in convulsions. This severe and sad result from such a trifling wound is something very unusual in the experience of physicians. Similar cases, however, in spiritual concerns are by no means rare. It is the slight injuries done by some careless word or inconsistent act, which at the times may pass unnoticed, that most frequently give a fatal turning to a child's soul (Prov. 11 : 9).

Losing an Arm to Save a Child was the Result of a car-driver's humanity in Jersey City last week. John Monahan, the driver of a "bobtail" car plying between Jersey City and Hoboken was driving through Grove Street of the former city, when he saw a little girl toddle out on the street and on to the track. He turned his horse, which was going very fast; then, knowing that he could not stop the car in time, he leaned over the dashboard and lifted the child aside. He leaned over so far that he lost his balance, fell, and the wheels of the car passed over his arm, crushing it so badly that it will have to be amputated. It is very sad that the man should so suffer through his effort to save the child. He must have known that he was running a risk to himself in doing as he did, though he could not forsee how seriously he would be injured. We should think it very ungrateful of the child's parents if they failed to reward their child's preserver, yet when men are told that the Saviour actually gave His life for them they hear the story unmoved (Heb. 12 : 2).

A "Whooper-up" is a Professional not Classified in our city directories, but it appears from a statement recently published in a New York daily journal that there is a demand for such people, and that their duties are performed and paid for. A reporter entered one of the low-class variety theatres, notorious for the hilarity of its audience, and heard the manager engage a girl as "a whooper-up." Not understanding the term, he asked what it meant, and the manager replied, "That's one," and pointed out a girl of demonstrative exuberance. She giggled convulsively at all of the witticisms uttered within hearing, she laughed loud and long at the stage fun, and she joined with shrill gaiety in the choruses of the songs. Altogether, she seemed the maddest, merriest creature in the gathering. "She's a whooper-up," the man explained. "It's her business to keep the jollity going." There is something intensely melancholy in the idea of a kind of jollity which needs to be kept up by salaried laughers. It must be of the most empty, hollow kind. Yet there is no doubt that much of the world's so-called happiness is so maintained, but generally Satan pays the wages (Eccles. 7 : 6).

A Romantic Story is Told of a Child now in the Orphan Asylum of New York. During the summer vacation last year a little orphan girl of singular beauty was received into the asylum on the application of a man who said the child was without means or friends, and that he had brought her there as an act of charity. He said she was born in Baltimore, Md. The child became a favorite, and talked freely of her past life, but could not remember names, not even those of her father and grandfather. One of the attendants, however, believing from the child's narrative that she had once lived at Alameda, Cal., wrote to some friends of her own in that city. The reply recently rceived leads to the belief that the child was adopted by a man and woman there when she became an orphan, and that they received, under her grandfather's will, a considerable sum of money for her support. Afterward wearying of the charge, or from motives of cupidity, they brought her to New York and handed her over to the orphan asylum, telling the child that it was a boarding-school. If the facts are correctly reported this seems a very culpable attempt to shirk responsibility, but while we condemn it we should ask ourselves whether in leaving ministers and evangelists to fulfil the Saviour's injunction (Mark 16 : 15) we are not acting in a similar manner (Matt. 25 : 45).

A Poor Boy's Treasure Excited Some Curiosity recently. A farmer in New Jersey engaged some boys from a charitable institution at Hagerstown, Ind., to work on his farm. The agent who conducted them there noticed one of the boys who had been bound to the owner of the farm for a term of years, kept placing his hand inside of his jacket on the left side, and occasionally would peep within with a tender look. At last he said, "What have you got in there, my little friend?" "Oh, nothing, sir," he replied, "only a bit of my mother's dress which I've sewed on my coat; it was the dress she had on when she died, and now it kind of comforts me when I touch it." It was a pitiful treasure, utterly worthless, but to the boy more precious than gold. He must have loved his mother very dearly to have derived comfort from a scrap of her clothing. If she had left him a letter of instructions, or have told him of something he might do for her sake, such a boy would not have neglected it. Yet while a poor orphan boy so loved his earthly parent, men who have far more cause to love their Father in heaven are often careless of His Word and commands (John 14 : 21).

A Line of Remarkable Willow Trees at Cambridge, Mass., has an interesting history. A visitor from England to that city recently noticed the willows, which are set in a row of mathematical accuracy, and remarked that they seemed to be of great age. He was then given the following account of their origin: During the Revolutionary War, while the American Army was encamped on the heights around Boston, a fortification was thrown up, extending from Somerville westward through Cambridge. This fortification ran directly through the field in which the willows now grow. In order to form a palisade, willow stakes were driven into the top of the earthen barricade, and these stakes took root and finally developed into the handsome willows which now adorn the field. The brave men who thus used the stakes doubtless regarded them as mere dead wood, and had no idea that after the lapse of more than a century they would be flourishing trees. There are men about us who are dead in trespasses and sins and whom the Church too often regards as hopelessly dead, who might be quickened into new life by the Holy Spirit, if they were brought under His influence, and that life would be eternal (Ezek. 17 : 24).

An Enormous Boulder Suspended in the Flume, which has for generations been an object of interest to visitors to the Franconian Mountains, is said to have fallen at last. This huge rock, filling the entire space between the smooth walls of the Flume, was held there, at a height of perhaps forty feet above the stream that tumbles along the floor of the wonderful gorge, as if gripped in the jaws of a vise. It was a puzzle to everybody, no one being able to explain what held the boulder in place. It seemed as if a blow from a sledge-hammer would dislodge the enormous rock and send it thundering down the chasm; yet thousands of people crossed the big timber that spans the gorge above the boulder, or clambered down, at much risk, upon the suspended rock itself, without thought of insecurity. The undermining power of floods, in some ancient time, probably landed the boulder in the position in which it was for so long a time the wonder of all visitors. Happily, no one was injured by the fall of the gigantic rock, though so many people have been rash enough to walk upon it, believing that as it had remained so many years unmoved, it never would move. The same disposition is manifested as to the coming of the days of trouble, but God's word will be fulfilled (II Peter 3 : 4, 10).

IMITATORS OF GOD.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Be ye therefore followers of God, as dear children."—EPHESIANS 5 : 1.

The Constant Giver—I. The Precept—A Call to Duty—A Word to Children—An Ennobling Precept—A Test—Of Knowledge—Of Love—Of Spirit—A Valuable Aid—A Help to Usefulness—II. Encouragements—Children Already—Having the Divine Nature — Helped by the Spirit—Communing with God—A Persian Fable—IV. Inferences—Cranmer and Leighton.

WE shall read the text as it should more properly be translated: "Be ye therefore imitators of God, as beloved children." Upon the word imitate our discourse will hinge.

The division into chapters is often most unfortunate, and in this case it causes a break in a passage which in its sense is one and indivisible. The apostle had said, "Be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you. Be ye therefore imitators of God, as dear children." He has forgiven you, therefore imitate Him. It is a pity to have divided the argument from the conclusion.

The apostle urges us to give and forgive. If ye be imitators of God, give, for He is always giving. Give, for if He were not to give, our lives would end; give, for He giveth unto all men liberally and upbraideth not, and every good gift and every perfect gift is from above. Be ye imitators of God, who spared not His own Son. Thanks be to His name for that unspeakable gift!

THE CONSTANT, GENEROUS GIVER,

Then comes that which to most men is a harder task, but which to a Christian man is a delight—I mean to forgive. God for Christ's sake hath forgiven us; He has blotted out our transgressions like a cloud, and cast our sins into the depth of the sea, plunging them into oblivion; therefore, let us forgive most freely all that have done us wrong, so that when we bow our knee we may say without hypocrisy, "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive them that trespass against us." Let giving and forgiving be two prominent features of our lives as Christians—giving to the needy and forgiving the guilty; giving to such as ask of us, and forgiving such as offend us. By these two things let us show that we walk in love as Christ also hath loved us. He has given Himself for us, and through His precious blood we are forgiven our iniquities; let us, therefore, blend giving and forgiving into one God-like life, imitating our God. This is our Father's commandment, let it be our delight.

I. With this as a preface, let us now come closely to the text, and let us consider the precept here laid down—"Be ye imitators of God, as dear children." I note upon this precept, first, that it calls us to practical duty. Many precepts of the Word of God are thought by men of the world to be unpractical, but even in those instances they are in error, for the result and outcome of such precepts produces the practical holiness which all profess to desire. In this instance there can be no cavil at the too spiritual, sentimental, or speculative character of the text; there can be no question as to the eminently practical character of the exhortation—"Be ye imitators of God, as dear children," for it points to action, continued action of the best kind. "Be ye imitators"—that is, do not only meditate upon God and think that you have done enough, but go on to copy what you study.

Neither does the text say to us, "Be ye admirers of God." This we ought to be, and shall be if we are true Christians. The pure in heart who alone can truly see God are filled with a reverent admiration of Him. With the angels, every gracious heart exclaims, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of hosts." "There is none holy as the Lord" (Sam. 2 : 2). When the best of men are compared with the Lord their holiness is not to be mentioned. "Who is like unto thee, O God, glorious in holiness?" But we cannot rest satisfied with rendering such admiration; we must prove that we do really admire by closely copying. The world's proverb is that "imitation is the sincerest form of flattery;" I shall alter it, and adapt it to a higher use. Imitation of God is the sincerest form of admiring Him; neither can we believe that you know God, and are at all charmed with His holiness, unless you endeavor, as He shall help you, to imitate Him as dear children.

Neither does the text even stay at adoration, though that is a sublime height. Adoration springs out of meditation and admiration, and is a very high and noble exercise of the mind. Perhaps we rise to of God on earth when we are adoring Him; this is the engagement of saints and angels before His throne, and never are we nearer heaven than when we follow the same occupation here below. Beloved, let your whole lives be adoration. Let us spread our adoration over all the day, till from the moment when we open our eyes till we close them again at night, we shall be practically worshipping the Lord by reverencing His law, delighting in His commandments, and imitating His character. It is clear that the precept before us is eminently practical. You who boast in being such practical men give heed to this!

Next, this precept treats us as children, treats us as what we are; and if we are lowly in heart we shall be thankful that it is worded as it is. Some men are very high and mighty; measured by their own rod they are great men, and hence they must be original, and strike out a path for themselves. You are not commanded to do anything of the kind; the path is laid down for you—"Be ye imitators." This is a similar doctrine to that which we teach to boys at school. You, my boy, are not to invent a system of writing; yours is a much easier task, keep to your copy, imitate every letter, ay, every turn and twist of your master's hand. Scholars can only learn by imitation, and we are all scholars. It may be something to aspire to be the head of a school of painting; but the first thing for the young artist to do is to copy. He who cannot copy cannot originate; depend upon that. I have heard great outcries about young preachers imitating, but I would suggest that, in their early efforts, this is not blameworthy. What more natural than that Timothy should at first be much influenced by Paul's manner of speech?

When our Lord Jesus exhibited on earth the character of God, His life was so original that the world knew Him not; they were puzzled and amazed at the sight of One who was so like unto the Father. His life struck men as being the most singular thing they had ever seen; and if we are close copyists of God our characters will also stand out in relief, and we shall each one be "a wonder unto many." You see it is a humbling exhortation which only men of childlike spirit are likely to regard. Wisely does the Scripture address it only to such—"Be ye therefore imitators of God, as dear children;" if you are not His children you cannot imitate Him, and you will not even desire to do so.

Observe next, that while it thus humbles us, this precept ennobles us; for what a grand thing it is to be imitators of God! It is an honor to be the lowliest follower of such a leader. It is no honor to imitate a poor example. But, oh, beloved, he who seeks to imitate his God has before him; he shall rise as on eagle's wings. We are copying infinite goodness; we seek after moral perfection. We are to be "blameless and harmless, the sons of God without rebuke;" but as God is infinitely more than that, so are we to rise above mere innocence into actual holiness. To refrain from evil is not enough, we must be filled with all goodness by the Spirit of God. Is not this a mark worth aiming at? You see your calling, brethren; to a high place in the rank of intelligences you are bidden to ascend by God Himself. In this respect take your seats in the highest room. Imitate, but note well that ye do not select an imperfect example; "Be ye imitators of God, as dear children."

While it ennobles us, this precept tests us—tests us in many points. "Be ye imitators of God;"

THIS TESTS OUR KNOWLEDGE.

A man cannot imitate that which he has never seen. He who does not know God cannot possibly imitate Him. Do you know God, my hearer? Have you turned unto Him with repentance? Have you ever spoken with Him in prayer? Have you had fellowship with Him in Christ? Can you say, "I have set the Lord always before me"? You cannot possibly follow a copy except you fix your eye upon that copy, and have some intelligent knowledge of what it is. What is more, this precept tests our love. If we love God, love will constrain us to imitate Him; but we shall not do so from any other force. We readily grow somewhat like that which we love. In married life persons who have truly loved, though they may begin with great dissimilarity, will gradually be conformed to one another in the process of years. Likeness is the natural product of love; and so if we love God truly we shall by very force of that love through His blessed Spirit grow more and more like unto Him.

Our text does even more than this; it tests our sincerity. If a man is not really a Christian he will take no care about his life; but in the matter of close copying a man must be careful; a watchful care is implied in the idea of imitation. My friend, you cannot imitate God if you are one of that sort of Christians who are habitually in a condition between sleeping and waking, with one eye a little open and the other closed. Such men live a slovenly life, and attempt a sort of happy-go-lucky religion, which may be right or which may be wrong, but its character they cannot tell, for they run with their neighbors, and never examine for themselves.

Moreover, the precept tests us as to our spirit whether it be of the law or of the Gospel. "Be ye imitators of God, as dear children;"

NOT AS SLAVES

might imitate their master—unwillingly, dreading the crack of his whip; but loving, willing imitators, such as children are. You do not urge your children to imitate you; they do this even in their games. See how the boy rides his wooden horse, and the girl imitates her nurse. You see the minister's little boy trying to preach like his father; and you all remember the picture of the tiny girl with a Bible in front of her and an ancient pair of spectacles upon her nose, saying, "Now, I'm grandmamma." They copy us by force of nature; they cannot help it. Such will be the holiness of the genuine Christian. He is born from above, and hence he lives above. His imitation of God springs out of his relationship to God. If you love evil you are not the children of God at all, and cannot imitate Him nor render to Him any acceptable service whatever. The Lord make us to be imitators of Him, even as children from a natural bent copy their parents.

While it tests us, this precept greatly aids us. It is a fine thing for a man to know what he has to do, for then he is led in a plain path because of his enemies. What a help it is to have a clear chart, and a true compass! We have only to ask, "What would our heavenly Father do in such a case?" and our course is clear. As far as we are capable of imitating the Lord our pathway is plain. Creatures cannot imitate their Creator in His divine attributes, but children may copy their Father in His moral attributes. By the aid of His divine Spirit we can copy our God in His justice, righteousness, holiness, purity, truth, and faithfulness. We can be tender-hearted, kind, forbearing, merciful, forgiving; in a word, we may walk in love as Christ also hath loved us.

I will leave my first head when I have made one more observation: this precept is greatly for our usefulness—"Be ye imitators of God, as dear children." I do not know of anything which would make us so useful to our fellowmen as this would do. What are we sent into the world for? Is it not that we may keep men in mind of God, whom they are most anxious to forget? If we are imitators of God, as dear children, they will be compelled to recollect that there is a God, for they will see His character reflected in ours. I have heard of an atheist who said he could get over every argument except the example of his godly mother; he could never answer that. A genuinely holy Christian is a beam of God's glory and a testimony to the being and the goodness of God. Men cannot forget that there is a God so long as they see His servants among them, of holiness. Holy men are the world's Bibles; they read not the Testament, but they read our testimony.

DRESSED IN THE LIVERY

Brethren, a close imitation of God would make our religion honorable. The ungodly might still hate it, but they could not sneer at it; nay, the more candid among unbelievers, perceiving our holiness to be the result of our faith, would say nothing against it. The name of Christ would not be so evil spoken of if our lives were not so faulty. Holiness is true preaching, and preaching of the most successful kind. What a support it is to the preacher when he has a people around him who are daily witnessing for God at home and in business. An unclean professor is a fountain of scepticism, and a hindrance to the Gospel. To be useful we must be holy. If we would bless men as God blesses them, we must live as God lives. Therefore, "Be ye imitators of God, as dear children." Thus much upon the precept.

II. Secondly, I invite you, dear friends, as we are helped of God's Spirit to weigh the argument. The argument is this, "Be ye imitators of God, as dear children."

First, as children. It is the natural tendency of children to imitate their parents; yet there are exceptions, for some children are the opposite of their fathers, perhaps displaying the vices of a remoter ancestor. Absalom did not imitate David, nor was Rehoboam a repetition of Solomon. In the case of God's children it is a necessity that they should be like their Father; for it is a rule in spirituals that like begets its like. Those who live wickedly are the children of the Wicked One; no proof is wanted, you may take it for granted; life is the evidence of nature. Those who live godly and righteously in Christ Jesus, believing in Him, are God's children; and though the godly sin, yet they do not love sin, nor remain without repenting of it. Holiness of life is the proof of regeneration, neither can we accept any other. "By their fruits ye shall know them," is a rule of universal application. God's children must be like Him. With all their faults and failings there must be about their lives as a whole a likeness to God. The copy may be blurred, but it is a copy.

I say to any man here who bears the name of Christian and professes to be a child of God, either be like your Father or give up your name. You remember of a soldier in Alexander's army whose name was Alexander, but when the battle was raging he trembled. Then Alexander said to him, "How canst thou bear the name of Alexander? Drop thy cowardice, or drop thy name." So say I to those who are unholy, unclean, impure, unkind, ungracious; be like God, or cease to bear the name of a child of God. What need is there that thou shouldest aggravate thy sin by pretending to a character which thou dost not possess! Be like Christ, or be not called a Christian. Do not play the Judas unless thou hast a mind to be a second "son of perdition."

The argument, then, is that if we are children we should imitate our Father; but it is also said "as dear children." Read it as "children be- loved." Is not this a tender but mighty argument? What love was that which revealed itself in your new birth and your adoption, giving you thus the nature and the status of a child of God! Furthermore, since you have been a child, was there ever such kindness received by a child from a father as you have received? Behold, He dealeth with you as with sons. You could not wish for God to improve upon His dealings with you, since He acts toward you as He uses to do unto those that love His name. Behold how He has borne with your ill manners! How He has put up with your mistakes and your forgettings! How He has cared for you in all your cares, helped you in all your difficulties, and pardoned you in all your sins! I do not know what you have to say, my brother, but this I can say, I am filled with admiration at the love of God to myself. I have been a child greatly beloved of his Father. His love to me is wonderful; I am a deep debtor to His grace. Are you not the same? Then imitate your Father, for the more the love of a child to his Father the more his admiration of his Father, and the stronger his desire to be like Him in all things. Let it be so with you.

However, this word "as dear children" bears yet another meaning.

CHILDREN DIFFER.

A father loves all his children, but he cannot be said in all respects to love them all alike, for some force him to love them beyond the rest. You have one dear son who lies nearest your heart. What a sweet child he is! You have got another boy; he is your child, and you love him, and do your best with him, but he is an awkward bit of stuff. He gives you little pleasure, and you are not particularly anxious to have him about you all day long. The first child loves you with all his heart and strives to please you. How obedient he is! How content and happy! In all things he is a comfort in the house. Your heart binds its tendrils about your Joseph more closely than about the wayward boy; you do not make a favorite of him, and so excite the jealousy of the others; yet you must own to a nearer and dearer love than usual when you think of him. You cannot help your heart clinging to him; his behavior is such that he is the son of your right hand, and he has a tender place in your soul—in a word, he is one of those whom the text calls, "dear children." Just so the Lord has certain dear children.

Our Lord Jesus had disciples, but of some He said, "Then are ye my disciples indeed." Be such. May the Holy Spirit make you such! Around us there are troops of third-rate Christians; oh, for more

FIRST-CLASS BELIEVERS!

We have many who appear to come into the Father's house at meal-times to get a bit of bread, and then they are off again into the world. Oh, to be of David's mind: "I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever." Be ye imitators of God, then, in so high a sense that ye become dear children, whose one thought is how to please their father, whose sorrow it is to grieve him, whose beauty it is to be like him.

III. In the third place, I desire, dear friends, to suggest encouragements. Did I hear one cry, "Oh, sir, this imitation of God is beyond us. How are we to be copyists of God?" I will encourage you by giving hints, which you can work out for yourselves.

First, God has already made you His children. I speak to you that are believers; you are God's sons and daughters. The greater work is done. If you are to be imitators of God, as dear children, you must first be His children; that is already accomplished. You could not have made yourselves children of God, but He has done that for you. "Beloved, now are we the sons of God." It must be a much easier thing to imitate the Father than to become a child. We are "born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God"; and by this new birth we are renewed in His image. Hence the greater part of the task, the insurmountable hill of difficulty, is over, and that which remains is but our reasonable service. Should not the child imitate his father! Will he not do so naturally?

Next remember that God has given you His nature already. It remains for you to let the new nature act after its own manner. Let the holy thing that has been born in you now occupy the throne, and subdue the body of this death. Pray God it may. It seems to me a small thing to let the new nature have scope and freedom compared with the giving of that nature. A clean heart and a right spirit have been bestowed, let these show themselves in clean lives and right feelings. The living and incorruptible seed will produce a harvest of good works, water it with your prayer and watchfulness. If anything doth hinder it, repent and do your first works.

Next, the Lord has given you His blessed Spirit to help you. "Likewise also the Spirit helpeth our infirmity." Never forget that. Things impossible with men are possible enough to the Spirit of God. We have the Spirit abiding in us, vitalizing our whole nature. The most beautiful harp you ever saw has no music in itself, but must be struck by the fingers of a musician; but the Holy Spirit makes us into living harps, which from themselves pour forth a natural and spontaneous melody. Is not this marvellous? We have not to look abroad for power to be holy, for the Spirit of God abideth in us, and worketh in us, creating in us "the spirit of power and of love and of a sound mind." Oh, to be filled with the Spirit of God!

Again remember, dear friend, that the Lord allows you to commune with Himself. Nearness to God brings likeness to God. The more you see God the more of God will be seen in you. You know of the scented clay. One said to it, "Clay, whence hast thou thy delicious perfume?" It answered: "I was aforetime nothing but a piece of common clay, but I lay long in the sweet society of a rose till I drank in its fragrance and became perfumed myself." Oh, if you dwell much with God in seasons of retirement, and abide with Him in all the affairs of life, you will be changed into His image. As surely as the type will make its impress upon the paper, and the seal will stamp itself upon the wax, so will the Lord impress Himself upon you, and stamp His image upon you if you dwell in Him.

IV. Now by turning our subject a little round we shall close with certain inferences. I have hitherto spoken only to saints, but here is an inference for seekers. "Be ye imitators of God, as dear children:" what do I infer from this? I infer that God is those who have offended Him. O you that have never been pardoned, listen to this; the Lord must be ready to forgive. We are to make God our pattern, but if God were unwilling to forgive He could not be a pattern to us. We are to be ready to pass by the offences of others, therefore if God is set forth as our example He must certainly be more ready to forgive than any of us can be. Oh, you that are covered with sin to-day, I would urge you to catch at this fact.

They said of Cranmer that he was more than ready to forgive, for he always returned good for evil. It was a common saying, "Do my lord of Canterbury an ill turn, and he will be your friend as long as you live." That was fine; but my lord of Canterbury was nothing in gentleness compared with the Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. The holy Leighton, also, was of such a gentle spirit that one day when he went out for a walk and came back he could not get into his own house, for it was locked up, and his servant had gone away for a day's fishing without leave or notice. All the good man said was, "John, next time you go fishing, please to let me know, or at least leave me the key, so that I may open the door." That was all. If even men have come up to such a degree of patience, much more will you find longsuffering in God. Oh, trembler, do believe that our Father in heaven is willing to forgive you. You backsliders, you great sinners, have right thoughts of God, and come to Him at once for reconciliation. There is forgiveness with Him. "He delighteth in mercy." "The Lord is good, and ready to forgive."

Another inference—only a hint at it—is, if you are told to be "imitators of God, as dear children," then you may depend upon it the Lord is

A DEAR FATHER.

The dear children of God have a dear Father. We may rest assured that He will be kind and tender to us, since He would have us loving toward Himself. I know you are heavy in spirit at this time; I know you are depressed and troubled; but your Father is kind and good. Believe it if you cannot see it. If reason says that He deals somewhat harshly with you, for He chastens you, remember that this is His way with His beloved. Has He not said, "As many as I love I rebuke and chasten"? These stripes are seals of love. Chastisement is a high proof of wise affection.

Lastly, when the text says, "Be ye imitators of God," it bids us keep on imitating Him as long as we live; therefore I conclude that God will always be to us what He is. He will continue in His love since He makes that love the example of ours. God will persevere in bringing us home to heaven, for He teaches us to persevere, and make this a part of our likeness to Himself. The Lord will not turn away His heart from us; He will not fail nor be discouraged; having begun to make us meet for heaven He will never stay His hand till that work is done. Wherefore rest ye upon the immutable goodness of your Father, and pray for grace evermore to imitate Him until ye come to see His face. May His presence be with you, and may He give you rest. Amen.

TWO INTERVIEWS WITH A STREET WAIF.

(See Illustration, page 428.)

SOME years ago a minister was going one Sunday morning from his house to his school-room. As he turned a corner he saw assembled around a pump a party of boys who were playing at marbles. On his coming near they began to pick up their marbles, and run away. One little fellow, not having seen him as soon as the rest, could not accomplish this, so before he had succeeded in gathering up his marbles the minister had closed upon him and placed his hand on his shoulder, and said:

"Have you found all your marbles?" "No," said the boy, "I have not."

"Then," said the minister, "I will help you to find them." Whereupon he helped to look for the marbles, and as he did so he remarked: "I liked to play at marbles when a little boy, and I think I can beat you. But," he added, "I never played marbles on Sunday."

The boy's attention was arrested; he liked his friend's face, and began to wonder who he was. The minister said: "I am going to a place where I think you would like to be. Will you come with me?"

"Where do you live?" asked the boy.

The minister told him where the house was. "Why, that's the minister's house!" exclaimed the boy; as if he did not suppose that a kind man and the minister could be the same person. "Yes," was the reply, "I am the minister, and if you will go with me I think I can do you some good." "But my hands are dirty, sir; and I cannot go, looking as I do." "Here is a pump; why not wash?" was the reply. "I am so little that I can't wash and pump at the same time," the boy said; and the minister rejoined, "If you'll wash, I'll pump."

He at once set to work, and pumped; the little boy washed his hands and face till they were clean and bright. "My hands are wet, and I don't know how to dry them."

The minister pulled out of his pocket a clean handkerchief, and offered it to the boy, who hesitated. "But it is clean!" "Yes," was the reply "but it was made to be soiled."

The boy dried his hands and face with the handkerchief, and then accompanied the minister to the door of the Sunday-school.

Twenty years after, the minister was walking in the street of a large city, when a tall gentleman meeting him, looked into his face, and said: "Do you remember me?" "No," said the minister, "I do not."

"Do you remember, twenty years ago, finding a little boy playing marbles near a pump? Do you recollect that boy being too dirty to go to school, and your pumping for him, and your speaking kindly to him and taking him to school?"

"Oh!" said the minister, "I do remember." "Sir," said the gentleman, "I was that boy. I prospered in business. I have attained a good position in society; and on seeing you to-day I felt bound to shake your hand, and say that it is to your kindness and consideration for me a little marble-player, years ago, that I owe, under God, all that I am and hope to be. May God bless you!"

THE NEW BISHOP OF TRURO,

The Right Rev. Dr. Wilkinson.

GEORGE HOWARD WILKINSON, whose portrait appears on this page, has been appointed Bishop of Truro, England, in succession to Dr. Benson, now Archbishop of Canterbury. He was born in the year 1830, and was educated at Oriel College, Oxford University, where he graduated B.A., in 1855. Two years later, in 1857, he was ordained to the ministry of the Church of England, and at the same time was appointed curate of Kensington, a suburb of London, in which capacity he remained until 1859.

That is a large parish and Mr. Wilkinson acquired there a familiar acquaintance with parochial affairs, and had ample opportunities for judging how the work of the Church should be carried on in crowded communities. He soon became conspicuous for his energy and self-devotion in the cause of the poor, no less than for his unassuming manners and the fervor with which he attended to his ecclesiastical duties—qualities which augured well for his future career. He subsequently held two livings in succession, at Seaham Harbor and Bishop Auckland, both in the county of Durham, and in 1867 he received an appointment in London where he became incumbent of St. Peter's Great Windmill Street.

WORK IN LONDON.

After three years of hard unremitting labor in this new sphere he became, in 1870, Vicar of St. Peter's, Eaton Square, and was soon afterward appointed to a canonry. The change was one of the happiest that could have befallen him. It is not difficult to be the vicar of a handsome church in the most aristocratic quarter in London, but it is by no means easy to induce the rich and idle to form and sustain those lay organizations for the improvement of the parish without which it is almost impossible for the work of the Church to be carried on.

Canon Wilkinson, however, was the very man to succeed, where tact, urbanity, and judgment were required; he roused the lukewarm and indifferent to recognize what was due from them to the religion they ostensibly professed, and his exertions resulted in St. Peter's becoming the most frequented church in the neighborhood, and the centre of a wide circle of beneficent influence that was felt far and wide. The canon's schools, societies, and associations of ladies for the purpose of helping the unfortunate and friendless who suffer through no fault of their own, have amply justified the thoughtful benevolence of their founder. His unwearying labor made his name famous in London and when Dr. Benson was promoted from the Bishopric of Truro to the Archiepiscopate of Canterbury, the hard-working pastor of St. Peter's was invited to succeed him at Truro.

A FRIEND IN NEED.

IN a long, low, old-fashioned cottage, a man in the prime of life lay dying of consumption. He was an earnest, devoted Christian, but his faith was sorely tried. It seemed so hard to leave his wife and child, when they were all so happy together.

"George, dear, how are you feeling this morning?" said his wife, entering the room where the sick man lay.

"A little brighter this morning, Alice," he answered as cheerfully as he could, "but sadly weak. The cough shakes me terribly."

"Poor dear," she said, in that tender, pitying tone he knew so well. "We must ask Dr. Clarke to give us something to relieve that cough. I think you would surely get better if it were not for that."

George shook his head despairingly, and drawing his wife's fair plump hand between his own emaciated palms, said: "It is of no use, my love. Dr. Clarke cannot help us; it is too late. We must make up our minds to part. It is the Lord's will, and I am gradually learning to submit. It is very hard, and all the harder because I do not know how you will live after I am gone; but God is faithful, and I am sure He will take care of you better than I could have done if I lived. Can you trust Him now, my love?"

Alice had her face pillowed on her husband's shoulder, and was weeping silently. She dare scarcely trust her voice to answer, but she whispered, "Yes, dear, I am trusting; He will not fail us."

Only two days afterward George Greville died, and Alice was a widow and her daughter fatherless. They laid the dear dead form tenderly in the cemetery, and sat down in their desolate cottage with hearts full of grief.

The next day Alice went with her daughter to the city to search for employment. She had few accomplishments, but she thought she might perhaps be able to give music lessons or teach French in some of the schools, or failing that might obtain employment by her needle. It was a sad mission for one whose heart was full of grief. She had written, before her husband's death, to her only brother, telling him of their trouble, but no answer had been received, and she had heard afterward that he was absent on a long voyage on which he had been sent by the firm whose confidential clerk he was. Alice knew that if he were home he would befriend her. She returned from her visit weary and discouraged, unable to obtain employment. Day after day the weary quest was continued without result, and night after night she bent at the throne of grace to gain fresh strength.

Several weeks passed by, and there was still no prospect of earning a livelihood for the widow. One evening on her return from her vain search she found an elderly gentleman at her door, who had apparently been seeking admission during her absence.

"You do not know me, Mrs. Greville," he said, in rather a dry, hard, business-like tone. "I have not had the pleasure of meeting you before, but your late husband knew me. I am the owner of the cottage. I came to see what you intend doing about it. The rent was due two weeks ago, but I thought I would not trouble you about it. Your husband used to bring it to my office in the city. I suppose you did not know it was due. Ladies don't know much about business."

Alice invited the stranger to enter. She had never given a thought to the rent of the cottage, and she was unprepared for the reminder of her oversight. The owner was a business man, hard and unsympathetic, who looked at everything from a business point of view. Alice thought that he might possibly be able to help her, so she laid her circumstances before him.

"Yours is a hard lot, madam," he said. "I wonder your husband did not insure his life. Very negligent that was on his part. Young men get married as soon as they are able to keep a wife, and trust to luck for the future. I did not get married until I had fifty thousand dollars all well invested. Pity he did not wait, then you would not have had to suffer for his imprudence. However, I'll think it over, perhaps there may be some way of helping you, and I'll call on you next week. Have you any friends who would advance you the money for the rent?"

"No, sir," said Alice. "There are none who could do that, but if you will give me a little time I hope God will enable me to pay you. I should be very sorry to leave the cottage."

"Well, you know, madam, this is a matter of business. I cannot afford to let you the cottage without rent, but I do not mind waiting a week or two if you can see your way to paying punctually in future."

The next week Mr. Righton, the owner of the cottage, called again according to promise. "Well, madam," he said, in his dry, harsh voice, "how are you getting on? Heard of anything to suit you?"

"No," said Alice, "I have been trying, but there seems no work to be had of any kind."

"Then you will be pleased to learn that I have had better success. A friend of mine whose wife died a few weeks ago needs a housekeeper, and I think you would suit him. He will take you on my recommendation. You could not take the child with you, but I can get her into an orphanage not very far away. She would do well enough there. What do you say to that proposal?"

"I am deeply indebted to you for your trouble, sir, but it would be very hard to part with Gracie. It would break my heart to lose her now that we are left alone," said the widow, her eyes filling with tears, and Gracie's hand tightly clasped in her own.

"Tut, tut," said Mr. Righton, "you would soon get over that. In your position you should expect to put up with such things. The child would be well taken care of, and that is all you ought to think of. I call it very ungrateful of you to raise difficulties."

"You do not understand a mother's love, sir, or you would know what it is to be separated from a child."

"No, madam, I never had a child, but I should think they gave a great deal of trouble and you should be thankful to be relieved of it. If you are so fond of the child, you ought to be glad to have her provided for."

"I cannot consent now, sir," Alice said. "I am sure you mean kindly, and you have taken a great deal of trouble for a stranger. Will you give me a few days to think of it?"

"Yes, yes, I do not mind. I thought you would have been glad to accept it right off. However, I will come again next week, and hear what you have to say." With that Mr. Righton took his leave, and mother and daughter were left alone.

The next few days were a time of struggle. Gracie pleaded pitifully that they might not be separated, that they might live on bread and water rather than part. But Alice could not think how even those necessaries could be provided. Again she carried her perplexity to God, and besought His direction. Gradually the conviction settled upon her that the sacrifice must be made, and she tried to prepare her disconsolate child for the inevitable. On Monday she knew Mr. Righton would be there for her decision. Saturday was come, and to-morrow would be the last Sunday the two bereaved ones would spend together. Alice took the child in her arms that evening and told her that there was no alternative; she must accept Mr. Righton's proposal. Gracie burst into a flood of tears and clung to her mother with passionate grip as though she would rather die than be parted. Silently the mother wept too, and then in soothing, earnest tones sought to lead her child to trust in God.

They were talking softly in the twilight when a loud ring at the bell startled both of them. Alice rose and went to the door, expecting to see Mr. Righton. But it was not he. Instead of the dry, harsh voice and the stiff greeting, she was clasped in a pair of strong arms and her face was covered with kisses. "Alice, my dear sister," said a voice she well knew, "I am so glad to see you. Where is my little Gracie?" There she was close beside her mother, her little heart full of hope that now Uncle Harry was come she would not have to leave her mother. Uncle Harry was conducted into the inner room, just now the scene of such bitter sorrow, and was there told all the sad story.

"No, Alice," he said, "you shall not lose your child. I will see to that. I am not so rich as Mr. Righton, but I am earning enough for us all, and I have neither wife nor child. We will see if we cannot keep things together."

The widow heard the words with a full heart. It was better than she had dared hope. But it was true, for Harry was there before her with Gracie on his knee, promising to be a father to her.

Mr. Righton had a surprise in store for him when he came on Monday, fully expecting to find the widow had thought better of it. Harry had waited to receive him before going to the city to arrange for bringing his belongings to his new quarters. Mr. Righton, to his surprise, received his rent and heard the news that Harry intended to make the future of the widow and her child his care. He bluntly said that he should have thought a young business man would have had more sense than to support another man's family, but it was no concern of his. Having settled with Mr. Righton, each took his separate way; but when Harry turned at the end of the lane and saw his sister with little Gracie beside her waving her handkerchief, their faces beaming with the gladness that filled their hearts, he thought he had not done so unwise a thing after all, in spite of Mr. Righton's opinion. Years afterward, when he had learned the blessings of a Christian home, and had been led by his sister to trust in the Saviour, he knew that in succoring the widow and the fatherless he had received a double blessing in his own soul.

PETER BLAKE'S VOYAGE.

A SERIAL STORY BY HESBA STRETTON.

(Concluded from page 415.)

Found at Last.

PETER BLAKE left Normandy with a heart fuller of anxiety than when he started from England. He had reckoned confidently upon obtaining some clew to his wife and children from his mother; but she had passed away without once naming them. The Sister who had charge of the hopsital told him that she had never spoken of them. From the first moment of her paralytic seizure, when she was admitted into this last, mournful asylum, she had been speechless until the hour of her death, which he had been in time to witness.

The only sign of consciousness she had given was the pain and restlessness she manifested if the old cradle was ever out of her sight; though what was passing in her clouded mind none of them could guess. "She was a true mother!" said Sister Marie, with a sigh. Peter begged of her to take good care of the old cradle, in which his own little children had been rocked, until he could send for it, if ever he had a home of his own again.

But at present his home was lost in a terrible darkness. Somewhere, in some poor shelter, Bessie must be dwelling, with Nanette and the baby; though Victor and his mother were dead. But how to find them? He was one of those men whose beloved ones are never really out of their thoughts, though they may be diligent and skilful about their work. Even at the busiest moment some fond recollection of his children would flash across him, and bring a smile to his face. Bessie's singing would seem to ring in his ears when the deck was all quietness and he was keeping the watch through the dark hours of the night. Then he would conjure up in fancy, the peaceful, safe, and happy home he possessed, where his treasures were, lying securely guarded for him in the heart of England. But now, after being snatched from the fearful death which had swallowed up his shipmates, he had come back to find his home broken up, as if it too had been some frail and rotten bark that could not fail to be wrecked on the stormy sea of London.

His heart was very sore and sad. There was a wrong somewhere; yet on whose head should the blame fall? That God did not ordain this misery he felt quite sure. No; the fault lay in man's own selfishness, not in God's rule. It was the old plea urged by Cain. "Am I my brother's keeper?" repeated silently or loudly by almost every human being. It was the same black warp running all through the web of social life, from the unscrupulous shipowner, Penrose, who flung away lives without a qualm, down to Fleck, whose selfish cunning had left Bessie to sink under her troubles. "All ye are brethren," Christ had said. A strange brotherhood truly had been wrought out in this Christian country; though nearly nineteen hundred years had passed since the Master had spoken these words.

It was evening when he reached the Waterloo Station; and he took a train at once to London Bridge. Almost instinctively he turned his face toward Wapping; for there was no other spot in London where he had ever had a home. It was a chilly spring night, with a white mist driving in from the Essex marshes on the night wind. He was glad to put on his thick coat of pilot-cloth, and pace along briskly past the Tower, and the wharves, and cross the bridge leading to the quiet streets of Wapping. He was going to find Fleck, who was the person that had last seen Bessie and the children. Peter had found it hard work to conquer his resentment at Fleck's cruel imposture, which had turned aside Arthur Penrose from the search he would have instituted at once for Victor's friends. But for Fleck his mother might still have been alive; and his wife and children would not have been lost. Yet he must seek him out once more, and learn from him all that could be learned about them.

Fleck's house he knew very well. It lay at the end of a somewhat squalid and blind court, at the back of the high wall which surrounds the London Docks. He had seldom been there before; for there had been no more companionship between the two seamen than that which arose from both following the same calling, and from having taken one or two voyages on board the same vessel. Fleck had no thought above the gratification of his low desires; while Peter always acted under a strong sense of honor, and of duty, both to his country and to God. To serve God, and be true to England wherever he went or however he might be placed, was his ambition. It was no wonder that he found little in common with his low-minded, cunning and selfish shipmate.

There was a light in the lower room of the house where Fleck rented the upper floor. When Peter knocked the door was opened, though only by a handbreadth, and a woman peered out cautiously into the mist, holding the door with both hand and foot, lest an entrance should be forced against her will. She was too old a woman to be Fleck's wife.

"Is Fleck at home?" he asked.

"This ain't Fleck's house," she answered, sharply. "I only let him my two first floors; but he paid his rent up and flitted, bag and baggage, nigh upon a week ago. I've been bothered enough with him, and folks coming after him."

"Gone!" exclaimed Peter.

"Ay, gone, my good young man," she continued, a little more gently, "I did hear him say, I don't deny it, that there was one law for the rich and another law for the poor, and he'd better make hisself scarce. Something about cheating or being cheated. Anyhow he's took hisself off, and his wife and children; and I say a good riddance of bad rubbish."

"And do you know nothing more about him?" he asked.

"Not a ha'porth more than you do," she answered; "I left off asking him questions that I might have no more of his lies. I hope no more folks will come bothering after him. It's not half an hour ago a woman came, with two children, asking for Fleck."

"What sort of looking woman?" inquired Peter, eagerly.

"Oh! a young woman, with a big baby in her arms," she replied, "and a little girl of five, or thereabouts. She seemed very low and cast down, poor thing! and I almost wish I'd asked her to step in and rest a bit; but there! decent folks can't be too careful of theirselves in London."

"Only half an hour ago!" said Peter.

"Not longer," she added; "I almost thought it might be her again; and I'd have asked her in and given the child a slice of bread. She said she was hungry, poor little lass! Only one is so often taken in by beggars like that."

But Peter Blake scarcely heard the last words. Only half an hour ago, and Bessie and his children, for he could not believe it was any one else, had been in this very court, and standing at this very door! Yet now, where were they? It seemed impossible that they could have trodden this very causeway, and left no footmarks whereby he could trace them. If they had been shipwrecked on some wild coast, he might have tracked them along the sandy shore, or made them hear his voice calling to them among the rocky cliffs. But here, in the streets, they might be no more than a few paces from him, yet he might pass on, and never see them!

He paused for a minute or two at the outlet of the court, considering. Before him rose the dockyard wall. To the right, where the short street ended, there was a number of turnings, any one of which Bessie might have taken. Round the corner to the left lay the old churchyard, and not far beyond that the bridge over which he had just crossed from the city. Which way had Bessie taken? Where were her weary feet wandering now? And Nanny's little feet, which should have no rough paths to tread if he could help it. Cast down, and hungry, and homeless, were they? Yet, thank God! they were neither dead, nor in a workhouse. One half of the burden that had weighed upon him was taken away.

He did not waste much time in choosing his path. He turned quickly in the direction of the bridge to ask the watchman there if any woman with two children had passed that way. The gray headstones in the old churchyard glimmered before him, for the moon was shining behind the thin, white mist; and dim shapes were visible in the pale light, though in the shadows all was dark and hidden. At that hour there was no one in the quiet spot except himself, and his rapid footstep sounded noisily in the stillness. But he paid no heed to the white moonlight on the graves, or the solemn silence, until he heard the pattering of little feet running after him, and felt a child's hand catch at his pilot-coat.

"Mother says I may ask you to give me a penny; I am so hungry," said a child's plaintive voice.

He stopped instantly, stunned and bewildered. Surely it could not be his own little child begging from a stranger in the streets! Was it possible that Bessie was really hiding somewhere in the shadows, waiting for a penny from a chance passer-by? His bright, merry, good little wife, with her high spirit, brought so low! There was intense bitterness to him in the thought. He had always been so proud of her, so careful for her. Was he in this way shown what her fate must have been if he had actually been lost in the Dolphin? Yet he had found them; they were close beside him. Little Nan's hand was pulling at his coat, as it had done many a time before when he reached home. They should suffer no longer, for he was as strong as ever to win all they needed by his labor, and to shelter and protect them from trouble by his love.

"Father is lost at sea," said little Nan, beginning to cry, "and Uncle Victor too. We've got no house now, and we're cold and hungry."

Still he could not speak a word; but he stooped down and lifted his little girl in his strong arms. Then he leaned against the railings of the churchyard, half afraid that he might stagger and fall. He had never felt so shaken and unstrung before. What must have become of them if he had been lost at sea? Little Nan, frightened, yet quiet, pushed back his cap with her cold hands, and looked closely into his face.

"Why! it's father!" she cried, "come home again! Oh! let me run and tell mother."

"Where is she?" he asked, almost in a whisper.

"Come, come," she said, struggling to get down upon her feet, and pulling him eagerly by the hand as soon as she was on the ground. He had but to walk a few steps into the concealing mist, and there sat his wife, crouching in a doorway, with her baby on her lap, and her gown drawn over it to keep it warm. He could only command his voice to call her name, "Bessie!"

How they met one another they could never tell exactly. Bessie never spoke of it in after days without breaking down with tears. There was too deep a blending of sorrow and gladness; for there were two gone, who could never return to the old familiar life, though there would be a home again. Bessie could hardly believe that her husband's presence was not a dream, until she found herself sitting by his side in a warm and lighted room of a quiet lodging-house close by.

"Oh! I've been very ill," she said sobbing, when he asked her how she had fallen to such a strait as this, "and I could not write to your poor mother, and I never heard a word of her. My illness ate up all I had, and I pawned our clothes; and still I could not find any work to do. It's been a hard winter for poor folks. But when I came to the end of all, I bethought me of what Fleck said about young Mr. Penrose. I was going to ask him to do something for me and the children; though it was hard to come down to that. Only I found out I couldn't starve in the streets, with two little children starving too. And then Fleck was gone away, and I was wishing we were all dead and buried, and little Nan ran after a stranger to beg, and it was you!"

It is not many years since these things happened. Arthur Penrose and Peter Blake are both young men still, and firm friends. Both are doing their utmost to set things right wherever they find them wrong. What Peter Blake can do he does to raise the character of his fellow-seamen, and make them efficient, sober, and honest mariners. Never again has he signed ships' articles without making sure that the vessel is seaworthy to which he trusts his own life, and the welfare of his family. No ship of Arthur Penrose has set sail for any voyage, long or short, without being as safe and sound as the best iron and timber can make her. He is never likely to be a rich shipowner; but he will be a true and honorable man, if not a happy one. His father's sin darkens life for him. Two of the vessels which were afloat when he died have never been heard of again; and when or how they were lost no man returned to tell.

Fleck has been seen only once by Peter, selling seamen's tracts in some back street, but he made off as soon as he caught sight of his old shipmate, and Peter had barely time enough to see that he looked wretched and degraded.

Little Nan still believes that the sea is in the hollow of God's hand.

THE END.

IN THE PLAINS OF JERICHO.

S. S. Lesson for July 15, Joshua 5 : 10, 6 : 5. Golden Text, Heb. 11 : 30. By Mrs. Baxter.

A Memorable Feast—The Ceasing of the Manna—The Believer's Food—The Supernatural Force—The Heathen Awed and Perplexed—The Celestial Captain—Joshua's Submission—The Siege of Jericho—Rules of Faith Life—A Strange Warfare—The Shout of Victory before Conflict—Promise the Evidence—Their Duty.

BEFORE the children of Israel could take possession of the land of promise, every individual man among them must be brought into covenant with God by circumcision, and the whole multitude must keep the feast of the passover. What a passover must that have been, the first in the promised land, just within sight of the river, which a few days before had obeyed the command of God, and opened a way for them to pass over! What recollections must have stirred within the hearts of Joshua and Caleb, who would remember the passover night in Egypt, and who had tasted so experimentally the sheltering power of the blood of the Lamb! Up to this time the people had neither tasted the milk nor the honey, nor yet any of the fruit of the land of Canaan; still the manna fell around them as their food, but once the passover kept in Canaan, they began to eat of its provisions; "they did eat of the old corn of the land on the morrow after the passover, unleavened cakes and parched corn in the selfsame day. And

THE MANNA CEASED ON THE MORROW."

Wilderness provision was no longer needed now. When any of us has passed from the wilderness experience, the constant treading over and over again the same ground, the same experiences of failure, the same deliverances, succeeded by renewed failures—and when we have passed over the Jordan, and stand on the promises of the living God, instead of on our own poor doings—then our experience undergoes a distinct and most blessed change; every step we take becomes possession, new inheritance of God, and the way which He leads us becomes food for us, difficulties strengthen, nourish, exercise, the land itself bears fruit and we do not need Christ as manna, when we find Him as "the old corn of the land;" our experience of Christ is no longer provisional, He dwells within us.

God had been at work upon the inhabitants of the land of Canaan, the news had reached them how the waters of Jordan had dried up before the children of Israel, how they were marching forward steadily and surely toward them, and "their heart melted, neither was there spirit in them any more, because of the children of Israel." Military tactics they could cope with, numbers in the field, strategy, or any other kind of resistance which was common to man, but a people who could march through the sea, who were provisioned by an unseen commissariat, before whom rivers dried up, these were irresistible, and the poor heathen, cultured people as they were for that age, knew not how to meet them. Oh, if we knew the real power over others which there is in the presence of God with us, how much less should we attempt to convince them by human reasoning, how much more real would be our cry, "Send Thine hand from above" (Ps. 144 : 7).

When Joshua was by Jericho (apparently alone), "he lifted up his eyes and looked, and behold there stood a man over against him with His sword drawn in His hand; and Joshua went unto Him, and said unto Him, Art thou for us, or for our adversaries? And He said, Nay; but as am I now come." Oh, how often, in face of trial, the thought has arisen, "Is God really on my side?" A converted wife may say, whose husband is acting madly, drinking, gambling or speculating away the little means he has, and leaving her and the children no prospect but debt, ruin and starvation, "How can God be on my side when He does not change my husband's heart, or hear my prayer for him? He seems not to help me in my distress." "Nay; but as Captain of the host of the Lord am I now come." Dear distressed sister, do not look for help from the Lord, as though you were in command; give the command over to Him, and with it the care and the responsibility. Put that husband and those circumstances definitely into the hands of God, and out of your own hands, so that every thought about them which may arise may be referred to Him, as concerning Him, and not you, and thus you will find the walls of Jericho will fall, and impossibilities be done. A brother, earnestly working for the Lord, just in a place where Christians have been more than usually inconsistent, harsh, unjust, unloving, dishonest, and self-indulgent; one who desires to raise the tone of piety, but who is met on all sides by the most obstinate opposition, may be tempted to cry, "'Hath God forgotten to be gracious?' 'Is He really on my side?'" "Nay; but as Captain," is His reply; "put Me in command, hand over first yourself, then your difficulties to Me, and I will deal with them."

Joshua recognized his superior in command, and took his right place, he "fell on his face to the earth," and said unto Him, "What saith my Lord unto His servant?" And the Captain of the Lord's host said unto Joshua, "Loose thy shoe from off thy foot; for the place whereon thou standest is holy." Oh, how blessed it is when, in any circumstances we are conscious that God is speaking to us, then that which we might have thought trying, disagreeable, unfortunate becomes holy ground!

THE LORD IN COMMAND,

what would follow? The city of Jericho lay straight in the way indicated by the ark of the Lord. Cities walled up to heaven were in the land of Canaan, but the children of Israel were not to go up and attack them promiscuously, the pillar of clouds of fire went on before. The fear of the children of Israel had so laid hold upon the inhabitants of Jericho that "the city was straitly shut up," "none went out, and none came in," the place was in a state of siege; Joshua was occupied in taking orders from his Captain who said to him, "See, I have given into thine hand Jericho, and the king thereof, and the mighty men of valor." Now was the time for the exercise of Joshua's faith; the mighty walls of the city were standing, the king yet lived, and the mighty men of valor were around him, yet by faith Joshua was to act as though the city were already in his possession, because he had the Word of God for it.

To those who are habitually leading a life of faith, nothing seems more simple and easy; but to reasoning minds which have not learned to be little children, the way of faith is hard. "What things soever ye desire when ye pray, believe that ye receive [or have received] them, and ye shall have them" (Mark 11 : 24); this seems nonsense to a reasoning mind. "What, believe I receive a thing before I actually have it? Ridiculous!" Yet nothing is so natural and so real as this to one who counts upon the Word of God.

God's command was, "Ye shall compass the city, all ye men of war, and go round about the city once. Thus shalt thou do six days. And seven priests shall bear before the ark seven trumpets of rams' horns; and the seventh day ye shall compass the city seven times, and the priests shall blow with the trumpets."

and yet commanded by God! Had Joshua not been a man of faith, he would have thought how ridiculous and senseless it must have appeared to the inhabitants who looked over the walls, to see them just walking round in silence, only blowing the trumpets, and this day after day.

Joshua had to give up all hope of being recognized by the heathen as a talented general; no glory must accrue to him. To some minds this is exceedingly difficult, they find themselves continually justifying their position to those who have no more conception of the way of faith than a man born blind has of form or color. The promise of God was that on the seventh day, when the people were to compass the city seven times, and to shout with a loud shout, the walls of the city should fall down flat. The shout of victory among those who know not the Lord, follows the hour of conquest, but in the way of faith it precedes. It is when we can praise God for that which He has promised us, that the victory is sure. Here is the difference between expecting and accepting. There are very many who come to the Lord for blessing, whether pardon, cleansing, power, healing or whatever else, and having presented their request, continue waiting and expecting that some time or other God will probably, perhaps surely, answer their prayer; but the answer is far off in the future. Others there are who know something of the way of faith, and they that they receive, and therefore take the answer; this is accepting, not expecting. The shout of the children of Israel would be a token of accepting, not expecting, the fall of Jericho.

There was no dissentient voice among the people: fresh from the passage of Jordan, from their renewed covenant, from the commemoration of the passover, their faith and zeal had received an impetus which carried them above worldly and carnal considerations, and strange as were the directions given them, they obeyed. The order of march was, first the armed men of all the tribes, next the seven priests blowing with the trumpets, then the ark of the covenant of the Lord, and finally the rereward, or "gathering host," and the only sound to be heard was the tramp of feet to the sound of the trumpets. There seems to have been no arrow shot from the city walls, nor yet toward them from the host of Israel.

Some among the people might have thought, "What a waste of time this is to go on walking round the walls, and gaining no ground whatever!" And is not this the thought of many who do not see at once the answer to their prayers, or enter at once into the experience of God's promises? Yet this trial of faith and patience is God's own provision. "Cast not away, therefore, your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward. For ye have need of patience, that after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise" (Heb. 10 : 35, 36). It was early in the morning of each day that the people compassed the city, but on the seventh day they rose about the dawning of the day and compassed the city seven times. "And it came to pass at the seventh time, when the priests blew with the trumpets, Joshua said unto the people, Shout; for the Lord hath given you the city."

THEY HAD NO EVIDENCE of it, but the bare Word of God through Joshua, but it was enough; they believed, and when they heard the sound of the trumpet they shouted with a great shout, and "the wall fell down flat, so that the people went up into the city every man straight before him."

All escape for the inhabitants was cut off; from all sides of the city in came the men of Israel, closing in the men of Jericho, and not one man or woman, young or old, or sheep, or ass escaped, with the single exception of Rahab, who had hid the spies, and her family. It was a victory gained by God, neither by Joshua nor the people; the only part they had was to obey, to trust and to praise God. In measure as the Lord makes us little children, we find that this is our chief work, to obey, without any regard as to how it may appear, whether it is to our honor, whether it reflects credit on us or not; to obey, to trust and to praise God; so doing we become invincible, irresistible, because the Captain of the Lord's host has in hand all which concerns us; and neither the waves of Jordan, nor the walls of Jericho can hinder those who go on at the bidding of God.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

An Outbreak of Cholera in Egypt was Reported on June 27th. It made its appearance first at Damietta. The physicians refused to furnish statements of the number of deaths from the disease, but the cablegram states that of forty-two deaths which occurred in the city on June 26th, twenty-eight were from cholera, and by Friday the number had risen to over a hundred a day. The epidemic was spreading at last accounts in the direction of Alexandria. Twenty-two cases occurred at Mansurah, and two at Port Said. All the Europeans who were able to leave Alexandria were hurrying away, the fêtes in honor of the anniversary of the Khédive's accession to the throne were stopped, and measures promptly taken to improve the sanitary condition of the city. Serious alarm is felt in Europe lest the crowds of refugees from Alexandria may take the seeds of the plague with them, and Spain and France have already established a strict quarantine. If the epidemic had broken out last year the British troops would have had to contend against an enemy far more formidable than Arabi. As it is, there is reason to fear here will be a very serious loss of life in the British forces still in the country.

The Tension in the Relations of France and China continues. The Chinese Legation in London has received a telegram from Shanghai, stating that M. Tricou, the French Ambassador at Shanghai, behaved with great rudeness toward Li Hung Chang, who refused to meet the French Ambassador again. There has been no interview between them in the last ten days. Li Hung Chang is returning to Tientsin, because he sees no chance of reaching an understanding with M. Tricou. La France, of Paris, comments upon the report that Russia has consented to offer its good offices in the difficulties between China and France, and says the former had intended to ask the mediation of America, but the anti-Chinese measures adopted by the United States Congress have caused a certain coolness between the two nations.

The Strength and Resources of China in war are probably better understood by General Gordon than any other European. He is the English officer known as "Chinese Gordon," who went to China with the consent of Queen Victoria to assist the Chinese Emperor in suppressing the rebellion. He commanded Chinese troops, and ascertained what they could do by practical experience. Recently a correspondent of the New York Herald asked his opinion of the prospects of China in the event of a conflict with France. In the course of his reply, General Gordon said: "The Chinese are sufficiently powerful to give France a good deal of trouble, for it is not with France as with Russia, who could approach Pekin by land. The approach by sea would need a very much larger force than in 1860. If the Chinese were educated they would be able to resist all the world. China has not signed the declaration of Paris in re privateers, and she will make full use of her rights, I have no doubt."

English Vacillation in Egypt is said to be producing disastrous effects on the country. A correspondent in Cairo, of the New York Herald, describing the situation, says: "Plots and conspiracies, discontent and misery are more general at present than at any time within the memory of the oldest inhabitant. Owing to the uncertain and vacillating action of England, a feeling of general insecurity exists among all classes of Europeans. Those who have money lock it up. Enterprise is at a standstill, and the small traders, mechanics and the parasitical population who live on their richer brethren, have no means of making a livelihood, and in many cases are reduced to the utmost destitution. As long as any uncertainty exists as to the ultimate action of England in Egypt, so long will the present unhappy state of things exist; but should England put down her foot, as she eventually must, and state frankly her intentions, trade would revive, money would flow into the country, and the condition of every inhabitant would be improved. At the present moment there are 3000 officers of the Arabi army without employment and there are 1000 other dismissed employés. These men, backed by malcontent Europeans, are doing their utmost to alarm the Khedive and arouse hostility to the English."

The Pauper Emigrants from Ireland to America, whose passage the British Government is paying, were made the subject of an inquiry in the House of Commons on June 28th, addressed by the practical and philanthropic member for Newcastle, Mr. Cowen, to Mr. Trevelyan, Chief Secretary for Ireland. Mr. Trevelyan said the reports about the landing of paupers in America were greatly exaggerated. He stated that the steamer Anchoria took no inmates of any workhouse, and that all emigrants sent by the commissioners had been supplied with funds. No paupers had been sent out by the Boards of Guardians. He also stated that no definite offer for sending emigrants to Canada had been received from the Dominion Government. Mr. Trevelyan is a gentleman of honor, and doubtless states what he believes to be strictly true, but it is evident that his subordinates have deceived him. Even the emigrants whom the government "supplied with funds" were little removed on their arrival here from absolute paupers. The small sum they have with them would not support them many days.

The Marriage-Law Reform in Great Britain has been stopped in the House of Lords. Before any measure becomes a law it has to be read three times in each House of Parliament and receive the royal assent. As a rule, a bill that passes the second reading in either House may be altered in details, but usually passes the third reading in that House. In the case of the bill legalizing the marriage of widowers with the sisters of their deceased wives, there has been a departure from the rule. As already mentioned it passed its first and second reading in the Lords, but on coming up on June 28th for the third reading it was rejected by a majority of five votes. Twenty-five of the peers who voted for the second reading were absent when the third reading was put to the vote.

Two Opinions on the Irish Land Laws were published last week. Earl Spencer, the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, speaking at Limerick, said he saw signs of a better future for Ireland. He advocated technical training, leading to an improved style of farming, before the people entered upon the task of reclaiming waste lands. He maintained that the Land act worked well, and asked all classes to co-operate for the material advancement of Ireland. Mr. Parnell, in a speech at Monaghan on June 26th, said his party intended to endeavor to amend the Land act, so as to make the reduced rents date from the time of application therefor to the Court, to provide that tenants shall be allowed for improvements made within thirty or forty years, and so that leaseholders shall be admitted to the benefits of the act. He mentioned other defects in the law, the amendment of which he earnestly advocated.

The Trial of the Four Jews in Hungary for the murder of a Christian girl affords indications as it proceeds that the charge is simply a malignant attempt to fasten a false accusation on the entire Jewish population of Hungary. All the Christian lawyers at the trial have adopted a resolution attacking the conduct of the public prosecutor, because he scarcely conceals his belief that the case was fabricated by persons opposed to the Jews. It has been elicited that the Magistrate Peczely, who aided in the preparation of the case for prosecution, was once sentenced to twenty-five years' imprisonment for a brutal murder. Peczely admitted that he had signed the depositions of several of the witnesses in the present trial, though he was absent when they were examined. Several witnesses deposed that the boy Moritz Scharf, who said he saw Esther Salomossy murdered in the synagogue, was beaten in the house of the Police Commissary. This admission disproves the statement that the boy made the confession voluntarily.

A Terrible Struggle for Life in a Railway carriage occurred in France last week. There the carriages are still built in the antiquated compartment fashion, the doors being at the sides of the car, which prevents the brakemen and conductors passing through the train when in motion. An English clergyman was alone in one of the compartments when the train was at Amiens. There a stranger entered, and the clergyman soon afterward fell asleep. He was awakened by a severe blow on the head with a chisel. Before he had time to grapple with his assailant he received five other wounds, from which the blood flowed copiously. The assassin opened the door and tried to push the clergyman out while the train was running at full speed. A thrilling struggle for life ensued, resulting in the clergyman being violently thrown from the carriage. In his fall he managed to grasp the footboard, and succeeded, although streaming with blood and nearly fainting, in attracting the attention of the neighboring compartment, where there were several English gentlemen. The would-be assassin, fearing detection, jumped from the train and endeavored to escape. He was captured in a short time, and then shot himself with a revolver, inflicting a severe wound. It is thought that both the men will die from their wounds.

Suicides at Monte Carlo, the European Gambling-hell, are described by Mr. F. H. Crozier, of Lymington, England, who writes: "While on my way to Egypt, I passed a few days at Cannes and Mentone. The morning after our arrival a gentleman came to the hotel to break the sad intelligence of the suicide, in his hotel close by, of a young gentleman well known to many there, on his return from Monte Carlo the previous evening, having lost his all at the gambling-table. During the week I was at Mentone a second similar death occurred at another hotel, and at Cairo I met an American gentleman, who related to me an occurrence during his visit to Monaco, from Nice, by medical advice, about the same date. After, in company with his wife, attending the music-hall, he went into an adjoining room. On coming out he passed a gentleman who, within a few feet of him, shot himself. A gendarme almost immediately appeared, others were soon on the spot, and having covered the deceased man with one of their cloaks, they brought a stretcher and carried him away. There seems a fatal fascination about the place that neither old nor young can resist."

The Power of a Tract when the Divine Blessing accompanies it is illustrated by the following incident: "A young man who had lost his situation from drink, and had gone far away from the right path, one day on his return home found that a tract had been put under the door. At first he laid it aside, declaring he would not read it; he felt so sleepless and uneasy, however, that to amuse himself he thought he would look at it. The words he read made him so unhappy that he went the next day (Sunday) to a mission-room with one who had acted the part of a real Christian friend many times. God sent him such a message that he felt constrained to stop and speak to the evangelist, and there and then he yielded himself to Christ Jesus. The next day he signed the pledge against drink, which had been such a curse to him, and he is now living a happy and Christian life.

IN our schools and colleges we are very properly instructed in the history of our own and foreign countries. He would be thought very ill instructed who ending his school education knew nothing more of Alexander and Cæsar and Washington and Napoleon than that they were great generals. Unhappily we are far less careful as to the history of that kingdom to which every Christian belongs. Yet its history is no less interesting than that of material kingdoms and its marvellous growth and ultimate destiny might naturally excite our attention. The Prince of Peace has been served by illustrious men who have gone forth to battle against the common enemy of mankind, and have willingly given their lives that they might bring under the beneficent rule of their King one more province. Adoniram Judson, John Williams, Robert Moffat, were not pre-eminently Americans or Englishmen; they were generals of our Kingdom—servants of our King, and their triumphs are written in the Chronicles of our nation. It is right therefore that the Christian should study their lives in all their grand details that he may know the labors and achievements of his illustrious fellow-citizens. Among these holding a high and honorable place is the devoted Christian missionary whose portrait appears on our first page this week.

Richard Knill was born at Braunton, near Ilfracombe, England, on April, 14th, 1787. The only incident of his childhood which has come down to us was one which nearly cost him his life. On his way to school the boy had to pass a stream spanned by a bridge of two flat stones. On attempting one day to ascertain how far he could push a stick under this structure, he overbalanced himself and fell in. The splash reached the ear of a poor widow, named Molly Robins, who was carding wool by her cottage door. On looking up she spied a child's hat on the surface of the stream, and, darting to the spot, drew the little owner by his flaxen locks from under the bridge. Molly Robins was never forgotten by Mr. Knill. "She could not read," he would say characteristically, "but she saved my life; feeble powers, if well employed, will do wonders" (see frontispiece picture).

A THOUGHTLESS AND WICKED LIFE.

When Richard was thirteen years old he was apprenticed to business, and four years afterward entered the wide world "to make his fortune." He spent some little time at Ilfracombe, and Barnstaple, and Bristol, but he always looked back to this period with a bitter pang. In the midst of wicked men he forgot the prayers of his pious mother, and cultivated a fondness for singing foolish songs, and breaking the Sabbath, thus stifling the voice of conscience and fighting against God. His love of music was a great snare to him. The devil often took advantage of it to lead him into dangerous company.

CONVERSION.

A Mrs. Isaac, of Bideford, wanted a young man to conduct her business and instruct her only son. Knill was recommended to her, and he agreed to go. This was in March, 1808; and almost immediately he made the acquaintance of a Mr. Thomas Spencer, who lived next door to him. Mr. Spencer, while walking in his garden, repeatedly heard his neighbor's fine voice in song, and conceived that it would be of service both to the congregation and to himself if he could induce him to attend the ministry of the Rev. Samuel Rooker. In this he happily succeeded. The songs of the world were exchanged for those of Zion, and every week the preaching of Mr. Rooker served to bring some fresh meaning to his strains. In June, 1810, Mr. Knill and his friend Spencer were admitted into the fellowship of the Church, and commenced a career of energetic Christian effort, which continued until they were called into the Divine Master's presence.

LOVE FOR THE HEATHEN ENKINDLED.

On September 20th, 1811, Mr. Rooker preached a sermon on Heathenism, and as he drew a thrilling picture of the pilgrims of Juggernaut, and recounted revolting facts, Knill was noticed with large moistened eyes fixed on the minister, and his manly, open countenance beaming with mingled wonder and compassion. "It was," he admitted years afterward, "like a spark on tinder. It set me on fire to go to the heathen. I did not know of missionary societies, but my thoughts were set to work, and I borrowed books and informed my mind on the subject. I feared to mention my impressions to my pastor, but they smouldered until the Lord's time came."

A SUNDAY EXCURSION.

An incident occurred at this period of his Christian profession, which it is difficult to understand, but which affords a warning all the more striking to young persons of a social temperament. On his way to conduct his class in the Sabbath-school one morning, he was met by three of his former companions, who said they were bound on an excursion up the river. Partly by sarcasm and partly by entreaty, they induced him to join their party. The boat glided up the stream, and had scarcely shut out the town behind the richly-wooded banks, when the church bell rang out. Its sound vibrated sweetly on the undulating wave, and produced a tranquillizing effect on three of the party, but to the fourth it was perfect agony. He listened intently. That well-known sound had been to him, for months past, the signal for commencing the Sunday-school, and now the whole of the Sunday-school proceedings spread out before the eye of his mind (see frontispiece picture).

A SOLEMN VOW.

The whole day was spent by him in perfect misery. If he could have jumped ashore, he would have done so; yet one thing he did, and it was worth doing. He solemnly resolved never to break the Sabbath again, and never more to associate with those who feared not God, but to come out from among them and be separate; and God enabled him to perform his vow.

A SWEARING GRENADIER.

Not long after this event, he engaged in various efforts to bring men to Christ, and among them was that of tract distribution. One day, when a regiment of militia was about to be disbanded at Barnstaple, he took a thousand tracts to give away to the men. Among the last company that he visited were the grenadiers, who were all pleased, until he came to one whom he described as "a merry-andrew kind of fellow." "He took the tract and held it up, swore at it, and asked, 'Are you going to convert me?' I said, 'Don't swear at the tract; you cannot hurt the tract, but swearing will injure your soul.' 'Who are you?' he exclaimed. 'Form a circle round him,' said he to his comrades, 'and I will swear at him.' They did so; he swore fearfully, and I wept. The tears moved the feelings of the other men, and they said, 'Let him go; he means to do us good.' So I distributed my thousand tracts, and left them in the care of Him who said, 'My Word shall not return unto Me void.'"

Many years afterward, while Mr. Knill was on a visit from India to his native country, he stayed a short time at Ilfracombe. There he was invited to preach in the open air, a few miles distant. During the time that he was preaching, he saw a tall, gray-headed man in the crowd, weeping, and a young man who looked like his son, weeping also. At the conclusion of the service, they both approached Mr. Knill, and the elder said, "Do you recollect giving tracts to the local militia at Barnstaple some years ago?" "Yes," was the reply; "I do." "Do you recollect anything particular that happened at the time?" "Yes," said the missionary; "I recollect that one of the grenadiers swore at me till he made me weep." "Stop," said the man; "I am that grenadier. I never forgave myself for that wicked act. But I hope it has led me to repentance, and that God has forgiven me. And now, let me ask, will you forgive me?" The man had been for some time a true Christian.

RESOLVES TO BECOME A MISSIONARY.

Mr. Knill having devoted himself to the work of the Christian ministry, in the autumn of 1812, he became a classical and theological student at the Western Academy, at Axminster, in Devonshire. In April, 1814, he attended a missionary meeting at Bridport, where he heard a sermon preached by the Rev. Dr. Waugh, of London. It was a missionary sermon, and the preacher having spoken of the kind of men which were needed to blow the Gospel trumpet among the perishing heathen, he looked round, and in most melting tones inquired, "Is there in this congregation one young disciple of the Lord who has love enough in his heart to say to his Master, 'Lord, here am I; send me'?" Mr. Knill felt the force of the appeal, and in his soul, he said, "Lord, I will go."

SETS SAIL FOR MADRAS, INDIA.

In order to qualify himself for the work of preaching the Gospel in the foreign missionfield, he commenced a course of study under the fatherly supervision of the Rev. Dr. Bogue, who was then resident at Gosport. Here he remained until 1816, when, on April 20th, he set sail in The Earl of Moira, from Deal, with a large force of missionaries for the East. His destination was Madras, and his voyage thither was auspicious.

Mr. Loveless, whom Mr. Knill joined, was the first English missionary to Madras, and had at that period resided there for eight years. He had formed a church, of persons who had been converted through his ministry, and had been of great service in the establishment of schools and in the distribution of Christian books throughout the Presidency. His wise and benevolent measures had produced a considerable impression on the public mind; so that Mr. Knill frequently observed, "He labored, and I entered into his labors."

FIRST SERMON IN INDIA.

The very next day after his arrival, Mr. Knill preached his first sermon in India, from the words, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world;" and it was blessed to the conversion of a young widow, who afterward became the wife of the eminent Dr. Medhurst, the Chinese missionary. Once a week he preached to a company of soldiers, over whom he gained considerable influence. "What do you missionaries mean?" an officer asked, one day; "do you think that poor black fellow will be damned?" "I hope not," was the answer; "but if he is, I think his punishment will be very light compared with yours, if you neglect God." The interrogator, convinced and solemnized, lifted up his hands, and said, "I believe it; I have long thought so," and then went to his quarters and made his peace with God through faith in Jesus Christ.

AN INFIDEL BROUGHT TO CHRIST.

A young civilian, while engaged in writing a book on infidel principles, probably visited by some relentings, went one Sunday to the mission chapel. "The text," says Mr. Knill, "was 'Behold, I stand at the door and knock.' I saw the stranger in tears, and said to one of our friends, 'Do you know where he lives? I must write to him.' I did s[illegible]; and received an answer, requesting me to 'call at once.' I found him in tears. 'You felt a good deal this morning, sir?' I said. 'Yes,' he replied; 'Christ has so often knocked at my door, and been refused admission, that I feared to-day He would knock no longer.' 'To prevent that,' I said, 'let us kneel down now, and ask forgiveness; that is the plan.' We prayed; he wept; he resolved; he tore his infidel manuscript in pieces; left his in Jerusalem, I take it that this will arouse carnal animosity. In that last strife the Lord Himself with His own right hand will deliver His people, and among an uplifted people on an uplifted land there will be a new service of truth.

Then the last enemy that shall be destroyed is death, and that brings us down to the end of the Millennium, and leads us to think that throughout the Millennium there will be a continual judgment of sin, for sin is not destroyed until the heavens and earth that are now passed away, and the new heavens and the new earth, for which we look and wherein dwelleth righteousness, shall be manifested to His glory forever.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Providential Escape.—Major Swanson said at a recent meeting: "Before my conversion I had a very narrow escape from death. When my wife saw how the bedstead was placed in our room, she was not pleased with it, and caused it to be turned exactly the reverse way. That night the ceiling fell right on the place where our heads would have been if no change had been made."

Why a Man's Leg was Broken.—"On Board the transport in which I went to the late campaign, I learned that a man named Stephen had broken his leg over one of my boxes. This made me take a particular interest in him, and while he lay in the hospital I read and spoke with him every day, with the result that he became a Christian. I was speaking to a colonel of artillery about him, and he remarked, 'The Lord broke the man's leg that his heart might be broken.'"

Prayer and Prohibition.—Mr. Oatts said: "There is one part of the work which we might use with great effect, and that is prayer. When I was in Chicago about a year ago they were voting whether the State of Iowa should or should not have the prohibitory amendment to the Constitution. The ladies of America take, as you are aware, great interest in this question, and on the voting day spent the time in prayer, asking that those who had the right to vote might be influenced to vote in favor of prohibition. The result was that the Bill was adopted with a vote of 40,000 in its favor."

An Averted Blow.—Mr. Sloan said: "To show clearly what Christ's love can do, even in very young children, I will tell you an incident which occurred very lately. A young girl, only three years of age, was very difficult to manage, owing to a violent temper. She was always in difficulties with her brothers and sisters. One day she was placed in circumstances which tempted her to strike one of her brothers. Her mother, seeing how the case stood, went to prevent her, but the little one said, 'I am not going to strike Davie; Jesus has taken the naughty out of my heart.' Christians have no right to say their children are too young to prove the power of Christ's saving and preserving grace. Christ specially invites little children to come to Him."

Nearer to Hell than Ever.—"I Remember a very sorrowful case which so affected me that it will not soon be forgotten. A little boy, the son of a poor drunkard, was converted; owing to the state of wretchedness in which his father's habits kept him, he fell ill, and lay dying in a miserable room. The father was watching at his bedside, listening to the dying words of his son, who declared that he could not die happy unless his father knelt down and prayed to Jesus for pardon. To please his little one the man knelt, but only the boy prayed, while the tears flowed freely from his eyes. Soon the lad was laid in his grave, and until the effect of his son's death wore off, the wretched father kept from the bottle; but in a few weeks he was as bad, if not worse than ever. He never truly repented; there had been only a slight agitation, raised by the wind of trouble, which was blowing over him, and it was this that caused him to take a thought of the course on which he was going. When the wind fell he soon forgot, and went on his downward career. He is nearer hell now than ever before."

Only an Ignoramus.—The Rev. Mr. Colvin, of Renton, said at one of the noonday prayer-meetings: "Last night a woman made an objection as to the possibility of her being saved by saying that she was no scholar—only an ignoramus. Mr. Marsh at once turned to John 3: 16, and read it, 'For God so loved the world,' etc. Then he said, 'Do you believe this is the Word of God?' 'Yes, sir,' replied the woman. 'Then this promise is to you, because the word "whosoever" includes "no scholar" and "ignoramus." Will you trust in this promise and turn from your sins?' inquired Mr. Mrash. 'I will that.' I hope that this woman who is no scholar will soon become learned in the mysteries of godliness. At any rate, she has taken the first step in the way to wisdom, for 'the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom.'"

Turning a Husband into a Bear.—Dr. Cameron remarked: "It is often said to me, 'You doctors have much to answer for in making people take to drinking.' I find that patients have much more. One day a teetotaler came to me and asked, 'How much whiskey has my wife to get?' 'Whiskey! she has to get none.' I went to call in the afternoon, and found the wife in tears, and the mother-in-law very wrathful. 'What's the matter?' 'What's the matter? How have you the conscience to ask such a question, after sending home her husband like a bear?' It turned out that in the morning, they had told the husband that the doctor had ordered his wife to get spirits; he went at once to the public-house and bought a bottle of the very best whiskey, as it was for a sick person. He then came to me to learn the exact quantity to give his wife at a time. Finding from my reply he was deceived, he came home, and acted as the women said, like a bear."

A Cured Patient's Regret.—Dr. Cameron related: "Not many days ago a man sitting in a back seat of this church said to me, 'The Lord was very near to me when I was lying in Belvidere Hospital. He sent the Holy Spirit to plead with me to give my heart to Jesus, but I stubbornly refused. Oh, how I wish I had done so then instead of rejecting Him. I could have done it so easily! Now everything is so dark and so difficult. What shall I do?' 'Exactly what you should have done in the hospital,' I aid; 'give yourself up, body, soul, and spirit, to Jesus.' 'What if the Holy Spirit is grieved with me?' he inquired. 'You are grieving the Spirit now by your sinful doubts. Christ says, "Come unto Me." Obey, and He will fulfil His promise.' In a short time the man surrendered his doubts and trusted implicitly in God's Word. As he rose to leave he remarked, 'What would have become of me if the Holy Spirit had left off pleading with me?' Christ comes near to every sinner. Beware how you reject Him. 'Now is the accepted time.'"

A Receipt Found in Answer to Prayer.—At the Cowcaddens meeting on April 2d, Major Swanson related an instance of a wonderful answer to prayer. "A man lived in a cottage which he desired to purchase, but he required an additional hundred pounds to make up the purchase money. He went to a rich man and borrowed the sum needed, and thus completed the purchase. By hard labor he acquired the sum of ninety pounds, which he repaid to his friend. Very soon afterward he died, as also did the lender. The rich man's son, on looking over his father's books, saw the entry of the loan, but there was no entry of any part of it being repaid. Calling upon the widow, the young man said, 'You owe me £100, which my father lent to your husband.' 'Yes, he did get it from your father, but he repaid £90 of it, so there is only £10 due.' 'Where is the receipt for the money?' The poor woman was in distress, she had not got it, and could not find it, therefore the young man took steps to recover the money by selling the cottage. The night before the sale the widow and her son were sitting lonely and very disconsolate, thinking that the God whom she and her husband served had forsaken her. The son suddenly said, 'Why don't you ask Jesus for the receipt?' She knelt down and asked Him to send her the receipt. That same night the widow found lying on the floor her husband's pocket-book, and in it there was the receipt for the £90. Hurrying to the house of her creditor, she showed it to him, and so pleased was he at this Divine interposition that he cheerfully forgave her the balance."

PROPHETIC NOTES.

The Restlessness of the Age.

THE Rev. Dr. Bonar, in the course of his recent address as Moderator of the Free Church of Scotland, recently made the following pertinent and powerful remarks. He said: "We know the past with its lights and shadows, and we stand in front of the future; and it presses on. What is to emerge from its silence and darkness, for ourselves, for our church, for our nation, for Europe? We gaze upon the cloudy curtain, but it does not rise at our bidding; and we cannot rend it or see what lies beyond. Its disclosures, however, ought not to take by surprise a believing man and a student of the Word. He is always in some measure prepared for what is coming on the earth, by the prophetic instructions of his Lord. These instructions interpret the past to him, they give him a true and sober insight into the real condition of the present, and they correct his fond and one-sided anticipations of the future. They are his light in a dark place until the day-dawn and the day-star arise.

"In the ever-shifting changes and contradictions of public opinion, swaying to and fro with the tides of human passion; in the wide acceptance of the doctrine that religious certitude is impossible, and the supernatural indemonstrable; in the effacement of ancient landmarks, and the slackening of the most trusted key-stones, we see a spirit at work—call it the spirit of the age or not—which is only beginning to reveal its aim and potency.

"In the disintegration of creeds and the decomposition of the materials of which these creeds are formed; in the multiplication of sects and the appetite for division and subdivision; in the unsettlement of thought, and the unwillingness to accept a settlement upon Divine authority; in the rejuvenescence of doubt and the preference of unbelief to faith; in the audacities of scepticism and the oscillations between a bald atheism and an ornate pantheism; in the revived admiration for the deities of Greece and Rome, and the ill-concealed regret that Polytheism is now out of fashion, and that

> 'To adorn the worship of the One
> A universe of gods has passed away,' in the effrontery of an agnosticism that seems to have rebuilt the Athenian altar 'to the Unknown God,' though whether for worship or as an excuse for refusing all worship, no one knows; in the spread of religious materialism and the passion for the æsthetic and pictorial, in the tendency to regard the worship of Him, who is a spirit, as a priestly performance for the gratification of the eye and ear; in the ambition to imitate antiquity and restore the worn-out garments of paganism; in these we have the foreshadows of approaching changes—of a spiritual revolution which will formulate to itself a new creed, which is gradually coming into shape, though as yet its projectors have not made up their minds as to whom they are to dedicate their projected temple—whether to the Jupiter of Olympus or the Jehovah of Zion.

"But the pole-star is steady, the compass does not play false, and the pilot's hand is strong. He, at least, has no misgivings, whatever may be the increasing restlessness and confusion. We see in front of us the kingdom which cannot be moved, and we have in the midst of us Him to whom all power is given, who shall erelong bring out of this fermenting mass the glory of the new creation—order and unity, beauty and peace."

READERS should understand that when an article published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD bears the name of the writer, that writer must be held individually responsible for the views therein advanced. The ministers whose sermons appear in this journal, and other contributors, must not be regarded as always endorsing views about which there is a wide divergence of opinion, even among Christians of eminent piety and learning.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Total Reduction of the Public Debt for the fiscal year, which came to an end on June 30th, has been about $137,250,000, a sum exceeding by $17,250,000 the estimate of surplus made by Secretary Folger in December last. At that time, however, it was expected that the year's pension payments would amount to $100,000,000, while in fact the sum of these payments has been less than $70,000,000. The amount due the sinking fund for the year is estimated to be about $44,500,000. The New York Times says: "If nothing should occur to greatly disturb the rate of expenditure in the coming year, the reduction of internal revenue and customs receipts caused by the new tariff law will leave but a small surplus in that year beyond the sinking fund's requirements. It is probable, however, that the pension payments will be greater in the coming twelve months, and the effect of the new tariff rates upon the revenue cannot be accurately predicted."

The Statements Issued from Washington that the trade-dollar agitation was started by speculators anxious to depreciate the value of the coin, though possibly true, may mislead holders of it. The fact remains that the trade dollar is not a legal tender, that it is consequently worth only its intrinsic value, which is eighty-five cents, and as silver is decreasing in value it is never likely to be worth more. Large houses of business refuse to receive it at face value, many of the railroads will not take it, and the Government that issued it will not accept it in payment of taxes. People who live at a distance from large cities and are supposed to be ignorant of the course of business should be on their guard against taking it or they may suffer loss.

At the Missouri Prohibition Convention the resolutions adopted express a determination to keep the question as far as possible out of partisan politics. Their sole object is to secure the submission of a prohibitory amendment to the people. To this end they will direct their efforts to the election of men to the Legislature who are willing to vote for such a proposition. No separate party is to be formed, and no State ticket nominated. It is believed that this course will cause less political acrimony than by running a separate ticket, and that there will be a better prospect of carrying the amendment.

It is Unfortunate for the Country and for the Indians that General Crook was not allowed to deal unfettered with that branch of the Indian problem he had taken in hand. The Secretary of the Interior, it appears, objected to General Crook's plan of placing the captives on the reservation, and refused to give his consent to that course, although the Indians as well as their captor desired that settlement. General Crook plainly warned Secretary Teller that if his plans were not carried out there would be trouble, not only with the captured Chiricahuas, but with those who are still at large. These latter, as General Crook said, discovered that the general was not supported by the department, and therefore placed no confidence in his overtures. It is now reported that they regard the affair as a breach of faith, and are re-commencing their raids.

Temperance Teaching in the Public Schools has been ordered by the Michigan Legislature. The act, which has passed both houses by overwhelming majorities, orders that provision shall be made for instructing all pupils in every school in physiology and hygiene, with special reference to the effects of alcoholic drinks, stimulants, and narcotics generally, upon the human system, and that no certificate shall be granted any person to teach in the schools of Michigan who has not passed a satisfactory examination in physiology and hygiene, with particular reference to the effects of alcoholic drinks, narcotics, and stimulants upon the human system. The passage of this useful act is stated to be mainly due to the exertions of the Women's National Christian Temperance Union.

Archbishop Purcell, of the Roman Catholic Church, died on Wednesday, July 4th, at the Ursuline Convent, St. Martin's, Ohio. He was eighty-three years of age, having been born in Ireland in 1800. He appears to have been a man of blameless character, yet his indiscretions have involved thousands of families in ruin. The bank he established commanded the confidence of Roman Catholics throughout the country, owing to the respect in which he was held. It was, however, conducted on principles that would ruin any commercial undertaking, and when it failed its liabilities were more than three million dollars. The money confided to him by depositors was used in the building of churches and a cathedral, and was utterly lost to the poor people who trusted the archbishop with their savings. It will be a long time before the archbishop is forgotten in Ohio.

The Believers Meeting for Bible Study will this year be held at Niagara, Ontario. It will commence on Wednesday, July 25th and will continue for eight days, closing on August 1st. The place can easily be reached from both sides the frontier by steamer, which runs daily, morning and evening, between Toronto, Niagara, and Lewiston, N. Y. The Grand Trunk Railway of Canada will supply our Canadian friends attending the conference with tickets for the round trip at a fare and a third. If a sufficiently large party is made up in New York, Chicago and other cities of the Union, similar terms may be obtained from the railroads on this side. Hotel and boarding-house accommodation at the rate of one dollar a day and upward may be obtained by early application to T. P. Blain, Esq., Niagara, Ont. Among the names of eminent ministers and laymen who have promised to assist those who have in former years conducted these meetings are Dr. J. H. Brookes, of St. Louis, Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, Rev. George F. Pentecost, Major Whittle, and H. M. Parsons. Mr. George C. Stebbins and Mr. James McGranahan will conduct the singing. The programme of study will include: The Inspiration of the Scriptures; the Integrity of the Books of the Bible; Methods of Bible Study; the Two Covenants; Christ the Wisdom of God; Christ the Head of the Church; Christ and the Kingdom; Christ and Future Judgments; the Doom of the Wicked; the Purpose of God in each Dispensation; the Preaching of the Gospel; Motives of Work. There will also be a study of select portions and particular books of the Bible. W. J. Erdman, Esq., of Jamestown, N. Y., will reply to any inquiries respecting the conference from persons desiring to attend.

The Death of Bishop William Pinkney, of the Protestant Episcopal Diocese of Maryland, occurred on July 4th. He was on one of his usual visitations to the churches of the diocese, and had arrived at Cockeysville, Baltimore County, where he had engaged to consecrate the new Sherwood Church, when he was taken ill suddenly in the night. He called a servant and sent for some medicine, but when the servant returned the bishop lay prostrate on the floor, and on being raised he was found to be dead. Dr. Pinkney was seventy-three years of age. He was born at Annapolis and graduated at St. John's College, in that city, intending to study law. His conversion occurred soon after he graduated, and he determined to devote his life to God. He studied for the ministry, and was ordained by Bishop Stone in 1836. He was seventeen years rector of St. Matthew's Church, Bladensburg, after which he removed to Washington. In 1870 he was elected Assistant Bishop of Maryland, and on the death of Bishop Whittingham in 1879 he succeeded him. He was thoroughly evangelical in his preaching and government, and though he encountered some opposition at the commencement of his episcopate from High Church clergymen, he was sincerely respected throughout his diocese.

Mr. D. L. Moody Preached to Crowded Congregations in Boston on Sunday, July 1st. The services were the first of a series it is intended to hold on every evening for the next two months. Mr. Moody expressed his conviction, based on his experience in Chicago, that the summer is the best time of the year for special revival services. Although so many people are out of town there always are plenty who remain, and the fact that many pastors are away on vacations and that many of the usual services of worship are intermitted, is a strong reason why some substitute should be supplied. The special services are to be held in the Windsor Theatre.

The Report of the Christian Home for Intemperate Women, recently established in New York through the efforts of the late Hon. William E. Dodge, shows that the institution is proving the wisdom as well as kindness of its founders and managers. Ladies of respectable positions in society have sought its welcome retreat, where they are preserved from all temptation to drunkenness, and are weaned from the desire that has brought them low. Opium and wine, the two fell destroyers of women, are being fought there under favorable circumstances, and the victims, aided by the kind advice and care of the managers and Christian friends, are being assisted to overcome their appetites through faith in Jesus.

A Church in Illinois has been Kept in Existence by the blessing of God on THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. A subscriber in the town, who sends us this gratifying intelligence, states that about six months ago the church was without a pastor and that fears were entertained that it would be broken up. A few of the members exerted themselves to keep the building open, and as the finances would not support a minister, the sermons of Dr. Talmage and Mr. Spurgeon, published in this journal, were read respectively at morning and evening service. The congregation increased under this plan, and lately when an evangelist visited the place to hold special meetings he said he "found the ground ready prepared for him." Fifty names have recently been added to the church, and an earnest minister is now settled there. Such testimonies to the usefulness of the paper are the most encouraging those engaged upon it can receive.

The History of a Captured Flag was Told on the occasion of its return in New York last week. The flag was originally presented by the city of New York to the One hundred and sixty-fourth Regiment in 1863. It was captured by General Rosser's cavalry at Sangster's Station, a small place twenty-two miles from Alexandria, Va., on December 16th, 1863. The flag has been retained by its captors during the twenty years which have since elapsed, but on July 4th, a corps of Virginia cadets, led by Colonel M. B. Ball, who commanded the regiment which captured the flag, brought it to New York, and presented it to Mayor Edson on the one hundred and seventh anniversary of American independence. Colonel M. B. Ball in the course of a graceful speech on the occasion observed that he now recognized the wisdom of Providence in the issue of the war, which had removed the blotch of slavery from the body politic. There is no doubt that this gallant Southern gentleman entertained very different opinions twenty years ago in common with many other brave men, who regarded the collapse of the South as a terrible misfortune. He has lived, however, to admit that God was right, as all those who are worsted in the battles of life and are grieving over their defeats will also some day acknowledge (Job 34 : 10–12).

An Interesting Law Suit was Ended in a New Jersey court on June 30th. The contest was for the possession of a farm, the plaintiffs claiming that it belonged to them by virtue of an unsatisfied judgment obtained by a dead man, for whom they were executors. The defendants alleged that the judgment had been satisfied, and produced a receipt for the money, but the plaintiffs claimed that the receipt, which purported to be written by the dead man, was a forgery. The lawyers on both sides entered into the contest with enthusiasm, and were very ingenious in raising quibbles which protracted the case. The dispute has been before the courts in different shapes for five years, but on June 30th the lawyer for the defendants stated in court that as he held a mortgage on the farm as security for his bill, he would pay the plaintiffs the amount they claimed, to prevent further litigation. He did so, and the plaintiffs found that the amount would just about pay their own lawyer, and they handed it to him. Thus, as was remarked by the court, one lawyer has the farm, the other has the money, and the contestants have the experience. However valuable the experience may be it is little likely to satisfy the contestants. By this time they are in a condition to appreciate the Saviour's injunction (Matt. 5 : 39, 40).

The Singular Accident to the New Cunard steamship Aurania last week is causing much discussion among engineers. The vessel was expected to arrive at New York on July 2d from Liverpool, but on July 1st when she was within sight of land an alarming accident occurred. The crank shaft attached to the middle piston, an enormous bar of solid steel ten inches in diameter, snapped in twain. The suddenly liberated piston rod shot up through the top of the confining cylinder, tearing the thick steel plates all to pieces, and with one tremendous burst and a report like that of a heavy piece of ordnance, a vast volume of steam, carrying with it fragments of iron, burst through the skylight. The lower portion of the broken crank shaft, a mass of steel weighing many tons, went flying about like a huge flail. The effect was awful. Iron and steel were knocked to splinters. Wherever the flail struck destruction followed. Nothing but prompt action could save the sheathing of the vessel from being pounded through. And yet the little steel brake which controlled the whole tremendous mechanism was situated only about two feet from the arm of the thrasher and right in the midst of the scalding steam and the blistering sparks. Andrew Lambert, the second engineer, was on duty in the engine-room. He knew the engine must be stopped, and, dropping down on his hands and knees, he crawled up to it and turned off the steam. He was badly scalded about the face and hands, but otherwise uninjured. But he had risked his life to save the ship. Word was sent to the Cunard office by a passing vessel, and the Aurania was towed by six powerful tugs into port. Various causes have been assigned for the accident, but one of the most expert machinists in America said that in his opinion they were all wrong. "Nothing," he said, "is stronger than its weakest part, and it may have happened that the angle made by the crank and the connecting rod was favorable to producing the greatest possible strain on the weakest part. Then something had to give way." This sententious observation applies to other matters as well as to machinery. Men of splendid genius and brilliant acquirements have often fallen to ruin through one weak point in their characters. It is that weak point every man ought to guard, for "he who stumbles in one point becomes guilty of all" (James 2 : 10).

An Abandoned City in Illinois is Described by a Chicago journal. The recent floods of the Mississippi have, it appears, compelled the inhabitants of Kaskaskia, formerly the capital of the State, to temporarily remove from the city. The Father of Waters has for years been slowly encroaching on the city, and it is gradually but surely disappearing. It was originally a peninsula, occupying a narrow strip between the Mississippi and the Kaskaskia, which joined each other seven miles below. Kaskaskia is now an island, the Mississippi having broken its narrow barrier of land on the north two years ago, swept across it, and joined its tributary at that point. The continued detrition is plainly visible from the passing steamboats, and it is merely a question of time when the entire island shall be obliterated. The result may not be immediate, but it is inevitable. Attempts have been made to protect the banks, but the waters rush in between and behind the stone, and the work of tearing down goes on faster than the work of building up. The temporary removal of the inhabitants, enforced by the present flood, is only a preparation for final abandonment. They expect it and have been expecting it for some time. In these circumstances a man would be thought very foolish who accumulated all he had in Kaskaskia, and made no arrangements for a refuge when the city shall be swept away. Yet this is precisely what men are doing who live only for this world, the destruction of which, like the city of Kaskaskia, may not be immediate but is inevitable (II. Peter 3 : 10–12).

A Subterfuge Exasperated a Lenient Judge in Pennsylvania last week. A young man was convicted of having wronged a girl whose position in society was beneath his own, and the judge sentenced him to two years' imprisonment. The young man was appalled by the sentence, and informed the judge that if he would cancel it he would marry the girl. The judge thought that marriage was the best end of the case, and gladly gave his assent to the arrangement. The sentence was reconsidered, and the matter allowed to stand open so as to afford no obstacle to the wedding. A large crowd gathered in the court-house on July 2d, expecting to see the ceremony performed by the judge, but they were disappointed. The judge had been informed that the father of the prisoner had told the girl's guardian that he had consented to the marriage as the best way to get his son out of the scrape, but that the son would leave her as soon as the ceremony was performed. The judge indignantly refused to consent to such a marriage, and the protectors of the girl were of the same mind. The court reimposed the sentence of two years, and the young man, much crestfallen, was taken to prison. The judge very properly refused to be imposed upon by a promise true in the letter but false in spirit. Such subterfuges are common, in business, in society, and even in the church. It should be clearly understood that they are really falsehoods, and that they do not deceive the Judge of all the earth." Those who employ them should remember that they are explicitly warned that they cannot enter heaven (Rev. 21 : 27).

BUYING WITHOUT MONEY.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"He that hath no money; come ye, buy, and eat."—ISAIAH 55 : 1.

The Divine Merchant—His Wares—I. The Buyer—Literally Without Money—A Spiritual Pauper—Innocence Gone—Righteousness Counterfeit—Hopelessly in Debt—Cannot Pay his Way—Nor Face the Future—II. Selection of this Buyer—Because of his Need—As an Exhibition—Most Likely to Listen—And to Prize It—III. The Invitation—To those who Desire—Story of a Governor—Agreeing to Terms—Appropriating the Goods—IV. Assurance—An Honest Offer—Nothing the only Terms.

THERE is a semicolon in our translation, but we need not take notice of it. It should not be there, since the text is the second of two parallel sentences arranged according to the method of Hebrew poetry.

"Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters,
And he that hath no money, come, buy, and eat."

We have before us the figure of a merchant selling his wares, and crying like a chapman in the market, "Ho!" To attract attention he calls aloud, "Come! Come! Come!" three several times; and he adds to this the cry of "Buy! Buy!" Shall the Great King thus liken Himself to a trader in the market earnest to dispose of his goods? It is even so, and I therefore call upon you to admire the mercy of the Lord.

In the fifty-third and fifty-fourth chapters this Divine Merchantman has been spreading out his wares. What treasures they are! Look to the fifty-third chapter: what see you there? Behold that pearl of great price, the Lord Jesus Christ. Surely with such a treasure to display we ought not to cry long for buyers, for every truly wise man will exclaim, "This is what I need: a Saviour, and a great one. An atonement for sin is the one thing needful to me." To this you are invited in these words, "He that hath no money, come, buy, and eat."

In the fifty-fourth chapter at verse seven, the Divine Merchantman sets forth the rare possession of His everlasting love. What more can be set forth to win men's hearts? First, a full atonement and now love everlasting, making a covenant confirmed by oath. Shall there be need often to cry, "Come and buy," when such celestial wares are displayed before us?

In handling this text we shall notice, first, the description of the buyer, "He that hath no money;" secondly, the selection of this particular buyer—why is he invited beyond all others? Thirdly, the invitation to purchase, "Come, buy, and eat;" and fourthly, we shall add the assurance that this Gospel market is no deception, for these things are really to be had.

I. First, then, here is a description of

THE BUYER.

I believe he is here this morning. I hope he will recognize his own portrait, though it is by no means a flattering one. It is truth itself, a photograph taken by the sunlight of heaven. It is the portrait of a poor, penniless, broken-down creature reduced to the extremity of want: here it is—"He that hath no money."

Of course, by this is meant among other things the man who literally has no money. Among the Jews of our Lord's day there existed an idea that a man who had money was at a great advantage with regard to heavenly things, so that when the Lord said "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom," they exclaimed with wonder, "Who then can be saved?" as if they thought that if the rich could not be easily saved then none could be. The Word of God contains nothing to encourage such a notion. The rich man is never extolled in the Old Testament, but he is often spoken of most slightingly.

It is the glory of the Messiah that "the poor have the Gospel preached unto them," and it is the glory of the Gospel that it is freely provided by the bounty of God for the beggar on the dunghill. Let no man's heart fail him this day because he saith "Silver and gold have I none." Having nothing, you may yet possess all things. You are at no disadvantage in God's market because your pocket is empty: you may come penniless and bankrupt and receive the exceeding riches of His grace. But we understand the reference of the text to be mainly spiritual, and so the portrait here is that of a man who has no gold of goodness, no silver of sanctity—he it is that is invited to come and buy the wine and milk of heaven.

His fancied stock of natural innocence is spent. At first he thought himself to be pure as the newly fallen snow, forgetting the question—How can he be clean that is born of a woman? They told him that he was made "a member of Christ, a child of God, and an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven" while he was yet a babe; and thus he was led to think that he had started life's business with a respectable stock-in-trade. He knows better now; he has seen this fancied goodness melt away like the mist of the morning. Innocence is utterly gone, if it was ever there.

He thought that he had accumulated some little savings of good works; but his imaginary righteousness turns out to be counterfeit. Had he not been honest? had he not been sober? had he not attended a place of worship, and repeated forms of prayer? Did not all this make up a little fortune of righteousness? He thought so, but then he was ignorant and deluded: he knows better now, for he has found out that all his righteousness is base metal: he could not pass a penny's worth of it in the shop of his own conscience, much less in the market of heaven; he knows that it would at once be detected, and nailed to the counter.

He finds that his silver is white metal of the basest sort, and that his gold is a sham: he has not the face to offer it anywhere; yea, he is so afraid of being seized by justice as a coiner that, like a wise man, he has hidden his sham righteousness in the earth, and has run away from it. He is now more afraid of his righteousness than of his unrighteousness. He would think it just as possible for him to be saved by cursing and swearing as by the merit of his own works. His good works are in ill odor with his conscience, for he sees them to be defiled within and without with sin: a rottenness is in the bones of his righteousness, and thus he is without merit of any sort. See his poverty: his original stock is gone, and all his savings have melted away!

He is in a still worse plight, for he is also too poor to get anything: the procuring power is gone, for he has "no money." Now that he has come into his sober senses he would repent, but he cannot find a tender heart; he would believe, but he cannot find faith. He has no money; that is to say, nothing wherewith he can procure those good things which are necessary unto salvation and eternal life. He sees them all before him, like many a poor man who walks the streets of London, and sees just what he wants behind the glass of the shop window; but he puts his hand into his pocket, and despairingly passes on, for he has no money. As without money nothing is to be bought in the world's mart, so is this poor man afraid that no blessing of grace can ever be his because he has no good thing to offer, no righteousness to give in exchange. He is worse than a common beggar, for he does not even know how to beg—"We know not what we should pray for as we ought." He needs even to be taught how to beg. What a pass to come to!

THERE IS YOUR PORTRAIT,

my poor friend! Do you recognize it? I hope you do. I hear you say, "Yes, that is myself. I am without money." Then to you the Word of this Salvation is sent—"He that hath no money, come, buy, and eat."

"No money!" Then he

CANNOT PAY HIS OLD DEBTS.

His sins rise up before him, but he cannot make amends for them. What a long file is needed to hold the record of his debts; it must be deep as the bottomless pit, and high as heaven. He owes ten thousand talents, and has "nothing to pay:" he has not a stiver, he has no money whatever! He is reduced to bankruptcy, and cannot pay a farthing in the pound.

Moreover, he cannot meet his present expenses. Poor man! he must live; he must eat the bread of heaven, and he must drink of the water of life: but he has nothing with which to procure these good things. His soul hungereth, yea, even fainteth after the mercy of God, but he has no price with which to procure it. This day he would pluck his eyes out to be pleasing with God; but he has nothing to offer which the Lord could accept. He is reduced to such beggary that like the prodigal he cries, "I perish with hunger."

HE CANNOT FACE THE FUTURE.

He hardly dares to think of it; and yet the thought of it will come in. He remembers the needs which will surround him on a dying bed, and the terrible demands of the resurrection morning when the ringing trump shall introduce him to the dread Assize, and he shall stand before his God to render his account. He knows that he cannot answer Him for one sin of a thousand. He dreads the thought of the world to come! He has nothing with which to meet the demands of the eternal future. He has "no money," nothing that will pass current in the day of judgment. He is brought to the last stage of spiritual destitution; poverty has come upon him like an armed man. This is a terrible plight to be in; yet I wish that every sinner here might be reduced to it, for when he is so reduced and brought low, grace will come in, and the tide will turn.

The only hope for a man who has "no money" must be outside himself. It is idle for him to look into his own coffers: he must look away from himself; and his only chance in thus looking is to and plead for mercy's sake. He cannot buy—it is only God's mercy that talks about his buying: he must beg, he must entreat for love's sake. This is an essential part of spiritual poverty; and I would that every unregenerate person knew that in him there dwelleth no good thing, and that he were convinced that he must look out and look up for salvation, and that upon the ground of mercy, since he cannot expect to obtain any blessing upon the footing of justice, or as a matter of debt.

This is the man who is called to buy heaven's wine and milk. It is to these wretches, these blind beggars, these naked vagrants, that the Gospel is sent. This day I have to present the promise of God and the exhortation of mercy to those who have failed in life, who are down at the heel, broken and crushed. Oh, you utterly lost ones, to you is there opened a door of hope. The Lord has come into the market, and He bids you buy of Him without money and without price.

II. Now a minute or two upon the second point:

THE SELECTION OF THE BUYER.

It is a strange choice, and it leads to a singular invitation, "He that hath no money; come, buy, and eat." In the streets round about this Tabernacle, especially on a Saturday evening, you may note the salesmen standing before their shops, and crying out vociferously, "Buy! Buy! Buy!" No one can refuse to hear their noise; but if they knew that a person had no money, I think they would save their breath so far as he is concerned. They want ready-money customers, and plenty of them. What would be the use of crying, "Buy! Buy!" to a man whose purse is empty? Yet these are the very persons whom the Lord selects, and to them He cries, "Come, buy and eat." What is the reason?

Well, first, these need mercy most. Oh, poor souls, when the Lord Jesus looks on you He does not look at what you have, but at what you have not. He does not look at your excellences, but at your necessities. He is not looking out for man's fulness but for man's emptiness. The Lord Jesus never gave Himself for our righteousness; but He "gave Himself for our sins." Salvation is by grace, and it is presented to those who are lost, for they are the people whom it will suit: how should those who are not lost value salvation? I say that God selects the most poverty-stricken first because this character most needs His pitying love. The greatness of your necessity is that which gives you a first call from the God of all grace. Not merit, but demerit; not desert of reward, but desert of wrath, is the qualification for mercy.

Again, this character is chosen because he is such an one as will exhibit in his own person the power of divine grace. If the Lord Jesus Christ takes one that is wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked, and if He satisfies all his necessities by being riches for his wretchedness, comfort for his misery, wealth for his poverty, eyes for his blindness, and raiment for his nakedness, then all the world will see what a great Saviour He is, and how wonderfully His salvation meets the necessities of the case.

Next, the Lord Jesus delights to make evident the freeness of His grace. Now, if those were first called who have the money of merit, it might be imagined that they had paid their way: but if those are called who have no good thing in them, it is clear that grace is free.

If you ask me yet again why is he that hath no money so expressly called, I would answer, because he is

THE KIND OF MAN THAT WILL LISTEN.

The man who is needy is the man that will hearken to the tidings of a full and free supply. It is the guilty man who loves to hear of pardon, it is the bond-slave whose ear is charmed with the word "redemption." If you are no sinner you will not care about a Saviour. Only real sinners rejoice in a real atonement. The Lord sends the Gospel to every creature under heaven; but He knows, as we do, that the most of men will not regard it, for they fancy that they need it not: but if there is one that has no merit or claim he will listen with eagerness to the tidings of mercy for him. He that hath no money is the man for Christ's money. He that is shivering in his nakedness will rejoice to be clothed.

Let me add that such an empty, penniless soul, when he does get mercy and praise it. He that has been shut up in the dark for years values the light of the sun. He that has been a prisoner for months, how happy he is when the prison doors are opened, and he is at liberty again! Let a man once get Christ, who has bitterly known and felt his need of Him, and he will prize Him beyond all things, and find his sole delight in Him.

WILL PRIZE IT

In any case, be the reason what it may, it is clear that there are special invitations issued for the royal feasts, and these are all directed to those whose need has reached the extremity of distress.

III. I have now in the third place to notice

THE INVITATION.

The man who has no money is to come, buy, and eat. It looks odd to tell a penniless man to come and buy, does it not? and yet what other word could be used? Come and buy, has a meaning of its own not to be otherwise expressed.

In buying there are three or four stages, and the first is desiring to have the thing which is exhibited. If a man were to come into the shop and turn over all the goods, and never purchase anything, the tradesman would begin to cry, 'Buy! buy!" with quite another accent; for he does not want a crowd to look at him, but he wants people to buy of him. Many of you who are here this morning have only come to hear what the preacher has to say, and to criticise his style and language; I pray you rise to something better than that. Come, and buy! Let us do business this morning for God, and for our own souls. Do not waste the precious market-day of the Sabbath. People come and go, and hear sermons, and read books, and all for a sort of amusement; they do not come to downright business with the Lord. See, how they select striking sentences and cull sparkling and delightful extracts, and take notes of telling anecdotes; but all this is comparatively wasting time. "Come, buy! Buy! Buy!"

DO YOU MEAN BUSINESS?

Then, come and buy. Do not stand huckstering by the year together. Come to terms, and make an end of hesitation. If you have no desire you will not buy, and I shall effect no sales. Again I cry, "Come, buy, and eat." Oh that the Spirit may work in you that strong desire without which no man will ever buy! Alas! there are thousands who are always discussing knotty points not because they have a wish to understand the Gospel, but because they do not care to come to serious dealings.

Perhaps you have read the story of a governor of one of the American States who called at an hotel where there was a colored waiter, who was well known to hold Calvinistic opinions, and was, therefore, made the butt for many a jest. So the Governor said to him, "Sam, you do not really believe that doctrine of election, do you?" "'Deed I do, sah," said he. "Well, then," replied the Governor, "tell me whether I am elect or not." "Sah," said the negro, "I did not know you were a candidate, and I know nothing about a man's being elected if he has not put up for it." Now, that is common-sense. It is a business-like way of answering an absurd question.

Certain people who are not even candidates for heaven will yet shelter themselves behind wrong ideas of predestination—playing with the blessings of grace instead of desiring them. Have you not seen a man with a pack stand at a door trying to sell a few trinkets to a servant? He does not mind half an hour's talk about his goods; but when at last he finds that the maid does not mean buying, see how he shuts up his boxes, folds up his packages, and indignantly takes himself off, saying by his gestures, "I wish I had not wasted so much time over you." It is just so with earnest preachers; they grow sick at heart when they see that men will not come to business. They cry, "Who hath believed our report?" and are anxious to carry their heavenly burden to another people. Oh, dear hearers, let us not have to shake off the dust of our feet for a testimony against you! Oh, that you would hunger and thirst after Christ and His salvation, and then we should soon do a trade with you.

"Buy:" This means next to agree to terms, for there cannot be any purchasing, however much the buyer desires to buy and the seller to sell, till they agree to terms. Now, our difficulty with God's goods is this: whereas ordinarily the buyer cannot be brought up to in our case we cannot get men down to God's price. They will persist in offering something or other as a price. They talk to us thus—"I cannot be saved, for I do not see any good thing in myself. Sir, if I had a deep sense of need, then I could be saved;" or, "Sir, if I could pray better;" or, "Sir, if I had more repentance, or more love, I could then believe in Jesus." Oh, yes, if you had a price in your hand, you would pay for heaven's blessings, would you not? But then, you see, they are not presented to you upon such terms. Price is out of the question. God's terms are that there shall be no terms of purchase at all: you are to be nothing, and Jesus is to be your all in all. When you will come down to that, then take the goods, the bargain is made; eternal life is yours.

The next thing in a purchase is that, when the terms are carried out, the buyer appropriates the goods to himself. If I buy a thing it is mine, and I take it into my possession. You do not see a man buy a thing and then leave it behind him for the seller to do as he likes with it. In the things of God you are to appropriate the blessing to yourself. Put out the hand of faith, and say, "Here is Christ for a sinner. I am a sinner, and I take Christ to be my Saviour. Here is washing for the filthy: I am filthy, and I wash. Here is a robe of righteousness for the naked: I am naked, I take the raiment to be mine." Make Christ your own, and He has made you His own. Take the Lord by an appropriating act of faith to be yours forever, and the bargain is struck.

But the text says a little more than that—it says, "Buy, and eat" as much as to say, make it yours in the most complete sense. If a man buys a loaf of bread it is his: but if he eats it, then all the lawyers in the world cannot dispute him out of it—he has it by a possession which is not only nine points of the law, but all the law. When a poor soul hath confidence enough to take Christ and to live upon Him as his own, saying, "This Christ is able to save me, I take Him into me and I am saved," why, you. What is to divide him from Christ? There is the bath, and I wash therein and am clean: what then? Who can obliterate the fact that I have washed? The righteousness of Christ is bestowed upon me, and put on by me, who can tear off that glorious dress?

THE DEVIL HIMSELF CANNOT UNSAVE

IV. I conclude now by saying a few things by way of assurance, to show that this is all real and true, and no make-believe. Every needy, thirsty soul may have this day all the grace of God. Oh, may the Spirit of God make him willing, he shall have all the blessings of the covenant of grace to be his own forever and ever! This is no sham: there is made to every one who is conscious of soul-poverty! For, first, it is not God's way to mock men. You must not dream of exceptions which do not exist. Jesus says "Him that cometh to Me I will in no wise cast out," and this includes all who come. I am speaking to some this morning who have come across the Atlantic and are not yet saved: you may have been careless and thoughtless all your lives, but if you come to Jesus Christ this morning He will not refuse you His salvation. Many have come in from the country to-day: oh, that this may become their spiritual birthday! Come to the Lord Jesus Christ, my friend, and He will welcome you. He never did reject one, and He never will. He will not find pleasure in tantalizing you.

Note that these mercies must be really meant to be given gratis to the poor, because God is under no necessity to sell His benefits. If a poor tradesman began to give away his goods you would say, "There is some trick about this;" but when the Most High God, the possessor of heaven and earth, who has everything, freely gives to us, then there can be no design for His own advantage: His motive must be pure compassion. There is no adequate price that we could bring to God for His mercy; how could there be? Would it be mercy if it could be bought? Grace is without price because it is priceless. You can buy gold if you will: there is some medium of exchange for the purchase of every finite thing; but what medium of exchange could there be for the purchase of infinite blessings? Huge heaps of such things as the native Africans call money would be of no value to us, and what self-righteous men call merit is utterly despicable to God. Is there any comparison between a man's giving all his wealth and the possession of eternal glory?

Remember that Jesus must be meant for sinners, for if sinners had not existed there never would have been a Saviour. When the Lord Jesus Christ set up in business to save He must have known that there was no sphere for His operations except among sinners, and hence He entered on His office with the view of saving sinners. If a doctor comes into a town, and there is nobody ill, and it is certain that nobody ever will be ill, he had better drive off somewhere else: he will do most business where there is most sickness. When Christ Jesus became a soul-physician He had His eye on the spiritually sick, and on them alone. They are the patients who make up His practice, and they only. If, then, thou art sick even unto death, put thy case into the hands of Christ, for He will heal thee.

Beside that, Christ is all. Men have no notion what Christ is when they talk of getting ready for Christ, or bringing something to Him. What would you bring to Christ? Everything is in Christ, and therefore you cannot bring anything to Him. "Oh, but," say you, "I must come with a broken heart." I tell you no, you must come for a broken heart. "Oh, but I must come with a sense of need." I tell you that a true sense of need is His work in you. True repentance and a sense of need spring from His grace, and you must get them from Him without money and without price. "Ah, but I must be something." Say, rather, you must be nothing.

One thing more I would say, and that is the Gospel of Jesus Christ is blessedly free from all clogging conditions, because all supposed conditions are supplied in Christ Jesus. We have heard of men advertising to give things away, but when you read the advertisement carefully you find that you are to pay after all: the Gospel is not so, its freedom is real. Many a good thing is to be had, but when you see how it is to be obtained, you say to yourself, "the conditions shut me out:" but shut no man out who needs to be saved and wills to be saved. Over the gate of heaven is written "Come, and welcome."

But you remind me that it says "Buy," and you insist upon it that therefore you must pay. Not so; salvation is paid for already: all the paying has been done by Him who opened His veins to find the only price that is current in heaven—the sin-atoning blood. If price may be spoken of—that price was all paid long before you were born. Nearly nineteen hundred years ago on Calvary's cross the purchasing work was done, and Jesus bowed His head and said, "It is finished." Will you add to that which is finished? Will you tag on your rags to the Lord's glistering cloth of gold, and add your base farthings to the infinite price which He poured forth so lavishly at the foot of the Eternal Throne? Oh, do not so.

To yoke you with Christ can never be. You and Christ together! An archangel and an emmet would make a better pair than you yoked with Christ. Nay, my friend, sink, sink, sink; by a mighty descent sink to nothing, and let Jesus rise, rise, rise, till He fills the whole horizon of your thoughts and hopes, for then are you saved. Let us sing—

"'Tis done! the great transaction's done;
I am my Lord's, and He is mine:
He drew me, and I follow'd on,
Charm'd to confess the voice divine."

A DESPISED NEW TESTAMENT.

REV. W. R. LAMUTH the son of the veteran missionary laboring in China relates an interesting incident in a letter home. He says: My father recently received a letter from some one in Tsing-poo, saying if he would come or send a friend he would get him a preaching-place. He had been so often disappointed, however, that he delayed a few days, thinking it was a joke being perpetrated upon him. In a few days a second letter came to the same purport. He immediately sent his native preacher, who was met in a deserted quarter of the city by a young man by the name of Tser, who informed him that he was clerk in the court of a judge at Tsing-poo.

Tser seemed so anxious that a Christian teacher should be sent that my father's messenger inquired the cause of his desire. Tser said that two weeks before, my father had visited the judge and requested a proclamation granting the citizens liberty to rent them a building for a chapel. This was firmly refused, and they retired disappointed. Before leaving, however, they presented him with a copy of the New Testament and some tracts. The tracts the judge tore to pieces as soon as their backs were turned, and the Testament he hurled across the room. It fell near the secretary, and Tser picked it up and concealed it in his sleeve. He retired to his room, and during the intervals of work read a few lines of the curious book. He grew so interested that he took it home and read it at night. The result was an intense desire for Christian teaching and his application to my father. Tser was familiar with Chinese law and he explained a scheme for obtaining the required sanction to the opening of a mission.

The plan was so successful that property was bought and a small church opened at once. Tser commenced in company with a native brother, studying the Word of God. In the course of a few months my father baptized him. In two months more he wrote me (the work having been placed in my hands in the mean time) that as he was forced to work on the Sabbath, and had learned that it was a day to be kept sacred, he had given up his position and was on his farm in the country. This was the more surprising as his official position was an ancient patrimony, to give up which, voluntarily, was, in the eyes of his friends, the height of folly. I invited him to my station at Nan-siang, to act as my teacher in Chinese. He came joyfully, bringing his wife and child, accepting a salary far less than what he had been in the habit of receiving. His wife soon knelt by his side at the family altar, and became a devoted Christian. Nay, she went further than many native Christians—she voluntarily loosed the bandages from her feet, saying, "While I cannot restore them to their natural size, I will do all I can to have my feet assume the shape God has given them." Later on he was licensed to preach, and he never seems weary of telling the story of Jesus and His love.

THE BABY TOWERS IN CHINA.

(See Illustration.)

Missionaries in China report that one of their most earnest endeavors in their work is to overthrow the practice of infanticide, which prevails to an appalling extent. The custom of destroying the lives of children, and especially of female babies, is so extensive and so well recognized that there are in most of the cities conveniences erected to save the parents the trouble and expense of single interments. They are called "Baby Towers."

In many places in China these towers are to be seen, with small openings like windows near to the ground. Into them the bodies of little children are thrown, wrapped round only with a piece of matting. Sometimes there is reason to fear, in the case of baby-girls, the people do not take the trouble to assure themselves the little ones are quite dead. A missionary in Wu-Chang one day met a little lad he knew carrying a small bundle in his arms. Upon inquiring what it was, he was told that the little boy's baby-sister had died the night before, and he was carrying her body to the baby tower.

A missionary writes a distressing account of

A CHINESE FOUNDLING HOSPITAL.

"Sometimes," he says, "you meet with a foundling house for gathering in these unhappy outcasts. We went to see the one established at Amoy. It was a most awful sight—filled with babies, all like little old women. Their appearances showed a distressing want of nourishment and cleanliness. We have never forgotten the sight, and can only think of it with a feeling of sickness. It would have been much better for the poor children to have passed away to God, instead of existing in such a state of living death; especially in view of the fact that if they live to grow up they are gladly got rid of to any who apply for them, although often for the worst of purposes. Even the nurses looked wretched. These various miseries may be accounted for by the want of principle often shown in heathen arrangements, especially by a system of farming out the offices of such institutions, and the efforts of all concerned to make as much gain as possible for themselves.

"Sometimes a heathen man or woman is moved to save the little life and admit the child into their family. In this way, a woman whom we knew, knowing that a certain girl was to be destroyed, went to the mother and asked to be allowed to keep the little one. Her request was granted. She brought her up with her own daughters, who looked on her as a foster-sister. The girl has turned out to be a very worthy woman, whose name is known in the Christian Church both at Amoy and Shanghai."

THE YOUNG MIDSHIPMAN'S RESCUE.

(See Illustration.)

Life is very dull for sailors when their ships are at the South African ports. There is little to amuse them, and they are generally eager to get the cargo on board and sail for home. A voyage to Europe means a stay at ports in which they can find much to entertain them, even if they do not always find the best kind of amusement; but in South Africa, especially on the coast of Madagascar, where some vessel floating the Stars and Stripes is generally to be seen waiting for cargo or entering or leaving port all is tame and dull. A few years ago on one of the American vessels there, a proposal was being discussed with the object of killing time and getting such enjoyment as the place afforded. It was finally decided that all who could get leave should go ashore and join in a shooting excursion on the mountains.

Among the officers Alfred Boden, a young midshipman, was one of the most eager to go. He was not a robust young man, but he was full of spirit and life and nervous energy. He had had some experience in the Rockies at home, and though he knew absolutely nothing of the African mountains he had no fear of harm coming to him there. To his great delight he was included in the party, and went ashore in the highest spirits.

When the natives knew the object the sailors had in view, there were several offers made to them of assistance, but the young men, with the impetuosity and self-confidence of youth, refused them. The natives by signs, and such broken English as they could command, warned them of the risk they ran, but to no purpose; the young men with natural contempt for natives, thought they had no need of their help, and rejected their offer with scorn. Boden, however, whose gentleness and uniform kindness to everybody had led to his being regarded as somewhat effeminate, was grieved at the way his companions treated the natives, and turning to the man who appeared to be their leader smiled his thanks, and placed in the hand of the stalwart negro his pocket-knife, a gift he knew would be appreciated. He did not mind the chaff his companions lavished on him for his weakness in giving a present to a man he was not likely ever to see again. Boden was hurt by seeing kindness repulsed, and if the gift of his knife would heal the wound his companions had made, he thought the present wisely given, though it might never bring benefit to him.

A delightful day was spent on the mountains, and the young men, who had been nearly a month on shipboard, thoroughly enjoyed roaming at will among the luxuriant forest growths at the foot of the mountains, and in scaling the higher peaks. They were sitting down to rest and partake of the refreshments they had brought with them, when a large bird of glorious plumage flew over their heads. They had never seen such a bird before, and exclamations of admiration sprang to every lip. The place they had chosen for their meal was the very edge of a steep cliff, and far below them they heard the rush of a mountain cataract, and could see the river like a silver thread glistening in the sunlight. They waited impatiently for the bird to fly past them again, that they might shoot it and carry it home as a memento of their journey. But it hovered over the chasm, and if they had shot it there they would not have been able to capture it. At last the bird flew toward them again, but wheeled as if in fear, and again crossed the chasm. Once more it came toward them, and then Boden raised his gun and fired. The bird fell, but it looked as if it had fallen beyond their reach. They hurried to the spot but could not see it. Looking over the edge of the cliff they saw it, not more than three feet below them, resting on a ledge of rock. Boden threw himself on the ground and strained over the cliff trying to reach it. He could just touch it with the tips of his fingers, but could not raise it. Another inch or two forward would accomplish his purpose, and he cautiously drew himself along, but it was too far; he overbalanced and fell forward down into the chasm.

The Stalwart Negro Carried Boden like an Infant.

The young men looked at each other in horror. They strained their eyes over the edge, but could see no sign of their companion. They shouted, but no answer came back but the echo of their own voices. Then they hurried down the mountain, looking anxiously for some path by which they could reach the foot of the cliff, but in vain. Then their thoughts turned to the natives they had seen before commencing their ascent, and hastened on to invoke their aid.

Meanwhile Alfred Boden was lying bruised and helpless half way down the cliff; he had caught at some bushes in his descent, and clinging to them had broken his fall, otherwise the force with which he would have fallen must have killed him. He fell against the trunk of a huge tree and it seemed to him that his back was broken. He fainted with pain, and heard nothing of the cries of his companions overhead. After a time he recovered consciousness, but was unable to move. Indeed, if he could have risen he would probably have fallen lower, for the cliff was so precipitous that the trunk of the tree seemed to be the only foothold. He lay perfectly still, wondering what would happen to him, and whether his companions were doing anything for his rescue. An intense stillness reigned around, broken only by the rush of the cataract. How long would he lie there? Would he ever see New York again? Would some wild beast or loathsome snake end his life? Questions like these passed through his mind as he lay, afraid to move. As the minutes passed he began to lose hope, and the prayers he had learned as a boy in Sunday-school passed through his mind. He was in imminent danger as he well knew, and he lamented the sins of his youth, and prayed for forgiveness. It seemed strange to him as he lay there that he should be more anxious about that than about his escape from his perilous situation.

How long he lay there he did not know, but at last he heard a voice he did not recognize, shouting. He answered feebly, for he was weak from pain. Again the voice called, and again he answered. In a few minutes he saw below him the form of the stalwart negro to whom he had given his pocket-knife. The man was soon at his side and helping him to rise, but the pain of movement was dreadful, and again he lapsed into unconsciousness.

The negro looked at him pitifully. Boden was the only one of the white sailors who had treated him like a human being, or he would not have stirred to assist him; but finding out which of the party it was who had fallen, he had gone in search of him at once. He picked him up tenderly as if he had been a babe, and carefully picking his way, bore his burden to a spot at which a prostrate tree made a rude bridge over the raging torrent. He was a powerful fellow, but such a load as the unconscious young sailor tried his strength as he crossed, his bare feet clinging to the tree. He bore him safely, however, to the other side, and he was soon among the group of anxious young sailors, who eagerly watched his movements.

They would have overwhelmed him with gifts, but he shook his head, and fondly stroked the hair and cheeks of the young man whose life he had saved. He had saved him because he was grateful to him for his kindness, and not for hire. Gently they carried young Boden when he regained consciousness to the boat, and rowed back to the ship, where he was cared for by the ship's surgeon, and soon recovered. A few days afterward the ship sailed for home, but not before he had sought out again the preserver of his life and had made him accept a few gifts in recognition of his service. The most prized of those was his own photograph, which was the subject of unbounded wonder to the negro and his friends.

To a simple act of kindness—of respect for the feelings of another—he in all probability owed his life, and the lesson was not lost on him or his sailor friends. Nor were the thoughts that filled his mind as he lay on the verge of the grave without result. He sought and found the Good Shepherd who, when He finds the lost sheep carries it to His Father's House rejoicing. His utter helplessness as he lay where he had fallen on that eventful day was to him so fit type of his spiritual condition that the revelation of Jesus as the Saviour was understood, and he accepted the proffered deliverance with a glad heart.

MRS. CHANTREY'S SECRET.

A Serial Story.

THE RECTORY.

So quiet is the small market town of Upton, that it is difficult to believe in the stir and din of a great city which is little more than an hour's journey from it. It is the terminus of the single line of rails, branching off from the main line eight miles away, and along it three trains only travel each way daily. The sleepy streets have old-fashioned houses straggling along each side, with trees growing among them; and here and there, down the roads leading into the country, which are half street, half lane, green plots of daisied grass are still to be found, where there were once open fields that have left a little legacy to the birds and children of coming generations.

Half the houses are still largely built of wood from the forest of olden times that has now disappeared; and ancient bow-windows jut out over the side causeways. Some of the old exclusive mansions continue to boast in a breastwork of stone pillars linked together by chains of iron, intended as a defence against impertinent intruders, but more often serving as safe swinging places for the young children sent to play in the streets. Perhaps of all times of the year the little town looks its best on a sunny autumn morning, with its fine film of mist, when the chestnut leaves are golden, and slender threads of gossamer are floating in the air, and heavy dews, white as the hoar-frost, glisten in the sunshine. But at any season Upton seems a tranquil, peaceful, out-of-the-world spot, having no connection with busier and more wretched places.

There were not many real gentry, as the townsfolk called them, living near. A few retired tradesmen and clerks, weary of the great city, and finding rents and living cheaper at Upton, had settled in trim villas, built beyond the boundaries of the town. But for the most part the population consisted of substantial tradespeople and professional men, whose families had been represented there for several generations. As usual, the society was broken up into very small cliques; no one household feeling itself exactly on the same social equality as another; even as far down as the laundresses and charwomen, who could tell whose husband or son had been before the justices, and which families had escaped that disgrace.

The nearest approach to that equality and fraternity of which we all hear so much and see so little, was unfortunately to be found in the bar-parlor and billiard-room of the Upton Arms; but even this was lost as soon as the threshold was recrossed, and the boon-companions of the interior breathed the air of the outer world. There were several religious sects of considerable strength, and of very decided antagonistic views; any one of whose members was always ready to give the reason of the special creed that was in him. So, what with a variety of domestic circumstances, and a diversity of religious opinions, it is not to be wondered at that the society of Upton was broken up into very small circles indeed.

There was one point, however, on which all the townspeople were united. There could be no doubt whatever as to the beauty of the old Norman church, lying just beyond the eastern boundary of the town; not mingling with its business, but standing in a solemn quiet of its own, as if to guard the repose of the sleepers under its shadow. The churchyard too, was beautiful, with its grand and dusky old yew-trees, spreading their broad-sweeping branches like cedars, and with many a bright colored flower-bed lying among the dark green of the graves. The townspeople loved to stroll down to it in the twilight, with half-stirred idle thoughts of better things soothing away the worries and cares of the day.

A narrow meadow of glebe-land separated the churchyard from the Rectory garden, a bank of flowers and turf sloping up to the house. Nowhere could a more pleasant, home-like dwelling be found, lightly covered with sweet-scented creeping plants, which climbed up to the highest gable, and flung down long sprays of blossom-laden branches to toss to and fro in the air. Many a weary, bedinned citizen had felt heart-sick at the sight of its tranquillity and peace.

The people of Upton, great and small, conformist or nonconformist, were proud of their rector. It was no unusual sight for a dozen or more carriages from a distance to be seen waiting at the church door for the close of the service, not only on a Sunday morning, when custom demands the observance, but even in the afternoon, when public worship is usually left to servant-maids. There was not a seat to be had for love or money, either by gentle or simple, after the reading of the Psalms had begun.

The Dissenters themselves were accustomed to attend church occasionally, with a half-guilty sense, not altogether unpleasant, of acting against their principles. But then the rector was always or friendly terms with them; and made no distinction, in distributing Christmas charities, between the poor old folks who went to church or to chapel, or, as it was said regretfully, to no place at all. He had his failings; but the one point on which all Upton agreed was, that their church and rector were the best between that town and the metropolis.

It was a hard struggle with David Chantrey, this beloved rector of Upton, to resolve upon leaving his parish, though only for a time, when his physicians strenuously urged him to spend two winters, and the intervening summer in Madeira. Very definitely they assured him that such an absence was his only chance of assuring a fair share of the ordinary term of human life. But it was a difficult thing to do, apart from the hardness of the struggle; and the difficulty just verged upon an impossibility. The living was not a rich one, its whole income being a little under two thousand dollars a year. Now, when he had provided a salary for the curate who must take his duty, and decided upon the smallest sum necessary for his own expenses, the remainder, in whatever way the sum was worked, was clearly quite insufficient for the maintenance of his young wife and child. They could not go with him; that was impossible. But how were they to live while he was away? No doubt, if his difficulty had been known, there were many wealthy people among his friends who would gladly have removed it; but not one of them even guessed at it. Was not Mrs. Bolton, the widow of the late archdeacon, and the richest woman in Upton, own aunt to the rector, David Chantrey?

Next to Mr. Chantrey himself, Mrs. Bolton was the most eminent personage in Upton. She had settled there upon the archdeacon's death, which happened immediately after he had obtained the living for his wife's favorite nephew. For some years she had been the only lady connected with the rector, and had acted as his female representative. There was neither mansion nor cottage which she had not visited. The high were her associates; the low her protégés, for whose souls she labored. She was at the head of all charitable agencies and benevolent societies. Nothing could be set on foot in Upton under any other patronage. She was active, untiring, and not very susceptible. So early and so completely had she obtained the little sovereignty she had assumed, that when the rightful queen came there was no room for her. The rector's wife was only known as a pretty and pleasant-spoken young lady, who left all the parish affairs in Mrs. Bolton's hands.

It is not to be wondered at, then, that no one guessed at David Chantrey's difficulty, though everybody knew the exact amount of his income. Neither he nor his wife hinted at it. Sophy Chantrey would have freely given the world, had it been hers, to accompany her husband; but there was no chance of that. A friend was going out on the same doleful search for health; and the two were to take charge of each other. But how to live at all while David was away? She urged that she could manage very well on a small sum a year, if she and her boy went to some cheap lodgings in a strange neighborhood, where nobody knew them; but her husband would not listen to such a plan. The worry and fret of his brain had grown almost to fever-height, when his aunt made a proposal, which he accepted in impatient haste. This was that Sophy should make her home at Bolton Villa for the full time of his absence; on condition that Charlie a boy of seven years old, full of life and spirits, should be sent to school for the same term.

Sophy rebelled for a lit tle while, but in vain. In thinking of the eighteen long and dreary months her husband would be away, she had counted upon having the conso lation of her child's companionship. But no other scheme presented itself; and she felt the sacrifice must be made for David's sake. A suitable school was found for Charlie; and he was placed in it a day or two before she had to journey down to the port from which the ship sailed with her husband. No soul on deck that day was more sorrowful than hers. David's hollow cheeks, and thin, stooping frame, and the feeble hand that clasped hers till the last moment, made the hope of ever seeing him again seem a mad folly. Her sick heart refused to be comforted. He was sanguine, and spoke almost gayly of his return; but she was filled with anguish. A strong persuasion seized upon her that she should see his face no more; and when the bitter moment of parting was over, she travelled back alone, heart-stricken and crushed in spirit, to her new home under Mrs. Bolton's roof.

Bolton Villa was not more than a stone's throw from the rectory and the church. Sophy could hear the same shrieks of the martins wheeling about the tower, and the same wintry chant of the robins amid the ivy creeping up it. The familiar striking of the church clock and the chime of the bells rang alike through the windows of both houses. But there was no sound of her husband's voice and no merry shout of Charlie's, and the difference was appalling to her. She could not endure it.

Mrs. Bolton was exceedingly proud of her villa. It had been bought expressly to please her by the late archdeacon, and altered under her own superintendence. Her tastes and wishes had been studied throughout. The interior was something like a diary of her life.

The broad oak staircase was decorated with flags and banners from all the countries she had travelled through; souvenirs labelled with the names of every town she had visited, and the date of that event, lay scattered about. The entrance-hall, darkened by the heavy banners on the staircase, was a museum of curiosities collected by herself. The corners and niches were filled with plaster casts of famous statuary, which were supposed to look as fine as their marble originals in the gloom surrounding them. Every room was crowded with ornaments and knick-knacks, all of which had some association with herself.

Even those apartments not seen by guests were no less encumbered with mementoes that had been discarded from time to time in favor of newer treasures. Mrs. Bolton never dared to change her servants, and it cannot be wondered at, that while offering a home to her nephew's wife, she could not extend her invitation to a mischievous boy of seven.

But however interesting Bolton Villa might be to its mistress, it was not altogether a home favorable for the recovery of a bowed-down spirit, though Mrs. Bolton could not understand why Sophy, surrounded with so many blessings and with so much to be thankful for, should fall into a low, nervous fever shortly after she had parted with her husband and child.

The house was quiet, fearfully quiet to Sophy. There was a depressing hush about it altogether different from the cheerful tranquillity of her own home. Very few visitors broke through its monotony, for Mrs. Bolton's social pinnacle was too high above her immediate neighbors for them to climb up to it; while those whose station was somewhat on a level with hers lived too far away, or were too young and frivolous for friendly intercourse. There were formal dinner-parties at stated intervals, and occasionally a neighboring clergyman to be entertained. But these came few and far between, and Sophy Chantrey found herself very much alone amid the banners and souvenirs that banished her boy from the house.

Mrs. Bolton herself was very often away. There was always something to be done in the parish which should by right have been Sophy's work, but her aunt had always discouraged any interference and David had been quite content to keep her to himself, as there was so able a substitute for her in the ordinary duties of a clergyman's wife. She had made but few acquaintances, and it was generally understood that Mrs. Chantrey was quite a cipher. No one ever expected her to become prominent in Upton.

About half-way down the High Street of Upton stood a small old-fashioned saddler's shop, the door of which was divided across the middle, so as to form two parts, the upper one always thrown open. Above the doorway, under a low-gabled roof, hung a cracked and mouldering sign-board, bearing the words "Ann Holland, Saddler." All the letters were faded, yet a keen eye might detect that the name "Ann" was more distinct than the others, as if painted at a later date.

Within the shop an old journeyman was always to be seen, busy at his trade, and taking no heed of any customer coming in, unless the ringing of a bell on the lower half of the door remained unnoticed, when he would shamble away to call his mistress. In an evening after the twilight had set in, and it was too dark for her own ornamental stitching of the saddlery, Ann Holland was often to be found leaning over the half-door of her shop, and ready to exchange a friendly good-night, or a more lengthy conversation, with her townsfolk as they passed to and fro. She was a rosy, cheery-looking woman, still under fifty, with a pleasant voice and a friendly word for every one, and it was well known that she had refused several offers of marriage, some of them very eligible for a person of her station.

There was not one of the townspeople she had not known from their earliest appearance in Upton, and she had the pedigree of all the families, high and low, at her finger-ends. New-comers she could only tolerate until they had lived respectably and paid their debts punctually for a good number of years. She had a kindly love of gossip, a simple real interest in the fortunes of all about her. There was little else for her to think of, for books and newspapers came seldom in her way, and were often far above her comprehension when they did. Upton news that would bring tears to her eyes or a laugh to her lips was the food her mind lived upon. Ann Holland was almost as general a favorite as the rector himself.

ISRAEL DEFEATED AT AI.

S. S. Lesson for July 22, Joshua 7 : 6-26. Golden Text, Isa. 59 : 12. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Bright Prospect—A Contrary Current—Joshua's Reconnoissance—The Lord not Consulted—Misplaced Confidence—Inevitable Defeat—Unsuccessful Warfare of the Church—Accursed Relics of Jericho—Joshua's Recourse to Prayer—Unblessed Secrecy—An Investigation Ordered—Achan's Detection—Robbing God—How Committed Now—Execution without Mercy—The Church's Normal Condition.

THE preceding chapter concludes, "So the Lord was with Joshua; and his fame was noised throughout all the country." To all appearance nothing but victory lay before the children of Israel; their enemies had lost heart; their leader, Joshua, had proved that God was with him as He had been with Moses; one of the mightiest cities of Canaan lay a heap of ashes and ruins behind them, and above all they had the promise of God that the unconquered land was given to them already (ch. 1 : 3), and that no man should be able to stand before them (Deut. 7 : 24); how then could they fail to conquer? O how grievous is the history, "That the children of Israel committed a trespass in the accursed thing." One man had sinned through covetousness, but the consequences of that sin touched the whole people.

A contrary current seems to have set in, carrying all before it, and Joshua himself was affected by it. Without any reference to the "Captain of the host of the Lord," he sent men from Jericho to Ai, saying, "Go up and view the country." He would have done better to trust to the eyes of the Lord which "run to and fro throughout the whole earth, to show Himself strong in the behalf of them whose heart is perfect toward Him" (II Chron. 16 : 9). They went, viewed the city, and gave their counsel just after the manner of men, quite forgetting that the Lord was their Commander, and that were quite out in warfare which He conducted. They said, "Let not all the people go up; but let about two or three thousand men go up and smite Ai; and make not all the people to labor thither, for they are but few." How strange it seems that Joshua did not ask the Lord! "So there went up thither of the people about three thousand men; and they fled before the men of Ai." Had they been thirty thousand, it would have been the same, going up as they did in their own will, and in their own strength. Thirty-six men of those whom the Lord had declared invincible were smitten, "wherefore the hearts of the people melted and became as water." The Word of God had declared that if they walked in His statutes, and kept His commandments to do them, they should chase their enemies; but if they would not hearken to Him to do His commandments then they should be slain before their enemies (Lev. 26 : 3, 7, 8, 14, 17; Deut. 28 : 25).

God never slurs over or ignores sin in His children; wherever it is committed there is no real victory until it is confessed and put away. And it becomes us to inquire in face of the very little victory over the world which the Church of God has gained to this day, which are hindering the conversion and sanctification of thousands of immortal souls? God had forbidden His people to appropriate any of the spoil of Jericho, and because the curse of God was upon the city all which belonged to it was under the curse, condemned to destruction. God gave Jericho into the hands of His people with the command that everything within the city should be destroyed, and the indestructible things, silver, gold, brass, and iron brought into the treasury of the house of the Lord. Christ died for us with the object "that they which lived should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto Him which died for them and rose again" (2 Cor. 5 : 15). Self-indulgence whether in the form of intoxicating drinks, smoking, pleasure-seeking, novel-reading, sight-seeing, dress, amusements, gossip or luxurious eating, is an accursed thing in the Church of God. Self-conceit which engenders pride, envy, strife, touchiness, and evil temper, is an accursed thing in Christians, even self-effort, whether to save one's self or to sanctify one's self; or self-effort in prayer, or praise, or in winning souls; or again self-condemnation which comes from being occupied with self, it is all an accursed thing, and hinders both our own progress and that of others. They are discouraged by being unable for such efforts, which they often see better than those who make them, how unavailing they are. Self out of the way, the temptations of Satan may fall like seed but find no soil in which they can spring into life—produce sin. When we really deny or ignore ourselves, i.e., put ourselves out of the question—cease to consider ourselves, God's blessed work in us, and by us is unhindered.

WHAT ARE THE ACCURSED THINGS

Joshua was broken-hearted; could God reverse his promise? impossible! But this man of God did not lose time in talking with the elders and speculating with them as to the cause of their defeat,

HE WENT DIRECT TO GOD.

"Joshua rent his clothes and fell to the earth upon his face before the ark of the Lord until the eventide, he and the elders of Israel, and put dust upon their heads." How often, when there is deadness in a church or a mission, the members meet together and talk about it; either the preacher is wrong, or the members as a whole do not support him, or the public do not appreciate the work, and they are to blame, or somebody else's work comes in the way; and all this consultation does not set the wrong thing right. When we get down before the Lord, quite willing to be the first to bear the blame, He takes the matter in hand, and lovingly and tenderly shows us where we are wrong, and how to get right again.

Joshua could not bear that Israel should turn their backs before their enemies, this was not in order, this was not what God had led him to expect, and he ended his touching prayer, "What wilt Thou do unto Thy great name?" God gave him an answer. He said, "Get thee up; wherefore liest thou thus upon thy face? Israel hath sinned, and they have also transgressed My covenant which I had commanded them: for they have even taken of the accursed thing, and have also stolen, and dissembled also, and they have put it even among their own stuff."

Is not this the history of many a one who gets wrong in his or her soul? There is some attractive snare, strong drink, or morphia, or it may be the receiving of forbidden letters, or interviews, or it may be secret sin, things on which the blessing of God cannot be asked, and which cannot bear the light. This is the history of each such transaction, "they have even taken of the accursed thing, and have stolen (if not from man, yet from God) and dissembled also, and have put it even among their own stuff. The blessing of God never rests on things which are done in secret, he that doeth truth cometh to the light that his deeds may be made manifest that they are wrought in God" (John 3 : 21). If a wife has to close up a book hastily when her husband comes into the room, there is something of the accursed thing there. When brandy, ordered at a grocer's has to be written down "tea," or morphia from a chemist entered in the bill as "Sedlitz Powders," the curse of God is on such transactions.

With unmistakable clearness He declared to Joshua that He would be with them no more except they destroyed the accursed from among them. Then He commanded that the people should sanctify themselves, and that these solemn words should be pronounced, "Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, There is an accursed thing in the midst of thee, O Israel: thou canst not stand before thine enemies, until ye take away the accursed thing from among you;" and then followed the command for tribe by tribe, family by family, household by household, man by man. Often when anything goes wrong in our Christian work there is an investigation made, and at the end there is as much uncertainty as at the beginning; but here there was no chance to escape. God was the Investigator, and He found out the criminal, Achan was taken. His doom had been pronounced beforehand, he was to be burned with fire, because he had wrought folly in Israel. It must have been an awful moment; every instant his doom was hastening. Joshua said unto him, "My son, give, I pray thee, glory to the Lord God of Israel, and make confession unto Him; and tell me now what thou hast done; hide it not from me." The poor unhappy culprit pleaded "guilty," and said, "Indeed, I have sinned against the Lord God of Israel, and thus and thus have I done." And then came the sad confession.

Achan had heard the charge of the Lord through Joshua, "And ye in any wise keep yourselves from the accursed thing lest ye make yourselves accursed, when ye take of the accursed thing, and make the camp of Israel a curse and trouble it." And his sin was a double one, not only had he retained for himself that which God had devoted to destruction and thus brought the curse upon himself, and upon all Israel, but he had been guilty of sacrilege in appropriating to his own use the silver and the gold which, after being purified by fire, was to be brought into the treasury of the Lord. Achan was

ROBBING GOD.

Is this sin never committed in our own days? When one man seeks to appropriate to his own purposes the spiritual gifts of another seeks to make some mission work succeed by getting some one who has more of the Holy Spirit than himself, not for the sake of the souls, not under a burden from the Lord that such an instrument was chosen of Him, but simply in order that the work may not be behind some one else's work, may answer as well financially and have as good a name, surely surely this is the sin of Achan. When any one enjoys the spiritual influence of one who lives near to God and suns himself in it, just sucking the honey second hand, with no idea of living out that life of which he sees the possibilities, no idea of any close dealing with God, then he is robbing God.

Only judgment could follow Achan's sin, the law has no mercy. Led out in mournful procession with all his family (partakers no doubt in his sin) and even his innocent cattle, and the tent in which he had lived, "Joshua said, Why hast thou troubled us? The Lord shall trouble thee this day. And all Israel stoned them with stones, and burned them with fire after they had stoned them with stones. And they raised over him a great heap of stones unto this day. So the Lord turned from the fierceness of His anger." O how blessed is it in this day of salvation that "if we confess our sins He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness" (1 John 1 : 9). Thank God when sin is really turned from it can be put away for the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth from all sin. Thank God the execution of every believer is already accomplished crucified with Christ and buried with Christ, but he must abide in Him by real, continuous, practical faith. O why should a church continue in an unsatisfactory condition, why not bring it to God that the accursed thing which hinders progress may be discovered and put away? Why should any individual who has got wrong remain so? Bless God He is ready to undertake any case and every case, and He is waiting to be gracious. The normal state of the Church is victory, the normal state of God's children is victory. Lord bring us to our normal state.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Deaths from Cholera in Egypt Averaged more than a hundred a day in Damietta alone, beside those at Mansourah and other places. Nearly all the European nations have established a strict quarantine. The Official Gazette of Berlin announces that at a sanitary conference, over which Herr von Boetticher, the Secretary of the Imperial Office of the Interior, presided, it was decided to prevent persons liable to carry infection from coming to Germany from Egypt, and to establish a medical control over vessels arriving in Germany from ports where the existence of cholera is suspected. The latest reports indicate that the state of affairs is slightly worse at Damietta but improving at Mansourah. The Nile is rising well, which it is expected will cut short the epidemic in some districts. The Russian Government has ordered the establishment of rigid quarantine on the Black Sea to prevent the introduction of cholera by vessels coming from Egypt, and has forbidden the usual pilgrimage to Mecca.

A Terrible Steamship Disaster Occurred During the launch of a steamship near Glasgow on July 3d. The vessel to which the disaster happened was the steamer Daphne. While she was being launched she fell over on her side, precipitating a number of people into the water. Sixty persons were at first said to be drowned. The steamer left the ways at a very fast rate, and when she gained the water she rolled from side to side. Her machinery, which was already on board, caused the stern of the vessel, which entered the water first, to sink below the safety line, and the water rushed into her port holes. The persons on board, fearing that she would capsize, ran to and fro. The vessel finally reeled over and turned keel uppermost. Those who had maintained their positions on the portion of the steamer not submerged did their utmost to save those who were cast overboard. At the same time boats hastily pulled to the scene to assist in the work of rescuing the unfortunate people and succeeded in saving quite a number of them. It was known, however, that there were fifty persons below in the Daphne when the vessel went over, and these must have all been drowned. A diver states that the companionway of the Daphne is blocked up by a solid mass of bodies, one upon another. It appears that the men who were at work below when the ship went over rushed from their work and became jammed in the passageway. Some of the bodies still have tools in their hands. It is intended to raise a fund for the benefit of the bereaved families. Queen Victoria has telegraphed to the Mayor of Glasgow, requesting him to inform the widows and children that they have her sympathy.

The Count of Chambord, the Last Descendant of the long line of kings of the House of Bourbon, which ruled France for so many years, was taken seriously ill on June 27th. During several days his death was momentarily expected, but at the close of last week he was still living, and was indeed somewhat better than at its commencement. The count is a very estimable gentleman, who enjoys personally the respect of Europe, and is liked even by those who would be most sincerely sorry to see him placed on the throne of his ancestors. He is sixty-three years of age, and has no children, so that with him the famous family becomes extinct in the direct line. The believers in the divine right of kings have always regarded him as the rightful King of France, and addressed him as Henri V. The revolution of 1830, which drove his grandfather, Charles X., from the throne of France, placed his own life in danger, and he, a boy of ten years old, was carried for safety to England, where he remained during the existence of the Empire. After the fall of Napoleon III. the Legitimists were anxious to restore their king, and the count returned to France. In the disturbed condition of the country it would have been easy to place him on the throne, for his followers were enthusiastic and loyal, while their opponents were divided and dispirited; but with the obstinacy and stupidity of his race he issued a manifesto declaring on what terms alone he would consent to confer on France the privilege of being governed by him. One of his stipulations was that the tricolor flag, which to Frenchmen is the symbol of glory, should be discarded in favor of the white banner of the Bourbons. That stipulation destroyed his chances, for it proved that he was no better than his ancestors, whose arrogance and pride had overwhelmed France in disaster. He is now supposed to be dying at his private house at Frohsdorf. At his death the Count of Paris, one of the Orleanists, will be the leader of the Monarchists and the chief pretender to the throne; but the Bonapartists predict that Jerome Napoleon will issue a manifesto, which will render him a more popular aspirant than the Orleanist prince.

Disastrous Floods are Reported from India. A dispatch from Calcutta says that heavy floods have prevailed in the district of Surat, India, causing great damage to property and some loss of life. Five hundred houses have fallen at Surat. Many villages have been destroyed by the floods, and thousands of people are homeless. A later telegram states that the floods are now subsiding, but traffic on the railways is interrupted.

Another Irish Assassination Society has been discovered, in which the payments for outrage were contingent on the sacrifice of life. Four men were convicted at Sligo on July 7th, who belonged to the organization. Evidence was given that the prisoners and a number of other persons, who were obeying the orders of a secret society, attempted, in March, 1882, to blow up the Weston House at Galway with dynamite. If they had succeeded in destroying the house and killing the inmates there were to have received £500. If they failed to take any life they were to have received only £200 or £300. Five pounds of dynamite were exploded on the window sill of the house. Little damage was done, owing to lack of skill on the part of the conspirators.

Peter Carey, the Irish Informer, who Planned and directed the murders of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke, has left Dublin. The evidence he gave at the recent trials was chiefly the means of bringing his instruments to justice, but it has so exasperated his countrymen against him that it was not deemed safe to permit him to leave the prison in which he was confined. His house in Dublin was completely coated with the mud flung at it in contempt by Carey's late friends. The British Government have refused to reward Carey for his evidence with either a pardon or with money. On July 2d, after nightfall, a detective called upon him at Kilmainham Jail with an order for his delivery, and drove with him in a hack into the city. Having been given the alternative of being turned unprotected into the streets or a passage to London, and thence to any colony he might select, he accepted the latter. His family had already gone to London separately in order to avoid suspicion. It is believed that unless he has so altered his appearance as that his most intimate friends will not know him, he will be murdered very soon wherever he may go.

A Manifesto from the Nihilists of Russia has been issued. It is generally regarded as a demonstration of the weakness and decadence of the order, and as proving by its diction and style that the ablest of the Nihilistic leaders are either dead or in exile. It speaks of the determination of the revolutionists to carry on the fight for "Land and Liberty," but acknowledges that they are suffering from the loss of their best leaders, and sorely distressed for means, which all "fellow citizens" are earnestly exhorted to furnish without delay. It admits that the murder of Alexander II. was not received by the country at large in the way that the assassins desired, but attributes this fact to malicious reports spread by government agents among the people to the effect that this terrible deed was the work of landed proprietors seeking to avenge their spoliation in favor of the peasants. The appeal contains no definite programme of future action, nor, generally speaking, any but vague references to the past. The last words of this Nihilist manifesto are: "The party will continue to pursue arbitrary power into its last hiding places, and your part, fellow citizens, is to furnish the necessary sinews of war; so let us be allies!"

The Election of Mr. Healy, Mr. Parnell's private secretary, as Member of Parliament for Monaghan County, is announced. Mr. Healy resigned his seat in Parliament to contest the election for a new constituency, because the Parnellites believed that he alone could carry Monaghan County in the Parnell interest, while any Parnellite could be elected to succeed Mr. Healy. There was great confusion during the counting of the votes. After the official announcement that Mr. Healy was elected by a majority of 350, the new member addressed a large crowd of people, by whom he was received with great enthusiasm. He said that landlordism had been trampled under foot, and that the election represented the popular demand for speedy reform in the land laws. He had little doubt that before many years every farmer in Ireland would be the owner of his holding. Mr. Healy said that the victory of the Parnell party would lead to a reopening of the land question and other great reforms, and his hearers would see the day when Irishmen would make laws on their native soil. It is stated that the conservative candidate will forthwith lodge a petition against the seating of Mr. Healy on the ground of serious informalities.

A Generous Proposal has been Made by an English gentleman, Mr. Richard Barlow-Kennett, who has been impressed by the astonishing results in England and Scotland of the Blue Ribbon Gospel Meetings. These meetings are conducted by the Blue Ribbon Gospel Army, and have been the means of rescuing large numbers of the most depraved and degraded outcasts of society from their sins. The success of the army in this work has been remarkable, but it is not difficult to explain. The leading principle of the army is reliance on the power of the Saviour to deliver the victim of Satan from any chains the great enemy of souls has laid on him, whether they are drunkenness, sensuality or any other vice. Acting on that principle of treatment the cases of reformation, marvellous as they are both in number and character, were to be expected. Hitherto the expenses of the army, aggregating over five hundred dollars a week, have been born by the Rev. M. Baxter, the President of the Army. Mr. Barlow-Kennett now urges that the good work shall be extended, and to that end is giving $1250 conditionally on the sum of $5000 being raised by other Christian people. As the converts are chiefly the poorest of the poor, they cannot contribute toward the support of the army; but Christians anxious for the spread of the Gospel among the classes who so sorely need its blessings, will doubtless be ready to aid so excellent a work. Should any of our readers desire to contribute they may send to this office, and their gifts will be forwarded to Mr. Baxter.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

Victoria Hall, Sunderland, Eng.—Scene of the Calamity of June 16—The Mayor of the Town and the Janitor of the Hall.

THE HECATOMB OF CHILDREN.

THE appalling disaster at Sunderland, England, in which about two hundred children lost their lives, was briefly described in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of June 21st. On the first page this week is a picture of the building in which the calamity occurred, with portraits of the mayor of the town and the janitor of the hall, the latter of whom was foremost in the work of rescue, and succeeded in saving the lives of many of the little sufferers.

An entertainment for children to be given on June 16th at Sunderland was announced by the Fay family, who were performing during the season at the Aquarium of the neighboring town of Tynemouth. The entertainment was to include conjuring tricks, ventriloquism, etc., and Mr. Fay visited most of the schools in Sunderland with the object of securing patronage for the entertainment. The charge for admission of children was fixed as low as two cents, so as to give even the humblest in the schools a chance of attending. The result was a very large attendance in the cheap portions of the hall. The gallery was crowded, not less than 1170 children being there. There were about a score of mothers in the gallery who had come with their children, but practically the vast number of little ones were left to themselves with no supervision whatever.

The entertainment proceeded smoothly and satisfactorily till just after five o'clock, when it was about to close. Mr. Fay had promised to make a distribution of toys to the young people, and when the distribution commenced there was great excitement among the children, both in the body of the hall and the gallery. It is stated that Mr. Fay began to scatter prizes to the youngsters in the body of the hall. Some of the children in the gallery rose from their seats and hurried to the door to obtain their prizes. They were followed by others, and in a few seconds a stream of children was running downstairs. The way to the gallery begins at the left side of the house with a flight of stairs; then there is a landing; then fifteen more steps; then another passage; and finally twenty-three steps which reach the gallery level on the other side of the hall.

About the middle of the first landing there is a strongly constructed swinging door, about five feet wide, with a bolt which can be let down into a hole in the floor, so as to keep it ajar to the extent of twenty-two inches. The object of this arrangement is, of course, to prevent more than one person from passing the ticket-taker at once. This door by some means or another became bolted. Some of the surviving children state that the man who was giving away the prizes shot the bolt, but he swore at the inquest that he did not even know that there was a bolt on the door. He thought that it must have slipped accidentally during the crush. Whether any of the children, when they reached this door, got through it, is not known. The place soon became impassable, and while it was so the children, eight or nine hundred strong, came bearing down from the gallery behind them. There was no panic, no alarm, no shout of "Fire!" or "Thieves!" it was simply a rush down to gain the desired presents. The door prevented the egress of any of the children, and the hundreds coming fast from the corridors set up a block on the small landing between the door and the flight of fifteen steps.

Within four yards of this spot there was absolute safety, and hundreds of children stood there in comfort; but the small open space intervening between the stairs and the walls and door was a veritable shambles. Children were tumbled head over heels, one on the top of the other. Shrieks and screams vibrated through the staircases. More still pressed down from above. The children at the bottom of the stairs got packed as it were in a well. The heap of writhing and rolling humanity became higher and higher, until it rose above the heads of those who were first jammed in the doorway, and became a mass upward of six feet in height. The fearful struggle in which the children pulled and tore for bare life was all within a space of about twelve feet square.

The scene was one never to be forgotten by any one who witnessed it. Between the bolted door and the wall was an aperture of about two feet, but it was completely choked by the bodies of the fallen little ones. Girls and boys, children of three years and children of ten and fourteen were huddled together in one seething, surging mass of suffocating humanity—fighting for air, for dear life—tearing the clothes off one another in their frantic struggles; screaming, groaning, pitifully sobbing; until that narrow staircase and that small landing were packed tight with childish corpses. Over one hundred and eighty little victims perished miserably before help could arrive. Many were extricated, especially those nearest the top of the stairs, just in time to save their lives, but of these a great number received severe injuries.

DR. BEATTIE, AN EYE-WITNESS of the ruin wrought by the disaster, rushed through the door leading from the dress-circle to the steps down which the children were still pouring, and saw numbers heaped up in a compact mass on the landing below. He at once commenced to pull the children who were rolling on the top of the mass out of danger. The light, however, was dim, and it was some little time before he could see properly the full extent of the catastrophe. He then saw Dr. Lambert and Dr. Waterston also engaged in extricating the children. The mass of bodies was so compacted and interlocked that the rescuers had to use great exertion to drag the children from out the press, and extreme care had to be taken in rescuing them lest their limbs should be torn off in the struggle.

Some of the little children lifted up appealing, terror-stricken faces, and cried, "O please take me next? Do take me!" And when one was raised up, others clung to him or her and entreated to be dragged out also. The doctors, with other helpers, labored with tireless energy, and as the children were pulled out they were passed on from one gentleman to another, and removed into the dress circle and area, where the dead were laid out. The living were carried to the corridors for the fresh air to revive them. Almost all the medical men in the town were quickly at the scene of death and suffering and did all they could to alleviate the agonies of the injured. In spite of their efforts, however, the number of deaths on the spot numbered 182 and since the fatal night at least twenty more have died from the injuries they received.

PATHETIC INCIDENTS,

some of them almost too heartrending for words, are recorded as having occurred, as they must occur in plenty at such a terrible time. Shortly after it became known that a terrible calamity had occurred at the Victoria Hall, a little girl, quite a child in appearance, was met proceeding along a street carrying a dead infant in her arms. A gentleman who witnessed the melancholy sight took compassion on the girl, and at once secured a cab and sent her home in it. Some children who had been delayed in their homecoming by the disaster, on being questioned as to what had kept them so long, replied, quite innocently, "Oh Ma! we fell fast asleep on the stairs." The case of a family in Monkwearmouth was most pitiable. Two of the children had been permitted to go to the Victoria Hall, but shortly after learning the news of the dreadful calamity the parents were consoled with a message to the effect that their dear ones were quite safe. The thankful parents had just regained their composure, and began to thank God for the great mercy that had been vouchsafed to them, when a cab drove up to the door. The parents gladly went out to receive, as they thought, their offspring. They did so; but the children were cold in death. The poor father and mother became quite frantic at the awful sight that met their eyes.

A man was seen emerging from the Victoria Hall with a little girl in his arms. The child's long hair floated over her shoulders, and her pallid face was carved in the rigor of death. As the tears rolled down the cheeks of the father like rain he kissed the cold face of his child over and over again, and bewailed his bereavement in tones that went to the hearts of the bystanders. A couple living in Monkwearmouth had a fine boy, aged about ten, among the dead. He was their only son, and his mother fairly doated on him. The father gets inebriated very often, and on these occasions the boy would kiss and fondle his mother, and exclaim, "Wait till I get to be a big man, mother, and then I will take you away from father." As a man, living in Hendon, was conveying his boy home the little fellow died in his arms on the way.

THE VICTORIA HALL

a picture of which appears on the first page, was erected nearly twelve years ago. A fair idea of its imposing elevation and of its internal arrangements may be obtained from our frontispiece picture.

It seats about 3000 persons, and when crowded has often held over 3500. The gallery, which will seat 1500 people, is reached by broad flights of steps, 7 feet wide, broken by passages or gangways; at the foot of the first flight from the top is the pay-wicket, but this had been removed prior to the close of the performance on June 16th.

A fund has been raised to erect some suitable memorial of the calamity. The Bishop of Durham in sending a contribution worth a hundred dollars to the fund, said, "I trust that the calamity may through this memorial result in some institution of public usefulness. It will be some comfort to mourning parents to know that their personal sorrow has been the price paid for a permanent good to the town and neighborhood." Other subscriptions, some of large sums have been given to the fund which amounts to $15,000. Queen Victoria sent $250 and a big wreath of flowers three feet in diameter. A card was inclosed bearing the following inscription: "A mark of deep sympathy from Queen Victoria. 'Suffer little children to come unto Me, for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven.'"

MAYOR WAYMAN.

MR. J. W. WAYMAN, the Mayor of Sunderland, and Mrs. Wayman have, since the terrible calamity been most assiduous in visiting the bereaved homes, and administering both material aid and spiritual comfort to the distressed parents and relatives, thus furnishing fresh proof, were such at all necessary, that in the midst of municipal and social distinctions, they are not unmindful of the sorrows of the poor and of their Master's injunction to care for them.

Mr. Wayman is about fifty years of age. He had the advantage of a pre-eminently godly parentage, and frequently has he been heard speak in terms of most filial esteem and endearment of his mother, whose influence upon him for good lives not only as a memory, but abides with him as a constraining and beneficial power. From a very early age he was habituated to the house and worship of God, and grew up in an atmosphere of goodness, made bright by the perpetual sunshine of the religion of Christ. It was not a matter of surprise, therefore, that he gave his heart to the Saviour while he was still a youth, and he has since maintained a most honorable profession as a consistent and generous member of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, whose interests he has at heart, and whose extension among the masses of the people he seeks by all legitimate means, to secure.

HIS POPULARITY AS A SPEAKER.

Mr. Wayman is known in the locality as an intelligent, and evangelical local preacher. His services are sought frequently for Sunday-school anniversaries, annual meetings of churches, and especially at the laying of foundation-stones of new Wesleyan chapels. He owns a collection of silver trowels presented to him at such ceremonies, perhaps more numerous and costly than any other man in Great Britain. His praise is in all the churches of his own faith and order.

His catholicity is proverbial. His genial face is frequently seen in gatherings of other evangelical denominations, where his eloquence and unfailing good humor render him welcome. To poor ministers of Christ, Wesleyan Methodist or otherwise, he is a stanch friend, aiding them in cases of extremity both by his counsel and his purse. His residence, the Red House, at Hendon, is known far and wide as an agreeable rendezvous for ministers, and admirable as he ever is elsewhere, it is under his own roof that Mr. Wayman is always seen to best advantage.

JANITOR GRAHAM.

F. GRAHAM, the janitor of the Victoria Hall, whose portrait also appears on the first page was the first person to arrive on the scene of the calamity on the fatal night. He heard the cries of the children and running to the scene was horrified by what he saw. He immediately set to work to stem the torrent of those still descending from the upper corridors and opened another door to divert the current. Then he commenced lifting the fallen, and as by that time several gentlemen had come to his assistance he was able to remain by the heap of quivering flesh and blood and as he lifted the living and the dead they were carried away to the rooms in which the surgeons were at work.

His own account of his effort was given at the coroner's inquest. He said: "I worked along by the stair-rail and the men following me were taking the children as I handed them out. I knelt down twice and tried to pull up the bolt, but, though I used my utmost exertions, and was assisted by the policeman, who shook the door, I was unable to get it out. It would be about an hour before the children were entirely cleared out. I was so fatigued I had to leave for a few minutes to get breath. Some men brought me a drink, and I crushed in again. They asked me to come out, as I was almost fainting, but I stuck to it until they were all out. The bolt was bent with the crush. I could have pulled it up but for that, I think. The bolt might have slipped in with the door moving backward and forward. I afterward found a box, which the presents were likely to be in, lying outside the door where the crush was. My opinion is that the man put the bolt in to keep the children back."

Mr. Graham is well known and highly respected in the locality for his uniform courtesy and frank, obliging disposition. He has for many years been closely identified with the temperance movement, and is now a strenuous advocate of Blue Ribbonism, and an unassuming but most intelligent Christian man.

JOE JASPER'S TROUBLES, AND HOW HE MET THEM.

By Rev. Charles Courtenay.

JOE JASPER was in difficulties. Everything seemed to go wrong with him. He was going down-hill fast.

It wasn't that Joe hadn't a good business, for customers swarmed. He was a most popular business man, to judge by his visitors.

But then, you see, they didn't pay up, and it almost seemed as if most of them never intended to. And Joe, being an easy, confiding sort of fellow, permitted them to run up almost as long a bill as they chose. For my part, I don't see how a man who accepts excuses instead of cash ever can get on.

Joe's business troubles were bad enough, but he had his domestic ones as well. There was his wife, a sickly, feeble sort of woman, who was always calling in the doctor, and of course running up a heavy bill. A whining, pining sort of woman she was, everlastingly grumbling. Nothing seemed to go right with her. All the world was against her. And having nobody to express her feelings to but Joe, he received the full benefit of them from morning till night. I suppose her feelings were due, in a great measure, to her constitution, but Joe's peevish, petulant, moaning wife was a burden not at all easy to bear.

Then there were the children, forever ailing in some way, and needing the doctor too.

Indeed, Joe used to say, that of all the expensive families ever brought up, his was, without exception, the worst. And so, what with troubles in business and troubles at home, he was well-nigh at his wits' end.

One thing in his favor was that he was a cheerful man. He could generally throw off his troubles with but little difficulty.

"What's the good of croaking?" he would say when some troublesome bit of news reached his ears. "What can't be cured must be endured." And then he would break forth into a whistle.

But good spirits fail sometimes. And so there came a time when the strain on Joe's cheerfulness was too great for it to bear. True, he kept on whistling, but it was a very forced affair, and deceived nobody, not even himself. It was a sad event which brought things to a climax. His favorite little daughter fell ill of fever, and after tossing about restlessly for a few days in sad delirium, sank into her last sleep. Joe sat beside her until the last, holding her little hand in his. It was terrible to watch his little pet, as moment by moment death drew nearer; and when at last there came the last breath, Joe could hardly believe she was dead.

Poor Joe was broken-hearted. Nobody could comfort him. This last blow took all the spirit out of him. He could neither eat nor sleep. He shunned society, and shutting himself up in his room, yielded to uncontrollable sorrow. All the day long the little dead face haunted him. He could not forget it.

"Oh, I wish I had never been born! I wish I had never been born!" he was continually saying.

Indeed, a more crushed and broken-spirited man than Joe Jasper scarcely lived. When he appeared in business again, everybody noticed the difference in him. He had aged considerably.

"If I was you, Joe, my man, I'd go in for a sip or two o' four ale now and then. I'd warrant it u'd put a bit o' life into yer sperrits."

Joe looked so interested in this piece of advice that his adviser felt himself bound to continue the subject.

"Don't yer see, Joe, old feller, you wants to forget yer troubles. Now for forgetting troubles give me a Public, a pint of that there four ale, and a fiddle. There's folks about us that runs down Publics. I runs 'em up. They're the poor man's comforter, I thinks. And if you'll take my advice, and I thinks I knows a thing or two, you'll go and wash them there troubles of yours right clean out of yer mind."

Here Joe remarked that he shouldn't wonder if it would wash away his troubles. He wished it would.

"Hadn't you better come and have a drop now, Joe? I'd stand treat myself if I had any money about me but I'm sorry to say the last farthing's gone. My heart's big, but my pocket, I grieve to say, is light."

Of course, after this, Joe couldn't help going, and not only going but standing treat himself.

"I am taking it as a medicine," said Joe to himself as he stood at the public bar.

To tell the truth, he was not quite pleased with himself. For, in spite of his friend's plausibility, he couldn't help feeling that there was a flaw in his logic somewhere. And it was certainly against his better nature that he found himself where he was. He had rather a strong idea that he was making a fool of himself. He had rather prided himself in the past on never having been a public-house man. However, after a time he managed to drown his scruples and his troublesome conscience. It was only for the first or second time that he felt somewhat strange with his new occupation and surroundings.

Joe soon spent a great deal of his time at the Blue Garter. At first he went there only after business hours, but he soon learned to find his way there in business hours, just at odd times, you know.

The fact of the matter is, he was learning to make strong drink his sole support and stay. He was giving his whole trust to it. He was making it his most intimate friend. What wonder that when the gloomy fits came upon him he should fly to it so quickly. And of course the more his troubles were, the more drink he wanted, because the more there were to drown.

"The man that drowns himself to drown his troubles is a fool."

My readers would never guess where these words came from. No, and Joe himself, for whose special benefit they were intended, was in the dark. The fact was, they came in a letter which contained no more and was without signature.

"Who in the world sent me that?" said Joe, with a whistle of astonishment.

His next question was, "And what in the world does he mean by it?" But he knew fast enough. He needed no one to tell him that the writer had his drinking habits in his mind's eye. That it was true enough he couldn't help feeling, for all that day the words were in his mind. The arrow had hit its mark.

The next morning there was actually another letter in the same round handwriting and bearing exactly the same post-mark. And there were these words written in it—

"You selfish brute! don't your wife and family need comfort as much as you do?"

Such plain speaking, or rather writing, ruffled Joe very considerably. He was even overheard to express the wish that he could lay a horsewhip on somebody's shoulders.

The third morning Joe was too well prepared to be surprised. He felt in his bones that another letter would be awaiting him as usual, and neither was he disappointed.

Joe would have liked to throw it behind the fire unread, but overpowering curiosity to know what fresh accusation could be brought against him stayed his hand.

"'Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread?' Joe Jasper, you're a shadow hunter."

More than once that day as he paid down his money for consumed beer or spirits, the same question rose to his mind, "Wherefore? Wherefore?" And for the life of him he couldn't answer it to his satisfaction, though he tried hard.

Yes, and when he looked into his glass and tried to imagine that there was comfort in it, the words of the letter sprang unbidden to his lips, "Joe Jasper, you're a shadow hunter." He began, in fact, to have his doubts. It was a great step when the suspicion had gained standing ground in his mind that perhaps he was on the wrong tack altogether.

The next morning's letter was a very peculiar one, though it was plain enough:

"Three months ago Joe Jasper's troubles = 200. To-day Joe Jasper's troubles = 20,000."

"Stuff and nonsense!" muttered Joe, but rather for the sake of saying something than because he believed it, for as a matter of fact his troubles had increased since he took to the drink. And not a little surprised was he when he began to think the matter over. His troubles in business certainly had. And what else could have been expected, seeing he had neglected it so shamefully? Several good customers had left him. His bad customers had been growing worse. Indeed, bad as it was before, it was now ten times worse. And so had his home troubles increased. His wife needed the doctor far more than ever, and his children seemed to live in a perpetual state of mischief. While as for his own personal troubles, there was no doubt in the world about their increase. What if he did manage to drown them for a time, he couldn't destroy them. They awoke again before long to more vigorous life than ever. As a matter of fact, his experiment had been a most disastrous failure.

"I should think he must be tired of sending letters by this time," said Joe to himself before the postman's hour arrived. The truth was he was wishing he had seen the last of them, and was fearing that he hadn't.

(To be concluded.)

UPSIDE DOWN.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"These that have turned the world upside down are come hither also."—Acts 17 : 6.

The Charge against Jason's Guests—A True Charge—The Work Needs Doing—Christianity Misrepresented—Not Spiritual Chloroform—It means Revolution—I. In the Family—Settling Headship—Raising a Family Altar—II. In Commercial Circles—The Crashes of the Turning—The Panic Years—Using Rotten Beams—III. In the Churches—Mission Chapels as Kitchens—A Necessity—A Church of the Well-conditioned—Down with Arrogance—The Coming Upsetting—Where to Begin—The Theban Magistrate's Neglected Warning.

There is a wild bellowing mob around the house of Jason in Thessalonica. What has the man done so greatly to offend the people. He has been entertaining Paul and his comrades. The mob surround the house and cry, "Bring out these turbulent preachers! They are interfering with our business! They are ruining our religion! They are actually turning the world upside down!

A BENEFICIAL MOVEMENT.

The charge was true; for there is nothing that so interferes with sin, there is nothing so ruinous to every form of established iniquity, there is nothing that has such tendency to turn the world upside down as our glorious Christianity. The fact is that the world now is wrong side up, and it needs to be turned upside down in order that it may be right side up. The time was when men wrote books entitling them "Apologies for Christianity." I hope that day has passed. We want no more apologies for Christianity. Let the apologies be on the part of those who do not believe in our religion. We do not mean to make any compromise in the matter. We do not wish to hide the fact that Christianity is revolutionary, and that its tendency is to turn the world upside down.

CHRISTIANITY MISREPRESENTED.

Our religion has often been misrepresented as a principle of tears and mildness and fastidiousness; afraid of crossing people's prejudices; afraid of making somebody mad; with silken gloves lifting the people up from the church pew into glory, as though they were Bohemian-glass, so very delicate that with one touch it may be demolished forever. Men speak of religion as though it were a refined imbecility; as though it were a spiritual chloroform, that the people were to take until the sharp cutting of life were over. The Bible, so far from this, represents the religion of Christ as robust and brawny—ransacking and upsetting ten thousand things that now seem to be settled on firm foundations.

I hear some man say, "I thought religion was peace." That is the final result. A man's arm is out of place. Two men come, and with great effort put it back to the socket. It goes back with great pain. Then it gets well. Our world is horribly disordered and out of joint. It must come under an omnipotent surgery, beneath which there will be pain and anguish before there can come perfect health and quiet. I proclaim, therefore, in the name of my Lord Jesus Christ—

REVOLUTION!

I. The religion of the Bible will make a revolution in the family. Those things that are wrong in the family circle will be overthrown by it, while justice and harmony will take the place. The husband will be the head of the household only when he is fit to be. I know a man who spends all the money he makes in drink, as well as all the money that his wife makes; do you tell me that he is the head of that household? If the wife have more nobility, more courage, more consistency, more of all that is right, she shall have the supremacy. You say that the Bible says that the wife is to be subject to the husband. I know it. But that is a husband, not a masculine caricature. There is no human or divine law that makes a woman subordinate to a man unworthy of her. When Christianity comes into a domestic circle it will give the dominancy to that one who is the most worthy of it.

As religion comes in at the front door, mirth and laughter will not go out of the back door. It will not hopple the children's feet. John will laugh just as loud, and George will jump higher than he ever did before. It will steal from the little ones neither ball nor bat nor hoop nor kite. It will establish a family altar. Angels will hover over it. Ladders of light will reach down to it. The glory of heaven will stream upon it. The books of remembrance will record it, and tides of everlasting blessedness will flow from it. Not such a family altar as you may have seen, where the prayer is long, and a long chapter is read with tedious explanation, and the exercise keeps on until the children's knees are sore and their backs ache and their patience is lost and for the seventh time they have counted all the rungs in the chair; but I mean a family altar such as you may have seen in your father's house. You may have wandered far off in the paths of sin and darkness, but you have never forgotten that family altar where father and mother knelt, importuning God for your soul. That is a memory that a man never gets over. There will be a hearty joyful family altar in every domestic circle.

You will not have to go far to find Hannah rearing her Samuel for the temple, or a Grandmother Lois instructing her young Timothy in the knowledge of Christ, or Mary and Martha and Lazarus gathered in fraternal and sisterly affection, or a table at which Jesus sits as at that of Zaccheus, or a home in which Jesus dwells as in the house of Simon the tanner. The religion of Jesus Christ coming into the domestic circle will overthrow all jealousies, all janglings, and peace and order and holiness will take possession of the home.

REVOLUTION IN TRADE.

II. Christianity will produce a revolution in commercial circles. Find me fifty merchants and you find that they have fifty standards of what is right and wrong. You say to some one about a merchant, "Is he honest?" "Oh, yes," the man says, "he is honest; but he grinds the faces of the clerks. He is honest; but he exaggerates the value of his goods. He is honest; but he loans money on bond and mortgage with the understanding that the mortgage can lie quiet for ten years, but as soon as he gets the mortgage he records it and begins a foreclosure suit, and the sheriff's writ comes down, and the day of sale arrives, and away goes a homestead, and the creditor buys it in at half price. Honest! when he loaned the money he knew that would get the homestead at half price. Honest! but he goes to the insurance office to get a policy on his life, and tells the doctor that he is well, when he knows that for ten years he has had but one lung. Honest! though he sells property by the map, forgetting to tell the purchaser that the ground is all under water. But it is generous of him to do that, for he throws the water into the bargain.

THE CRASH OF THE TURNING.

Ah! my friends, there is but one standard of the everlastingly right and the everlastingly wrong, and that is the Bible, and when that principle shall get its pry under our commercial houses, I believe that one half of them will go over. The ruin will begin at one end of the street and it will be crash! crash! crash! all the way down to the docks. What is the matter? Has there been a new tariff? Has there been a failure in crops? Has there been an unaccountable panic? This is the secret: the Lord God has set up His throne of judgment in the Exchange. He has summoned the righteous and the wicked to come before Him. What was 1837? A day of judgment. What was 1857? A day of judgment. What was 1863? A day of judgment.

Do you think that God is going to wait until He has burned the world up before He rights these wrongs? I tell you, nay. Every day is a day of judgment. The fraudulent man piles up his gains, bond above bond, United States security above United States security, emolument above emolument, until his property has become a great pyramid, and as he stands looking at it, he thinks it can never be destroyed; but the Lord God has come with His little finger, and pushes it all over.

ROTTEN BEAMS.

You build a house, and you put into it a rotten beam. A mechanic standing by says, "It will never do to put that beam in; it will ruin your whole building." But you put it in. The house is completed. Soon it begins to rock. You call in the mechanic and ask what is the matter with this door? What is the matter with this wall? Everything seems to be giving out? Says the mechanic: You put a rotten beam into that structure, and the whole thing has got to come down. Here is an estate that seems to be all right now. It has been building a great many years. But fifteen years ago there was a dishonest transaction in that commercial house. That one dishonest transaction will keep on working ruin in the whole structure until down the estate will come in wreck and ruin about the possessor's ears—one dishonest, dollar in the estate demolishing all his possessions. I have seen it again and again, and so have you.

Here is your money safe. The manufacturer and yourself only know how it can be opened. You have the key. You touch the lock and the ponderous door swings back. Let me tell you that however firmly bolted and barred your money safe may be, you cannot keep God out. He will come some day into your counting-room, and He will demand, "Where did that note of hand come from? How do you account for this security? Where did you get that mortgage from? What does this mean?" If it is all right, God will say, Well done, good and faithful servant. Be prospered in this world. Be happy in the world to come. If it is all wrong, He will say, Depart, ye cursed, be miserable for your iniquities in this life, and then go down and spend your eternity with thieves and horse jockeys, and pickpockets.

CHANGES ON THE STREET.

You have an old photograph of the signs of your street. Why have those signs nearly all changed within the last twenty years? Does the passing away of a generation account for it? Oh, no. Does the fact that there are hundreds of honest men who go down every year account for it? Oh, no. This is the secret: the Lord God has been walking through Wall Street, Broadway, Water Street, Fulton Street, Atlantic Street, and He has been adjusting things according to the principles of eternal rectitude. The time will come when, through the revolutionary power of this Gospel, a falsehood, instead of being called exaggeration, equivocation or evasion, will be branded a lie; and stealings that now sometimes go under the head of percentages and commissions and bonuses will be put into the catalogue of State prison offences. Society will be turned inside out and upside down and ransacked of God's truth, until business dishonesties shall come to an end and all double dealing, and God will overturn and overturn and overturn, and commercial men in all circles will throw up their hands, crying out, "These that have turned the world upside down are come hither."

REVOLUTION IN THE CHURCHES.

III. The religion of Jesus Christ will produce a revolution in our churches. The non-committal, do-nothing policy of the Church of God will give way to a spirit of bravest conquest. Piety in this day seems to me to be salted down just so as to keep. It seems as if the church were chiefly anxious to take care of itself; and if we hear of want and squalor and heathenism outside, we say: "What a pity!" and we put our hands in our pockets, and we feel around for a two-cent piece, and with a great flourish we put it upon the plate, and are amazed that the world is not converted in six weeks.

Suppose there was a great war and there were 300,000 soldiers, but all of those 300,000 soldiers, excepting ten men, were in their tents or scouring their muskets or cooking rations. You would say, "Of course defeat must come in that case." It is worse than that in the Church. Millions of the professed soldiers of Jesus Christ are cooking rations or asleep in their tents, while only one man here and there goes out to do battle for the Lord.

THE CONFESSION OF MISSIONS.

"But," says some one, "we are establishing a great many missions, and I think they will save the masses." No; they will not. Five hundred thousand of them will not do it. They are doing a magnificent work; but every mission chapel is a confession of the disease and weakness of the Church. It is making a dividing line between the classes. It is saying to the rich and to the well-conditioned, "If you can pay your pew-rents, come to the main audience room." It is saying to the poor man, "Your coat is too bad and your shoes are not good enough. If you want to get to heaven, you will have to go by way of the mission chapel." The mission chapel has become a kitchen where the church does its sloppy work. Hundreds and thousands of churches in this country—gorgeously built and supported—that even on bright and sunshiny days are not half full of worshippers, and yet they are building mission chapels, because by some expressed or implied regulation the great masses of the people are kept out of the main audience room. Now, I say that any place of worship which is appropriate for one class is appropriate for all classes. Let the rich and the poor meet together, the Lord the Maker of them all. Mind you, I say that mission chapels are a necessity, the way churches are now conducted, but may God speed the time when they shall cease to be a necessity. God will rise up and break down the gates of the churches that have kept back the masses. And woe be to those who stand in the way! They will be trampled under foot by the vast populations making a stampede for heaven.

I saw in some paper an account of a church in Boston, in which it is said there were a great many plain people. The next week the trustees of that church came out in the paper and said it was not so at all; they were "elegant people and highly conditioned people that went there." Then I laughed outright. Those people, I said, are afraid of the sickly sentimentality of the churches. Now, my ambition is not to preach to you so much. You have good things in this life. Whatever may be your future destiny, you have had a pleasant time here. But those dying populations of which I speak, by reason of their want and suffering, whatever may be their future destiny, are in perdition now; and if there be any comfort in Christ's Gospel, for God's sake, give it to them!

DOWN WITH CHURCH ARROGANCE.

Revolution! The pride of the church must come down. The exclusiveness of the church must come down! The financial boastings of the church must come down! If monetary success were the chief idea in the church, then I say that the present mode of conducting finances is the best. If it is to see how many dollars you can gain, then the present mode is the best. But if it is the saving of souls from sin and death and bringing the mighty populations of our cities to the knowledge of God, then I cry revolution. It is coming fast. I feel it in the air. I hear the rumbling of an earthquake that shall shake down in one terrific crash the arrogance of our modern Christianity.

The talk is whether Protestant churches or Roman Catholic churches are coming out ahead. I tell you, Protestants, this truth plainly: that until your churches are as free as are the Roman Catholic cathedrals, they will beat you. In their cathedrals the millionnaire and the beggar kneel side by side, and until that time comes in our churches, we cannot expect the favor of God for permanent spiritual prosperity. Revolution! It may be that before the church learns its duty to the masses, God will scourge it, and will come with the whip of omnipotent indignation and drive out the money changers. It may be that there is to be a great day of upsetting before that time shall come. If it must come, O Lord God, let it come now!

In that future day of the reconstructed Church of Christ, the church building will be the most cheerful of all buildings. Instead of the light of the sun strained through painted glass, until an intelligent auditory looks green and blue and yellow and copper-colored, we will have no such things. The pure atmosphere of heaven will sweep out the fœtid atmosphere that has been kept in many of our churches boxed up from Sunday to Sunday.

A MEMORABLE TIME.

The day of which I speak will be a day of great revivals. There will be such a time as it was in the parish of Shotts where five hundred souls were born to God in one day; such times as were seen in this country when Edwards gave the alarm, when Tennent preached, and Whitefield thundered, and Edward Payson prayed, such times as some of you remember in 1857, when the voice of prayer and praise was heard in theatre and warehouse and blacksmith shop and factory and engine-house, and the auctioneer's cry of "a half and a half and a half" was drowned out by the adjoining prayer-meetings in which the people cried out, "Men and brethren, what shall we do!"

REVOLUTION IN SERVICE.

In those days of which I am speaking the services of the church of God will be more spirited, if the ministers of Christ, instead of being anxious about whether they shall lose their place in the notes, will get on fire with the theme, and pour the living truth of God upon an aroused auditory—crying out to the righteous, "It shall be well with you;" and to the wicked, "Woe, it shall be ill with you!" In those days the singing will be different from what it is now. The music will weep and wail and chant and triumph. People then will not be afraid to open their mouths when they sing. The man with a cracked voice will risk it on Wyndham and Ortonville and Old Hundred. Grandfather will find the place for his grandchildren in the hymn book, or the little child will be spectacles for the grandfather. Hosanna will meet hosanna, and together go climbing to the throne; and the angels will hear, and God will listen, and the gates of heaven will hoist, and it will be as when two seas meet, the wave of earthly song mingling with the surging anthems of the free.

May God let me live to see that day! Let there be no power in disease or accident or wave of the sea to disappoint my expectations. Let all other sight fail my eyes rather than that I should miss that vision. Let all other sounds fail my ears, rather than that I should fail to hear that sound. I want to stand on the mountain top to catch the first ray of the dawn, and with flying feet bring the news to this people. And oh, when we hear the clattering hoofs that bring on the King's chariot, may we all be ready with arches sprung and with hand on the rope of the bell that is to sound the victory, and with wreathes all twisted for the way; and when Jesus dismounts, let it be amid the huzzah! huzzah! of a world redeemed.

WHERE TO BEGIN.

Where and when shall that revolution begin? Here and now. In your heart and mine. Sin must go down. Our pride must go down. Our worldliness must go down, that Christ may come up. Revolution! "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." Why not let the revolution begin. Not next Sabbath, but now! Not to-morrow, when you go out into commercial circles, but now. Archias, the magistrate of Thebes, was sitting with many mighty men drinking wine. A messenger came in bringing him a letter informing him of a conspiracy against his life, and warning him to flee. Archias took the letter but, instead of opening it put it into his pocket, and said to the messenger who brought it, "Business, to-morrow!" The next day he died. Before he opened the letter the government was captured. When he read the letter it was too late. I put into the hand of every man and woman here a message of life. It says: "To-day if ye will hear His voice harden not your heart." Do not put away the message and say, "This business to-morrow." This night thy soul may be required of thee!

A REMARKABLE FAITH CURE.

RECOVERY FROM HEART DISEASE.

MR. JOHN D. FERGUSON, of Brooklyn, E. D., N. Y., writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD describing his marvellous recovery from heart disease, from which he has been a sufferer for the past ten years. It appears that Mr. Ferguson has for a long time past regarded his disease as incurable. He had applied to two eminent physicians of New York City, who have made disease of the heart their special study, and as they were unable to afford him relief he concluded that his case was past hope.

He was led near the close of last year to study the miracles of healing recorded in the New Testament, and was much impressed by the passage which has inspired so many afflicted believers with hope (James 5 : 14). He consulted with Christian friends on his case, and they agreed together to pray for and with him. He prayed also, and as he prayed his faith was strengthened. On December 20th, after praying very earnestly, he set out to call on Mrs. C. S. Whitney, a Christian friend in New York City. While in the Elevated Railroad on his way he felt exceedingly ill, and believed he was about to die, but he silently prayed for relief from the spasm, and it was granted him.

On his arrival at his friend's house prayer was again offered, and he was anointed with oil in the name of the Lord. Before he left the house he felt that he was healed of his disease, and he returned home rejoicing. As evidence that his conviction is well founded, he states that during the six months which have passed since that eventful day he has had no occasion to take medicine for his heart, though previous to that time he was unable to go about without taking medicine every two or three days. The sudden spasms of pain and faintness which would frequently come upon him, sometimes in the street, sometimes at his work, or at night in his sleep, have wholly ceased, and he has had no return of any of his symptoms, some of which were of a most distressing character. Mr. Ferguson, feeling how deep a debt of gratitude he owes to the Great Physician, has resolved in the strength of the Lord to give his life in renewed consecration to His service.

The Opening on Sundays of the Museums and libraries of Washington is the object of a movement now being vigorously pushed. There are many names among those advocating the change that Christians deeply regret to see in such company. It may be hoped that the earnest advice of F. D. Power, Chaplain of the House of Representatives, and pastor of the Vermont Avenue Christian Church, will exercise the influence it deserves. Mr. Power says that as a disciple of Christ and a teacher of Christianity he is opposed to everything which opens the way to a violation of Sunday sanctity, and adds: "It may be justly said the Museum is better than the average Sunday excursion; any book in the library is better than the average Sunday reading furnished the people, and the botanical gardens no worse than the parks; but of the two evils the wise course is, choose neither."

TEMPERANCE WORK IN CHINA.

An Address by Rev. J. Hudson Taylor, Founder of the China Inland Mission.

OUR subject to-night is a very sad one: "Strong Drink a Robber of the Churches." As I was thinking of it I recalled the few friends and companions I had in my childhood's days, when we played at teetotal meetings and temperance lectures. And where is one of them? He is either in a madhouse to-night or he has died in a madhouse during the last four years that I have been in China. Would to God he had become a total abstainer when he was a child, and continued one. I think of another of them, one of my most intimate companions. His father died in delirium tremens, and the whole of the family were wrecked and ruined through strong drink. I think of a third companion. He was once a Christian, entered the Church, gave great promise of usefulness, and began to seek to rescue the perishing around him; he is wrecked now and lost. There are some others, total abstainers, who are Christian men, and who are doing a useful work for God.

I have been a missionary for thirty years. As our chairman has reminded us, it is not always a pleasant thing to look back upon the career of those with whom we have stood shoulder to shoulder, as the witnesses for the Lord Jesus Christ; but when I think of some of those I have met and known during these thirty years, what has strong drink done for them? I think of two families into which misery came, ending in divorce. I think of a number of Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Congregational, Baptist, and Methodist brethren who were once preaching the Gospel, but who were all ruined, and some died dishonored. One of them, the last time I heard of him, was a porter in a workhouse. Drink is indeed a robber of the churches.

In China I have been brought in contact with the heathen, and there we have to contend with the utter want of faith in all religions. China is a country in which there is a great deal of philosophical scepticism. I was talking once to one of the literary men there, and he said: "We don't believe any religion at all. We have seen all forms of religion tried, and all forms of religion fail. Good men are good men, whether they are Confucionists, or Buddhists, or the professors of any other form of religion that we have had brought before us. Bad men are bad men, and continue bad men whatever form of religion they accept." Now in our work among them we do rejoice in one glorious truth, that the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth. When I am before a Chinese audience it is my joy to know that there is not one of them that the Lord Omnipotent is not able to deliver.

I knew a Christian Chinaman, and I have heard him preach with mighty power. And why? Because he had found what the power of God was in his own soul and in transforming his own life. That was a literary man,

A CHINESE B.A.

He went out into the streets of his own native city one day, not fearing the scorn and contempt which he knew would be bitterly poured upon him, especially by the upper classes and the literary class there, and he preached Jesus mighty to save. He said: "I have to tell you not merely about a salvation to come, not merely that if you will accept this religion and follow this Teacher you will, in a future state, obtain some future blessing. I have to tell you of the Lord Jesus Christ as a Saviour of your lives, and that if there is a poor opium smoker here who can't give up his pipe, Jesus Christ can save him. Jesus Christ can save the sensualist, and Jesus Christ can save the gambler. He is an Almighty Saviour, and if you ask when and how? I say, receive Him, and He will save you now."

If there be here one who does not know how to escape the power of strong drink, and if there be one who does not know how to escape the power of the tobacco-pipe, an enemy, I fear, almost as much as the drink, the Lord Jesus Christ, my Saviour, can save him to-night, and now if he will take Him as his strength and his shield. What was the result of that Chinaman's sermon? There was a poor wretched man in that crowd who was the terror of the neighborhood, and the dread of the mandarin. He had some ten miles outside the city, and was surrounded by a band of desperadoes, so that the magistrates dare not touch him. Men went out of that city, and spent their time and money in this man's house gambling with bad women, and the other concomitants of a gambling hell. The poor man heard a message that day that went to his heart. In that poor, wretched man there was a chord that the Spirit of God caused to vibrate. He heard the sweet words "deliverance" and "Saviour," and said "If that Jesus Christ can save me He shall save me now."

He went home with the preacher and had a talk and prayer with him. It was early in the afternoon. He turned the bad people out of his house that afternoon, and shut and locked the door. A party of gamblers came there that night, out of whom he would have made fifty dollars. "No," he said, "this house is closed for such purposes. It will never be opened again until it is opened to preach the Gospel of Christ in it." That man is alive to-day. I have been in that house and preached the Gospel. He is a changed character. The members of his family have been saved, and they will shine bright as the stars in glory when this world has passed away.

Dear friends, the Lord Jesus Christ is mighty to save. This is what Gospel Temperance means: the power to bring with it blessings for the present life and the dim reflection of the eternal glory that shall follow. There was in another part of China, five hundred miles away from this last place. He had been the victim of this habit for thirty years and wanted to give it up, but he could not. It was affecting his purse and destroying his health, and he knew that as things were going on the end could not be far off. He tried to give it up gradually, but it was too much for him. He felt his doom was sealed. I have been engaged as a medical missionary in the cure of opium smokers. I have seen them writhing in agony as the craving has been on them, tears running down their eyes, foam issuing from their mouths, and their bodies trembling in every nerve. They have not known how to bear it. We have said to those men, "Pray to God to help you." They have prayed and have been helped. The medicines we have given have been of some assistance to them; but those who receive the Lord Jesus Christ do not fall back, as a rule, though the others who do not receive Him only get a temporary deliverance.

This man knew nothing of Jesus Christ. What was he to do? He did not know. God had His eye upon that man and sent a Christian Chinaman to find him out, and a number of others, and put Christ before him, and this man received Jesus Christ as his Saviour. He received a new heart and a new power—not only desires to be a different man, but power to carry out those desires. He never thought of giving up the opium, but one day a Christian soldier came in to read the Scriptures with him, and found him laid on his side with his head on a pillow, and with the opium pipe in his mouth. He said, "Don't you know you cannot be a Christian, and smoke opium?" "Why not?" he asked. "It is a sin against God." "Does the Bible say anything against opium?" "No, but it speaks about drink, and I believe that drink and opium stand very much on the same basis." His friend advised him to give it up gradually, but the man said, "Is it a sin in the sight of God to smoke three drachms?" "Yes, certainly." "Then I can't think it is right in the sight of God to smoke two drachms and nine tenths, and give it up gradually. If the thing is sin, it must be given up at once."

The Christian Chinaman was frightened; he was afraid the man would die if he gave it up suddenly. They prayed together about the matter; and, as faith strengthened the heart of the opium-smoker, he took his pen, and wrote on a piece of paper, "In accordance with the will of the Heavenly Father, from this moment I vow never again to touch opium, secretly or openly." He posted it up in the front of his shop there and then, and never touched it again.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Picture of Misery.—At a Gospel Temperance meeting the Rev. James Scott said: "I had a talk with a drunkard one night in Cadogan Street Church. When I sat down beside him, he said, 'At one time I was a Sabbath-school teacher in this very church, and not only that, but I preached the Gospel to others. Yet here I am, cast out by my friends, and live in a lodging-house.' I tried to speak to him about the folly of continuing such a life. He interrupted me by saying with great earnestness, 'Don't you speak about that; I am the most miserable man in Glasgow to-night.'"

Multiplying One's Ideas.—"Some People say, 'A glass or two of spirits multiplies and improves our ideas.' Yes it does, in the same way as water increases the quantity and improves the quality of milk. A man who came home drunk was told by his wife, 'that if he did so again she should leave him.' Thinking it the best way to end the discussion, he put out the gas. In going over to the bed in the dark, he fell over the cradle, getting up he fell over it again, he got up again and fell over it a third time, lying on the floor, he called out, 'Wife, wife, how many cradles have you got?' That is how drinking spirits multiplies the ideas."

A Soldier on His Knees.—Mr. Colley Said: "Very few know the temptations and trials of a soldier's life; still fewer think of the taunts and jeers to which a convert is subject. I must mention an affecting incident in connection with a soldier whom I know. When he first knelt down to pray ere retiring to rest, one of his comrades standing near said, 'Jack, what's this that's come over you? What you are doing now has touched me very much. When I stood beside my dying mother I promised to give my heart to Jesus, but forgot all about it.' This simple act of confessing Christ reached the heart of the son of a Christian who had long entered into rest."

A Young Sailor's Decision.—Councillor Miller related that, "A young sailor was very anxious about his salvation, but could not decide to give up sin and give himself to Christ. He was advised to go home, sit down in his room alone, and then take a pen and put down on paper the advantages and the disadvantages of both sides of the question. He complied with this advice, and hardly had he begun to think it out, when the superiority of the Christian life flashed through his mind. He did not require to touch the paper, for it was as clear as light could make it, and his indecision was at an end. He gave himself to Christ, and is now a faithful Christian."

A Whiskey-Drinker Becomes a Preacher.—A Mizpah Band brother said: "Friends, seven months ago I came into this church a different man from what I am now. I was very poorly indeed in body and soul; every halfpenny I could get went for whiskey, and I belonged to a set of hard-drinking men who were rather noted for their excesses. Some five or six of that lot have been brought to the Lord in these Cowcaddens meetings, and are now working as Christians in them. I met a gentleman in the street to-day who had not seen me since my conversion. I was so changed that, although we were well acquainted with each other in former times, he did not know me. After many exclamations of surprise, he asked, 'What is the cause of the difference in you?' 'When you saw me last I was serving Satan, now I am serving the Lord Jesus.' Although he was a worldly man, his reply was, 'There must be something in this conversion, then, after all.' 'Yes, there is,' and I preached the Gospel to him where he stood, and I hope he accepted it."

How a Major was Converted.—At Cowcaddens, Major Swanson said: "I arrived in Gibraltar in 1868, and I don't suppose there is any man in this audience who is so worldly-minded as I was then. How to acquire money was the ruling idea of my heart and brain. When it was made, I planned I was to retire from the service, but through all the toil and care I heard an inward voice saying that the Spirit of God would arrest me. Two years after, in 1870, I took a fancy to read the New Testament, for the sake of the beauty of its diction. Many are the ways through which the Holy Spirit leads to Christ, and the way He led me was by the intellectual pleasure which I found in reading His Word."

A Large Steamer Severely Shaken.—The Rev. H. Anderson said: "The Christian is often shaken in the way which a friend told me a large steamer was in the Bay of Biscay. While they were steaming ahead in the midst of a storm an immense wave rose and actually submerged the ship, but her natural buoyancy enabled her to rise and throw off the water, with the loss of all her small boats and some of the deck fittings. The compass was disturbed, but the needle soon regained its proper position, as it did not loose its polarity, so that the steersman was able to guide the ship safely. When the waves of trouble sweep over us, and our faith is disturbed, we have only to look at our Compass, it is never wrong. We are always sure to be guided right by it."

A Night's Sleep Spoiled.—Another Brother said: "For twenty years I was what I thought a good Christian, but I am safe to say that the burden of Christianity which I bore was sinking me to hell. The brother who was the means of my conversion is sitting in the same seat with me just now. One night in this church, in the passage over there, he asked me, 'Have you found Christ?' 'Ah,' I thought, 'it's time I was out of this place,' and I made for the door; but the brother persisted, 'Don't go away; if I had thought you would do that I wouldn't have spoken.' I did not heed him, but hurried home. I went to my bed to sleep, but could not do so. The words, 'Have you found Christ?' were sounding in my ears until I was compelled to seek Him, and then I found and laid my burden on Him."

A Christian Jew's Teetotalism.—Mr. Mathews said: "I have been a believer in the Lord Jesus Christ as the promised Messiah for nineteen years, although I was brought up from my birth to despise the name of the Lord, and to look upon Christians as idolaters. I was rigorously trained to observe meats and drinks. I could not touch pork, hares, rabbits, or shell-fish; they were unlawful to me. It was a severe struggle to me to take my stand as a believer in and a follower of the despised Nazarene. After my conversion many Christians said to me, 'Mr. Mathews, I suppose you are not afraid to take pork now?' 'No, I am free; I am a Christian,' was my answer. When I got better acquainted with the people who compose the Christian Church I learned that there were a set known as teetotallers who condemned in strong language the use of wines or spirits. They spoke as though any one who touched either was not a true Christian. I rebelled against them, and thought, 'I am a true Christian and must have liberty.' Soon I began to look upon it as a matter of indifference, and to please some I would take half a glass, and to suit others I left it alone. At the end of last year I was led to see that although I had liberty to take it or not, yet for the sake of those who could not drink in moderation I was bound to refrain; therefore I resolved to drink strong drink no more. My friends warned me that I should not sleep well without it, but for these three months I have slept very well every night. It cost me an effort to give up my one glass, so that I can sympathize very heartily with the brother who has become a slave to drink in the struggle against his appetite. We should be prepared to do anything for the sake of Christ."

THE STUDY OF PROPHECY.

Three Great Biblical Divisions—Prophecy the Largest—Its Study Avoided—Special Blessings for the Student—Why Neglected—Beacons of Warning—The Student Prepared—A Rule of Study.

THE contents of the Bible may be ranged under three leading divisions: doctrine, history, prophecy. In order of importance they may, perhaps, be fairly so placed, the positive teaching of the Word, the ipse dixit of the Holy Spirit, as to revealed truth, being in the forefront, the historical facts, upon which so many doctrines are based, coming next, and the great prophecies, fulfilled and unfulfilled, bringing up the rear. The three, combined, form a mighty force of truth, against which the hosts of error vainly strive. They are

which cannot be broken. They are so related, one to the other, that neither can be overlooked without the other suffering from the neglect, each one contributing to the other a quota of sacred evidence and inspired support.

Of the three, prophecy occupies by far the largest place. In the Old Testament, sixteen books are devoted to prophetical truth, while the remaining books are largely occupied with prophetic statement; specially in the Pentateuch and the Psalms. In the New Testament, very much of our Lord's teaching, and not a little of that found in the Epistles, abounds with predictions concerning the future, while the sacred canon closes with that wonderful prophecy known as "The Revelation of Jesus Christ," in which all that has gone before is so gathered up and interwoven as to show that the Divine Spirit intended it to refer us back to that "sure word of prophecy" which pervades the Scriptures throughout.

It is impossible to study the Bible with any degree of fairness and breadth of thought without studying prophecy; yet we venture to say, among Bible readers, no subject is so in many cases it is even on principle avoided. The consequence is, that a large portion of the inspired volume to many minds becomes barren and unfruitful, not because the soil is not equally as rich and fertile as other parts may be, but because it is unworked and passed by.

Yet the study of prophecy is not only commended but commanded by the inspired writers. Special promises are attached to its careful consideration, while its bearing upon the life and character of the true believer is of the highest practical importance. It tends to arm his faith with weapons of keenest edge in the midst of assaults to which that faith is exposed; and by forewarning him of coming events, to preserve him from the evil and to prepare him for the return of his Lord. The enemy of souls labors hard to deter Christians from studying prophecy, or, if they enter upon it, to mislead them, for well does he know that in proportion as they are Scripturally versed in its themes will they be awake to the claims of Christ, and on their guard against his own devices.

Why, then, do so many neglect it? Various answers to this question are sometimes given. Among them are these: The faults and follies into which many of its students have fallen; the difficulties which the study involves; lack of time and opportunity to enter upon it; and last, but not least in its bearing upon the matter, lack of interest and concern as to what the future may have in store, further than the one essential point of eternal life beyond the grave. As to the first of these, it must be confessed that some of the advocates of prophetic truth have been its worst enemies; by their attempts to be wise above what is written, and by the

they have first raised, and then exaggerated into assumed facts, they have made sober, thoughtful readers of the Word jealous of the subject altogether.

And yet here, as in other spheres, human mistake and error of judgment should surely be regarded as adding to the safety of the way, rather than as barriers to entering the path in which they may be found. The same objection might be urged against the study of doctrine, systems of theology abounding in traces of human error, and being often overlaid with the mere traditions of men. Keeping to the plain letter of the Word, and depending solely on the guidance of the Holy Spirit, will save us from mistaking these will-o'-the-wisps for the prophetic light, and from falling into the mistakes all wise men would alike deprecate.

As to the difficulties which attend the study, they are only such as yield to prayerful inquiry and thought. They are more fancied than real, and arise from want of acquaintance with the wider range of inspired truth, which due regard to prophecy as well as its other themes would afford. The difficulties attach to secret things which belong not unto us, but unto God, rather than to what is revealed in the Word that we are called upon to investigate.

Lack of time and opportunity is doubtless an obstacle to exhaustive study of revelation on the part of many. However much they may desire to be so, all readers cannot be students. But the most busy man, if a child of God, will feel it his duty to give some time to acquaintance with his heavenly Father's will, even though it be a sacrifice in other respects to do so. If such a one, however brief and few his opportunities may be, in the spirit of a true disciple, impartially and with childlike simplicity, seeks to be led into all truth, he shall find that the bright gleams of joy and hope which throws across our pilgrim path, illumine his sky and cheer his onward way. Let him therefore use aright his one talent of time, assured that to him who is faithful in that which is least, more shall be given. Where lack of interest and concern accounts for the neglect, surely we are right in urging that to be uninterested in anything God has spoken, or unconcerned about any subject He has unfolded for our benefit, is to dishonor Him, and slight His gracious message: "Every Scripture inspired of God is profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction which is in righteousness," and seeing that the prophetic Scriptures are undoubtedly inspired of Him, they certainly demand our reverent regard.

The very fact that He has occupied so much space with them proves their importance and indicates their value. Only let us apply to unfulfilled prophecy as we necessarily must to that which is plainly fulfilled, and we shall find that while the latter serves to confirm our confidence in the Divine origin of Holy Writ, the study of the former tends to sanctify the heart and consecrate the life, by giving to the present, as read in the light of the future, a solemnity and responsibility, the force of which we cannot resist. Undismayed by however dark they may become; undaunted by the powers of darkness, however fiercely they may rage; unmoved by the trials of life, however severe they may prove; taught by the prophetic page, we shall look for the appearing of the Lord we love, and waiting for the Son of God from heaven, shall "gird up the loins of our mind, and hope to the end for the grace to be brought unto us at the revelation of Jesus Christ." Meanwhile we shall be found actively engaged in His service, we shall "occupy till He come," and all the more diligently and faithfully because through the vigils of the night we hear His voice sounding through the Word of truth, and saying, "Behold, I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give every one according as his work shall be."

THE SAME PRINCIPLE OF INTERPRETATION

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Pennsylvania Republican Convention assembled at Harrisburg on July 11th. It presented an exhibition of harmony, for which politicians were little prepared. There were only two offices to be filled, those of State Treasurer and Auditor General, and the convention in nominating candidates for them, showed that the efforts to heal the breach between Stalwarts and Independents in the State had not been entirely without success. The platform adopted by the Convention will doubtless cause considerable discussion. It is very doubtful if its principles would be generally indorsed by Republicans in other States, and it certainly does not harmonize with the platforms adopted by Republican Conventions elsewhere. It first pledges the party to protection and denounces all attempts to reduce the tariff duties below the protective level. Whether the level meant is the present rate or that in existence before the Tariff Bill was passed, the platform does not state. The second resolution, however, is the one that challenges criticism. It runs thus: "That any surplus in the public Treasury arising from a redundant revenue should, after paying the national debt as fast as its condition permits, be distributed from time to time to the several States upon the basis of population, to relieve them from the burdens of local taxation and provide means for the education of their people." This is a curious scheme, which certainly has the charm of novelty. It will doubtless have the support of communists; and the politicians in the State capitals who would control the distribution of the respective portions of the surplus would also approve of it. The delight can be imagined of the Albany Legislature, for example, in spending ten million dollars which would be New York's share of a national surplus of a hundred millions. But the people, who now find it sufficiently difficult to pay the taxes, would prefer that the Government should limit its demands to the smallest amount compatible with efficiency, rather than that it should try to benefit monopolies by arranging for a redundant revenue, even though they had the promise that the surplus would be returned to them. Experience has taught them to fear that a surplus on its travels to the pockets from whence it came, might go astray, and never reach its destination. The Republicans of Pennsylvania may have adopted the resolution without consideration, and if so, we may expect to hear, from the leaders of the party, that the scheme has no place in the Republican programme.

The Struggle in Iowa this Fall is likely to be a severe one. An announcement ominous for the Temperance party has been made by ex-Governor Kirkwood, who says that he cannot support on the stump or vote for the Republican nominee for Supreme Judge. It is Mr. Kirkwood's opinion that Judge Day should have been renominated, and that his defeat for the reason that he voted against the constitutionality of the prohibitory amendment was a mistake. If a man so influential in the State as the ex-Governor has really resolved on bolting, or scratching the ticket, his example may be followed so extensively that the Republican candidate for Supreme Court Judge will be defeated. It is announced that the democratic candidate for Governor has invited the republican candidate to a joint public discussion of the questions on which the people are to decide at the fall election, and that the republican candidate has accepted the invitation. The voters will therefore have exceptional opportunities for understanding the views of the rival candidates on the questions at issue.

The Appointment made by Commissioner Evans of Mr. Charles M. Horton as special agent on the recommendation of Mr. Blaine and others has been revoked. The charge against Mr. Horton of having received a bribe was investigated by Collector Slack, whose report, Commissioner Evans states, was found to set forth as a conclusion that the evidence failed to connect Mr. Horton with the receipt of the bribe. Collector Slack, in his report, however, incorporated the statements of persons examined privately by him in the absence of Mr. Horton. These charges were like those made by Mr. Carter. Upon reading the report the Commissioner felt that it was due to the Administration and to himself that Mr. Horton should tender his resignation, not because he had been found guilty of any charge, nor because of the anonymous charges incorporated in the Collector's report, but to relieve an evident embarrassment. Mr. Horton naturally failed to see how his holding a subordinate office could embarrass the Administration, unless Mr. Evans regarded himself as the chief person in the Administration, and therefore declined to practically admit his guilt by resigning. The Commissioner then revoked his appointment.

The Value of the Reforms in the Postal Service is shown in the report of the Auditor, issued on July 10th. It shows that during the third quarter of the last fiscal year the receipts of the Post Office Department were $11,912,376, and the expenditures $10,792,499, leaving a surplus of $1,119,877. For the nine months of the fiscal year ended March 31st, 1883, the receipts of the Post Office Department were $33,946,356, and the expenditures $31,436,914, leaving a surplus of $2,509,442. It is not a long period since a deficiency in the Department was the customary showing.

In a Post Office General Order Issued last week, the Postmaster General requests that the practice of reading newspapers and periodicals passing through the mails be discontinued wherever it exists. He states that complaints have been made that second-class mail matter, that is, newspapers and periodicals sent to regular subscribers is not in all cases promptly forwarded to the addresses. He informs the Post Office employés that, "if it is necessary to withdraw second-class matter from its wrapper in order to ascertain its destination it may be done, but this will not be allowed for any other purpose." The issue of this order may perhaps explain to subscribers in the West and South why in some cases they have not received their papers regularly.

A License Law Similar to that in Ohio known as the Scott Law has been declared constitutional by the Supreme Court of Missouri. The Missouri Legislature passed the law last winter. It imposes a higher rate for licenses than does the Scott Law. The decision of the Court says that the Legislature has the right to prohibit the sale of intoxicants in the State. This dictum will doubtless encourage the Prohibitionists to still more strenuous exertions.

A Young Men's Christian Association Day will be held at Thousand Island Park, on Sunday, August 5th. The special exercises of the day will be in charge of the New York State Secretary, Rev. George A. Hall, who will be assisted by Rev. Charles W. Cushing, D.D., of Rochester, Rev. F. H. Hinman, of Auburn Theological Seminary, D. A. Budge, of Montreal, and other prominent Association workers. The exercises will consist of a Y. M. C. A. Sermon, Platform Meetings, a Gospel Service for Young Men, a Young Men's Bible Class, and a Service of Song. All details can be obtained by addressing Rev. George A. Hall, State Secretary Y. M. C. A., 52 East Twenty-third Street, New York City.

The Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions announced that its debt at the close of last year amounted to $13,282. Noticing this, a friend of the cause, unsolicited, contributed $10,000 toward its extinction. The income of the Board during the month of May showed a decrease of $1351. It is explained that the contributions from churches and from individuals show an advance—the falling off being accounted for under the head of "bequests." These amounted to $11,954 for May, 1882, but this year it is $2928.

A Private Effort to Stop Sunday Trains has been successful. A few weeks ago the managers of the Housatonic Railway Company announced their intention to run Sunday trains "law or no law." On Sunday, June 10th, a train left the Bridgeport station for Pittsfield, having twenty passengers and a supply of Sunday newspapers. At Canaan the conductor received a brief telegram from the company's main office directing him to return. The company had heard that in a village just over the Massachusetts line a preacher and a few laymen and an officer were waiting with an injunction. The train returned to Bridgeport the same evening.

The Condition of Mission Work in Alaska is described by Rev. S. Hall Young, who has been laboring at Fort Wrangell. He says: "One of the advantages on the side of the missionaries lies in the fact that the women are in all respects the equals of the men. The principal obstacles to be overcome are superstition and drunkenness. There are at present twenty missionaries in that field, and their labor is meeting with a satisfactory reward."

Dr. McCosh, the President of Princeton College, makes in the press an earnest appeal to Christians interested in the welfare of young men, and concerned that the ministry should be "thoroughly furnished unto all good works" for funds for the endowment of a school of philosophy in the college. Dr. McCosh says: "I wish to secure a place for philosophy equal to that of any branch of literature or science. This is imperatively required to furnish a foundation and a combination to all our other teaching. It is the want of the times, when old truths are being undermined and the faith of young men is unsettled. The old friends of the college in the Presbyterian Church, and in other churches, are calling on us to make provision for this end. People everywhere expect it of Princeton College. Considerable numbers of young men are ready to profit by the instruction which will thus be afforded them." The number of students has increased since Dr. McCosh became President of the college from 264 to 561.

A Strange Cause of Death was Assigned by a physician in a case which terminated fatally last week in New York. A man employed in a leather house in "the Swamp" was handling the hides on July 2nd, and was inoculated by poison coming in contact with a simple pimple under his left ear. He began to feel unwell on the following Wednesday, but he worked until Friday, when his neck began to swell and he called a doctor. His head and neck swelled up until the flesh was puffed out beyond the chin and ears, and he died on the following Sunday. The doctor, when he became ill, told him that he thought the poison came from the hide of a beast afflicted with murrain, but the sick man believed that it came from the solution containing arsenic put on the hides to cure them and protect them from insects and animals like rats, which would otherwise ruin them. The day when the mischief was done was excessively hot, and the man handling the hides and perspiring freely frequently wiped his moist face with his hand, and so the poison touched the pimple on his ear. By many avenues does death find an entrance to the human citadel. Sin, like death, is also perpetually near us, and while we guard one weak point it may enter at another. Only in constant prayer and watchfulness is there safety (Matt. 26 : 41).

Blood at Ten Cents a Drop is the Subject of a lawsuit now being tried in the Sixth District Court of New York. On February 17th last a guest in a hotel in the city was found asphyxiated by an escape of gas. Three physicians were summoned, and after consultation pronounced that the only way to save the patient's life was by the transfer of blood from the veins of a healthy man to those of the sufferer. A colored porter submitted himself for the purpose, and eight ounces of blood, each ounce supposed to contain two hundred and forty drops, were transferred from his arm to that of the patient. When the latter recovered he gave the porter five dollars to compensate him for the blood, services in nursing, and some expenses out of pocket. The porter did not consider that sum sufficient, and last week brought suit, in which he claimed $192, being ten cents for each drop of the blood he had lost in the operation. Judge Kelly, who tried the unique case, has reserved his decision. In estimating the sum due the plaintiff, the judge will doubtless consider the fact that the defendant's life was saved by the operation, and if that is taken into account the five dollars paid seems utterly inadequate. When the Christian fully realizes the meaning of the eternal life purchased for him by the blood of Christ, he will look back on a whole life of service and self-sacrifice as an offering infinitely small compared with his obligations to his Saviour (Rom. 12 : 1).

The Exploits of a Small Boy in San Francisco have caused his parents some alarm. His father, who is a builder, lately undertook to make some repairs at the top of a number of flat-roofed buildings of several stories' elevation. In making a preliminary examination he took his child, who is three years old, with him, and when he ascended to the roof left him sitting on his coat at the foot of a ladder fastened perpendicularly against the back of one of the houses. His examination occupied more time than he expected, but was finally completed, and just as he was on the point of returning, he was horrified to see the little one's head peering above the topmost round of the ladder, and on a level with himself. To secure him and descend to the ground required no little command of nerve, but it was finally accomplished. A week or two after this occurrence the boy was missing from the family circle. His parents and their friends searched for him in vain, until in passing through the street on which the buildings front, the object of the search was discovered sitting on the edge of a projecting cornice, dangling his feet about and looking at the objects below in a most unconcerned manner. By dint of perseverance and tact the child was finally brought down in safety. To reach the perilous position in which he was found he had climbed the ladder that had served him in his previous exploit, walked over an eight-inch plank in the face of a strong gale of wind, to the second building, and either scrambled over or crawled around a high frontage of the cornice. The child did not realize his danger, but his father did, and trembled for him. How often has similar temerity been displayed by those who should have had more self-knowledge! (Luke 22 : 31 34.)

The Frank Acknowledgment Made by a suicide in Pennsylvania recently, cannot fail to be indorsed by sensible people. It and its sequel were a striking commentary on Solomon's warning (Prov 10 : 14). On July 7th a fisherman found in some bushes in an unfrequented path near his home the dead body of a young man. It was neatly dressed, but had on it nothing that disclosed its identity. In the hand of the dead man was an empty box, which had contained morphia, and a slip of paper, upon which was written with a pencil in a good hand, "Bury me where I die. I am a fool. This act is premeditated." There were no marks of violence upon him and no evidence of a struggle. He had evidently lain where he was found when he took the fatal dose. It is astonishing that a man who had sense enough to perceive his own folly should have deliberately closed his opportunity of gaining wisdom. If he had read his Bible he would have seen that foolishness is not incurable (Titus 3 : 3).

An Engineer's Heroism Saved the Lives of his passengers in South Carolina on June 28th. He was driving the fast express train, and when between Summerville and Charleston, and about three miles from the latter city, the train was turned from the main track to a siding by a misplaced switch and ran into two loaded cars which were standing on the siding. The engineer, Samuel Smith, was instantly killed, his body being frightfully mutilated. There were about one hundred and fifty passengers on the train, none of whom were hurt. They owe their lives to the heroism of the engineer, who, instead of jumping from the engine after the train left the main track, occupied himself during the run of seventy-five yards to the scene of the collision in reversing the engine and putting on the air-brakes. The accident was caused by the carelessness of a section master, who was repairing the switch at the time. The noble engineer standing in the very forefront of danger, and knowing that he would suffer the first shock of the collision, showed a consideration for others and a spirit of self-sacrifice rarely equalled in time of war or peace. Such an act as this helps us to realize the cost at which man's salvation was purchased (Rom. 5 : 7, 8).

An Extraordinary Disappearance of a Lake is reported by a Nevada newspaper. It states that Red Fish Lake, above Sawtooth City, on the summit of the Sawtooth range of mountains, in the Wood River region, has dropped through the bottom. The lake had an area of several miles and was many fathoms in depth. It was on the summit of one of the peaks of the range, some 11,000 feet elevation above the sea, and surrounded by heavy timber, which rendered it a delightful place of resort in summer for camping, fishing, and boating parties. The lake has been there since the white man has known the country, but lately—the day of the occurrence is not known—the bottom fell out. The country formation is granite and limestone, and an immense fissure has opened, either through the settling of the ground, or from volcanic action, and the whole volume of water has disappeared. At present the bed of the lake is dry, and presents the appearance of a deep gorge or valley on the summit of the mountains. Where the water has gone to is a mystery not yet solved. It is possible that the scientific men studying the strange event may find an explanation of it, but it is obvious that there are forces at work on the earth of which we know nothing. The day will come when God will use those forces in such a way as to strike terror into the souls of unbelievers (Rev. 16 : 18–20).

THE VOICE FROM THE CLOUD.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"While he yet spake, behold, a bright cloud overshadowed them: and behold a voice out of the cloud, which said, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him. And when the disciples heard it, they fell on their face, and were sore afraid. And Jesus came and touched them, and said, Arise, and be not afraid."—MATTHEW 17 : 5–7.

Miracles Alone do not Produce Faith—An Audible Voice not Needed—I. The Voice out of the Cloud—The Cloud Necessary—A Bright Cloud—Three Witnesses—The Sonship of Christ—The Father Pleased—The Mediator Needed—II. The Voice of Jesus—He Went to the Disciples—He Touched Them—The Meaning of the Touch—Sympathy—He Spoke to Them—The Voice of the King.

IT is exceedingly important to have clear evidences of the truth of our holy religion. Sometimes, I dare say, you have wished that God would speak out of heaven in your hearing, or that He would work some extraordinary marvel before your eyes, that you might know beyond all question the truth of the Gospel of Jesus. This desire for signs and wonders is no new thing. Ah, my dear friends, we know not what we ask, nor what we desire; for if such a voice were to come to us out of the excellent glory, we are made of the same flesh and blood as Peter, and James and John, and it would therefore produce the same effect upon us as upon them: we should fall upon our faces, and be sore afraid. Spirituals must grow out of spirituals; saving faith can never be produced by carnal sight and hearing. The Holy Ghost can work faith in us apart from any form of miracle; and miracle alone can never create a spiritual faith.

Do we wish to receive a sign in order to confirm our belief in God? Suppose that we had it, we should soon need to have it repeated, for unbelief dies hard. I cannot tell how often we should need to hear the voice out of the cloud; but certainly life would soon become a misery to us, for we should be so frequently lying on our faces, so often cast into a swoon of fear, that we should be shattered, and nervous, and incapable of the ordinary duties of life. Like Israel at Sinai, we should begin to entreat that the Lord would not speak to us any more. The fact is that the voice of God, as absolute God, is too awful, too majestic, for mortal ears, and the sight of overwhelming miracles would put such that it is better for us to be without them. It is plain from the example of Israel in the wilderness that even the lowest form of grace does not grow out of frequent miracles, for the tribes fell into every form of evil, though they lived on miracles, and even ate and drank the result thereof. Not signs and wonders without, but a new heart within, is the grand cure for unbelief. Christ in you is the hope of glory and the death of doubt; anything else will fall short of your need.

According to our text, what is wanted is, not an audible voice of God to confirm the evidences of our religion, but the touch and the voice of Christ to make us conscious within ourselves of the power of Him to whom God bears witness. Not external, but internal evidences are what we need. The best evidences in the world are what we call experimental, such as grow out of actual experience. It is a better thing for a man to live near to Christ, and to enjoy His presence, than it would be for him to be overshadowed with a bright cloud, and to hear the divine Father Himself speaking out of it. The voice out of the cloud would but dismay and distract; the voice of Christ would cheer and comfort, and at the same time would be an equally powerful assurance to us of the divinity of the whole matter.

Assurance is the thing which we so much desire, and we can better obtain it by personal test than by any external witness. Brethren, the most profitable thing for me at any rate is not so much to study evidences or to seek them, as to enjoy the Gospel itself by personal contact with the Christ of God. You may be told that this is the bread of heaven, but you will not know it, however heavenly the voice, one half so vividly as if you eat thereof and live; then shall you know when Jesus touches you and bids you "be not afraid." A miraculous interposition would crush as well as convince; a spiritual visitation and a consoling word will convince as certainly, and it will comfort at the same time.

This morning I propose to treat the subject thus: First, let us hear the voice out of the cloud; and then, secondly, let us hear the voice of Jesus. May the Holy Spirit sweetly enable us to hearken diligently in each case.

I. First: Let us hearken to the voice that speaketh out of the cloud. Observe at the outset the words, "Behold, a bright cloud overshadowed them." When God draws near to man it is absolutely necessary that His glory should be veiled. No man can see His face and live. Hence the cloud, in this instance, and in other cases; hence that thick veil which hung over the entrance to the most holy place; hence the need of the incense to fill that place with smoke when the high-priest once in the year went within the veil; hence above all the need of the body and the manhood of Christ that the Godhead may be softened to our view. The God shines graciously through the man, and we behold the brightness of the Father's glory without being blinded thereby.

THERE MUST BE A CLOUD.

Yet it was a bright cloud which in this case yielded the shadow, and not a thick darkness like that which became the canopy of Deity at the giving of the law. Then Mount Sinai was altogether on a smoke, and the Lord sat enthroned amid thick darkness. On other occasions we read, "He made darkness His secret place; His pavilion round about Him were dark waters and thick clouds of the skies;" but now on Tabor, where God bears peaceful witness to His well-beloved Son, He veils Himself in a brightness significant of His good pleasure toward the sons of men.

There were but three who saw this glory of the Transfiguration, and heard the Father's voice; such signs are not for unholy eyes and ears. It is not needful that you and I therefore should see the transfigured Saviour; the fact of the transfiguration is quite as sure as if we did see it, for three men saw it of whose truthfulness we have no question. The testimony of honest men is all that we can have about most things, and we are accustomed to accept it and act thereon; in this case we may be as sure as if we had ourselves been there, and had ourselves seen and heard.

Coming to the words themselves, the Father said, "This is My beloved Son." "This." As if He called their attention away from Moses and Elias, and said, "This is he of whom I speak to you. He is above the law and the prophets, He is My Son." There was a question among the Jews who the Messiah should be; they believed in the Messiah, but they did not know when He would come, nor where, nor how; and hence, when He did come, they made a mistake and missed Him. Here the great Father points to Jesus at Nazareth, who is the Son of Mary as to His flesh, and He says, "This is My beloved Son." It is a word of demonstration and distinction, by which He marks Him out from all others as His own nearest and dearest one. They could make no mistake whatever about the person; the word of the Lord so distinctly pointed Him out.

While it thus pointed Him out personally as being present, it separated Him from all others, and set Him apart by Himself as the sole and only one. "This is My beloved Son," and no one else may claim that title. Truly, other sons are the Lord's by adoption and regeneration, but none are such in the sense in which the Lord said, "This is My beloved Son." Beyond all others and in a special sense He is "the only begotten Son." "Unto which of the angels said He at any time, Thou art My Son, this day have I begotten Thee?" We do not understand, we cannot understand, the doctrine of the eternal filiation of the Son of God. I suppose it is to be well-nigh profane to endeavor to look into that sublime mystery; a holy delicacy forbids; and besides, the glory is too bright; we lack the eyes which could perceive anything in such a blaze of light. This, however, we may observe; namely that Jesus is not the Son of God so that the idea exactly tallies with sonship among men; for He is coequal and coeternal with the Father; and He is Himself called "the Mighty God, the everlasting Father." He is not of fewer years than the Father, for "in the beginning was the Word." Yet doubtless sonship is the nearest approach to the great mystery which could be found among human similitudes, and the word "Son" is the nearest description that could be given in human language.

"This is My Son." Moses and Elias were His servants—Jesus alone was His Son. By His being thus called Son we are taught that Jesus is of the same nature as God—is indeed God. A man is the father of a man; a man is not the father of that which he makes with his own hands, such as a statue or a painting; but a man is the father of another who is of as himself, and the Lord Jesus Christ is of the same nature as God in all respects—a true Son. The Lord Jesus Christ is equal in nature to the Father, and therefore He counts it not robbery to be equal with God, and He receives the same honor and worship as the Father, as saith the Scripture, "that all men should honor the Son even as they honor the Father. He that honoreth not the Son honoreth not the Father which hath sent Him."

For a minute let me dwell upon this declaration. "This is My Son." Does it not teach us the great love of God to us guilty creatures? "He spared not His own Son." You perceive the love of Abraham to God when he is ready to offer up Isaac at the Lord's bidding. Remember the words, "Take now thy son, thine only son, Isaac, whom thou lovest, and offer him for a burnt-offering." This is just what the great Father did for us; and yet we were His enemies, living in alienation and in open rebellion against Him. Hear, O heavens, and wonder, O earth! He spared not His own Son, but freely delivered Him up for us all! "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that God loved us, and sent His Son to be the propitiation for our sins." What gratitude this should create! What devotion it should bring! "This is My Son." When you see Jesus on Tabor or on Calvary, you see God giving Himself to us, that we might not perish, but have everlasting life. What a Saviour this must be! How confidently may you and I trust Him!

Do you remind me that I have left out one word? The Father said, "This is My beloved Son." I have by no means forgotten it, for though I cannot speak as I would upon that word, yet it is exceedingly sweet in my ears. "This is My beloved Son." We none of us know our Lord is of the Father. We love our children, we love them as our own souls, we could not measure our affection for them; but still we are finite and so are our children, and the finite to the finite yields but a finite love; but here is an Infinite Father with an Infinite Son, and He loves Him infinitely. Why should He not? He is most near to Him; His own Son. Why should He not? He is in all things like unto Him in nature, dignity, character, and glory. Oh that we might have grace to trust without wavering in this glorious Son of God!

Permit me now to introduce to you the second of the sentences: "In whom

I AM WELL PLEASED."

I have heard it quoted, "With whom I am well pleased." The alteration cannot be tolerated; it robs the language of half its sense. True, God is pleased with Christ, but that is not all that He says here; He is pleased in Him, which means not only that God is eternally, infinitely pleased with Jesus Christ Himself, but that God Himself is reconciled and pleased as we view Him in His Son. The Lord looks down upon those who are in Christ with an intense affection, and loves them even as He loves the Son, for that is the meaning of this word, "In whom I am well pleased." All who are in Christ Jesus are pleasing to God; yea, God in Christ looks with divine satisfaction upon all those who trust His Son; He is not only pleased, but well pleased. If you are pleased with Jesus, God is pleased with you; if you are in the Son, then you are in the Father's good pleasure. I wish I could speak at length upon this; but I might weary you upon this close and sultry day, when your spirit truly is willing but your flesh is weak. Oh, the charm of this voice of God! Each word has a divine emphasis upon it. It is not the voice of man, but of the Eternal Himself.

Consider, next, the third word, which is,

"HEAR YE HIM."

Listen to what he says; remember it carefully; endeavor to understand it; heartily accept and believe it; confidently trust in it, and cheerfully obey it. All these precepts are wrapt up in the expression "Hear ye Him;" as we could prove if there were time available. "Hear ye Him:" it is as if the Father said, "You need not hear Moses any longer; hear ye Him. You need not listen to Elias any more; hear ye My Son." There are thousands of priests in the world who say, "Hear us;" but the Father says "Hear Him." Many voices clamor for our attention; new philosophies, modern theologies, and old heresies revived, all call to us and entreat us to hearken, but the Father says, "Hear Him." As if He said, "Hear Him and none besides." Does any man claim to be a successor of Christ? The Father speaks of no succession, but bids us, "Hear Him." If Jesus were dead and His prophetic office extinct we might hear others; but since He liveth, we hear rolling along the ages and distinctly crying, "Hear ye Him." Brethren beloved, do not hear me as though I spake of myself, for I have no more claim upon your attention than any other man. I speak faultily, for I know but in part, and prophesy in part. So far as I speak my own mind, I speak in vanity; but if I speak the words of Christ, and the truth which the Spirit of God has revealed, then it is no longer I that speak, but Christ Himself that speaks, and then you are bound by the Word from the Father, which saith, "Hear ye Him." Oh, to be content with hearing Christ, and letting other voices go away into the eternal silence.

THE CELESTIAL VOICE

"This is My beloved Son; hear ye Him." It does seem to me as if the great Father said, "I have spoken to you once, with my own voice, and I see you fall upon your faces with fear; evidently you cannot bear my immediate presence. I see your faces blanched with fright; you lie prone upon the ground, stiff with dismay; I will speak no more directly from myself; I have made my beloved Son your Mediator; hear Him." Is it not gracious on His part that He should no more speak with us Himself, but reveal Himself by His Son, whose name is "the Word of God?" Remember what Israel said at Sinai to Moses, the typical mediator: "Speak Thou with us and we will hear; but let not God speak with us, lest we die." To this the Lord replied to Moses, "They have well said all that they have spoken." The Lord recognized at once the need of a mediator, and He finds us one in the person of the Well-beloved as He says, "Hear ye Him." This day God saith to men, "Come not to Me at the first; go to My Son. No man cometh to the Father but by Jesus Christ His Son. Blessed ordinance of that gracious One who knoweth our frame and remembereth that we are dust! He hath spoken to us by His Son; let us incline our ear and come unto Him, let us hear that our soul may live.

This links on the first part of my discourse to the second, upon which I will speak as briefly as I can, though the subject might well demand a full sermon.

II. Secondly, let us hear

THE VOICE OF JESUS.

The Father Himself has sent us to Jesus, and unto Jesus let us go. "When the disciples heard it, they fell on their face, and were sore afraid. And Jesus came and touched them, and said, Arise, and be not afraid." Dear friends, I think you will be cured of desiring miracles, and of wishing to hear voices from God, if you well consider the effect of the Divine voice upon these favored apostles. You could not bear the voice divine any better than they could; if, indeed, so well. I hope that you will now be content with what the Father recommends to you, namely, that you hear His beloved Son Jesus Christ our Lord. The apostles, one would have thought, needed not to have been afraid, for they were holy men; engaged in the best possible business, and in the company of their Lord who was their protector and friend; and yet such is the amazing power of the glory of God upon the human mind that they fell on their faces. So was it with Job, and Daniel, and Isaiah, and Habakkuk, and all such holy men; the presence of the Lord filled them with fear and trembling and self-abhorrence.

See how Jesus acts to His three disciples. We might have thought that they would have hastened to their Lord. Why did they not? Why did they not cry out to Him, "Master, we perish?" Why did not Peter say, as he did on another occasion, "If it be Thou, bid me come unto Thee?" No; they are overpowered, bewildered, confounded: the glory of the Lord has laid them on their faces as dead, and a sore fright is upon them. Then the incarnate God, their Lord and yet their brother, interposes His sacred ministry. First,

HE COMES TO THEM.

Wycliffe's version puts it, "He came nigh." He approached to them; for any distance is painful when a heart is afraid. Jesus came near to the affrighted three. This is the beauty of our Lord Jesus Christ, that He comes so near to us, poor troubled ones, when we are overwhelmed with the glory of God and our own sense of sin. "The man is near of kin unto us; one of our next kinsmen." God, the glorious, must ever seem to be far off as to our weakness, however near He comes to us in condescending grace. He is in heaven, and we upon earth; He is the Creator, and we are the creatures of an hour. The Lord Jesus comes so very near to us because He bears our nature, and is bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh. We may be familiar with Him, and yet incur no censure.

He is the same Christ at this hour as in the days of His flesh; He is still in the habit of visiting His people and manifesting Himself to them as He doth not to the world. Brothers, do not ask evidence any more; do not begin searching books to find out arguments and reasons. Ask Jesus to come to you; His presence will stand instead of all reasoning, and be better far. Communion with Christ supplies the soul with irresistible arguments as to His being, His love, His power, His Godhead. Actual nearness to Him clothes the mind with a coat of mail which wards off every arrow of unbelief. Let Christ come to us, and questions and doubts are heard no more. Quibblings are nailed to His cross; insinuations fall dead at His feet. This assurance works in an infinitely better manner than if out of yon black cloud God Himself were to speak to us in thunder-tones.

When Jesus came, the next thing He did was,

HE TOUCHED THEM.

This is to me most precious; as they lie there all fainting He touches Peter, and touches James, and touches John, just as in after days we read, "He laid His right hand upon me, saying unto me, Fear not." That was His way of healing those diseased with leprosy. The blind man He touched and gave him sight, and the dead maiden was thus revived. Oh, the power of His touch! Our touch of Jesus saves us; what will not His touch of us do? We are so much made up of feeling, after all, that we want to know that the Lord really feels for us, and will enter so tenderly into our case as to touch us. That touch reassures our fainting hearts, and we know our Lord to be Emanuel, God with us.

Sympathy! This is the meaning of that human touch of a hand which is nevertheless divine. Oh, how sweetly Christ has touched us by being a partaker in all that is human! He touched us everywhere: in poverty, for He had not where to lay His head; in thirst, for He sat by the well and said, "Give Me to drink;" in anguish, for He was betrayed by His friend. He has touched us in depression of spirit, for He cried, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death." He is touched with a feeling of our infirmities, "for He was tempted in all points like as we are." An absolute God does not seem to touch us with a fellow-feeling: He pities us as a father pitieth his children, yet in this He is above us, and our fears prevent our reaching up to Him; for tenderest sympathy in adversity a brother must be born, and Jesus is that brother. We are frail and sinful; and Jesus touches us in both respects, for He has taken our flesh and carried away our sins. He was "numbered with the transgressors," thus He touched transgressors; and He became frail even as we are, until at last He said, "I am a worm, and no man;" thus He touched our infirmities.

Dear friends, nothing so cheers the heart as of Christ, for if you have felt it you will bear witness that contact with His wondrous person is like life from the dead. Virtue comes out of Christ to us when His garment's hem and our finger meet. The contact of grace on His part and faith on our part brings into us strength, light, joy, and all else that is laid up in Jesus to meet our wants. The hand of Jesus is laid upon us, and in the strength which it gives a man might dash through hell and climb to heaven. Ezra said, "I was strengthened as the hand of the Lord my God was upon me." Touched with the Almighty Sufferer's sacred sympathy, we glory in tribulation, and triumph in death. Is not this more effective evidence of the truth of the Gospel and of the commission of Christ than if the Lord God should again speak out of a cloud? To feel the wondrous power of Christ strengthening our hearts, surely this is the most certain witness.

Next time you read of the Red Sea, and of God's dividing it for His people, and drowning Pharaoh in the deep waters, do not say to yourself, "I wish I had been there!" but pray God to make a way for you through your troubles, and to dry up the Red Sea of your sins, and lead you into Canaan. Pardoned sin will make you rejoice in Him. It must have been a fine demonstration of God's glorious majesty when he sent a thick darkness over all the land, even darkness that might be felt. For my part, I count it a more-to-be desired demonstration of the power of God when He took away my thick darkness and brought me into His marvellous light. When He turned all the waters of Egypt into blood, so that they loathed to drink of the river, it was a sure proof that God was there; but to my soul it was a more assuring proof when He turned my water into wine, and made my ordinary life to become like the life of those in heaven by His sovereign grace.

So there were two actions of Christly sympathy—Jesus came near, and touched them.

But always the great thing with Jesus is His Word—He spake to them. He is the Word, and as the Word He proves His Godhead. "Where is, there is power." Jesus, after He had touched them, said, "Arise, be not afraid." Precious Word! "Arise, be not afraid." When the Word of Jesus Christ comes with power to our discouraged souls, and we are made strong in confidence, then we are persuaded of the truth of the Gospel. When we are disabled from the divine service through fear, and Jesus renews our strength by saying, "Arise," so that we are able to work again, then do we believe and are sure. "The joy of the Lord is our strength." Whenever the blessed Comforter reveals Christ to us so that we are cheered and made glad in the midst of our tribulations, then we need not ask for signs and wonders, nor for voices speaking out of the cloud; it is enough, the truth is sealed in our consciences. The voice of Christ is better far than all other manifestations, for it does not leave us swooning with fear, but sends us out to fight the battles of the Lord.

This is the sum of what I have spoken unto you. Ask not signs and wonders which God will not give; but "Hear ye Him." Listen to Jesus by faith, and your personal experience of His presence shall be to you all that you need by way of assurance. Live on Christ, live in Christ, live with Christ, and this shall be better to you than visions or bright clouds, or celestial voices, or all supposable evidences. This shall make your spirit leap and your heart rejoice, till the day break and the shadows flee away, and you see God, even the Father, face to face in glory. May the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you evermore. Amen.

MARTYRDOM OF JOHN BRADFORD.

PRE-EMINENT among the most shining lights of the Reformation of the sixteenth century stands the illustrious and devoted John Bradford, who, after a brief though brilliant career as a minister of the Gospel of Christ, was burned at the stake, leaving a name which, like that of his Divine Master, was "as ointment poured forth."

He appears to have been born about 1522–1525. He was of "gentle birth," became a proficient in Latin, and entered the Inner Temple, London, as a law student in 1547. Under the faithful preaching of Bishop Ridley his heart was turned to God, and a corresponding change in his purposes and plans took place. He surrendered himself entirely to the call of Christ. "His chains, rings, and jewels of gold" were quickly sold, and the value given to "Christ's poor members" whenever he found any pining in poverty, and it was not long before he made the determination, "if it be God's will, to go to my books at Cambridge; and if He shall give me grace, to be a minister of His Word."

Bradford accordingly entered the celebrated University in 1548, being then, as seems probable, about three or four-and-twenty years of age. Here he remained two years, obtaining an honorable reputation as a brilliant student and a man of fervent prayer, and holy demeanor. He was one of the six chaplains of the king, Edward VI., who were selected and appointed "to be itineraries, to preach sound doctrine in all the remotest parts of the kingdom."

The young minister took up this duty with real earnestness. He "truly taught and preached the Word of God" in all the district assigned to him. The divine blessing resting upon him gave him heart-searching eloquence. In the last year of Edward's reign, 1553, Bradford was called to preach in the chapel of the palace one of the Lent sermons; and by his denunciation of the levity and ungodliness of the courtiers, and his proclamation of the judgments of God, he seems to have been regarded as speaking prophetically of the horrors of the coming reign.

On July 19th, 1553, Mary was proclaimed Queen, and before a month had elapsed, Bradford was in a dungeon. He was presently joined by Sandys, Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer. In January, 1555, the royal assent was given to an "Act for the revival of the statutes for the punishment of heresy." On the 30th of the same month, Bradford was excommunicated, and subsequently, condemned to be burned for his Protestantism. On the last Sunday afternoon in June, he was informed that he would perish at the stake the next morning, and, to avoid tumult among the people, was confined in Newgate about twelve o'clock the same night.

At nine o'clock on Monday morning, the prison-doors opened, and the martyr came forth. Bradford, having reached the stake, found there John Leaf, a faithful young confessor, though only an apprentice; and the two threw themselves on their faces, and commenced to pray. "Arise, and make an end," said the sheriff, "for the press of the people is great."

At that word they both stood up on their feet, and Bradford took a faggot in his hand, and kissed it, and then reverently embraced and kissed the stake. Then turning to his companion, he said, "Be of good comfort, brother; for we shall have a merry (joyful) supper with the Lord this night; if there be any way to heaven on horseback, or in fiery chariots, this is it." A few minutes later his body was consumed, and his liberated spirit was with God.

MAHOMMEDANS AT PRAYER.

(See Illustration on this page.)

Five times every day the call for prayers sounds from the mosques of Mahommedan cities. In the morning before sunrise, immediately after noon, just before sunset, soon after sunset, and late at night, the cry sounds, "God is great! Mahommed is the apostle of God! Come to prayers! Come to salvation! God is great!" This invitation has been proclaimed with unceasing regularity five times a day during 1261 years, and every traveller in the lands dominated by this religion bears witness to the obedience the followers of Mahommed render to it. If they are in the city they leave their business and go to the mosques; if they are in the desert they prostrate themselves and pray. Whatever their race and language may be they must pray in Arabic, and in the words prescribed by the Koran, the Mahommedan Bible.

The Koran is a collection of the sayings of Mahommed, and his account of the revelations he said he received from God. It was not written until after his death, and as he could neither read nor write, it was compiled from notes made by his disciples and from the memories of those who had listened to his addresses. It forms the rule of life of 175,000,000 of the human race, who turn to it for guidance, and who accept it as their law and the foundation of faith. It teaches the unity of God, the duty of giving alms to the poor, especially orphans, hospitality to wayfarers, the necessity of regular times of prayer, fidelity in the fulfilment of engagements, and patience under the ills and trials of life, and the certainty of a day of judgment. The approach of that day is, it declares, to be heralded by twenty-five signs, some of which are very singular, such as the sun rising in the west, the appearance of a strange beast in the great temple at Mecca, the coming of Jesus Christ who is to descend upon one of the minarets of the mosque of Damascus, and the rushing of a mighty wind that will sweep away the souls of all who have a grain of faith in their hearts. Then follows the resurrection of the dead, of judgment, in which none will be wronged by a hair's-breadth. All men will walk over a bridge called Sirat, fixed in the midst of hell, sharper than the edge of a sword and finer than a hair. On that bridge the feet of the wicked will slip, and they will fall into hell, while the good will walk over safely into Paradise.

Many passages in the Koran are sublime in thought and diction, and bear a striking resemblance to the imagery of the prophets of the Old Testament, but the narrative of the life of Jesus is debased and puerile. Mahommed taught that God had revealed Himself to Abraham and the Patriarchs, to Moses and the prophets, to Jesus, and finally to himself; that Jesus was the Word of God, cast into the Virgin Mary, the Messiah of God, but not divine, and that He was not crucified, but Judas transformed into the image of Christ was crucified in His stead.

Mahommed's teachings and the similarity they and the Koran bear to the Jewish religion are explained by the fact that he belonged to the Hanifs. They were a tribe who became disgusted with the idolatry of the East. They officiated in the temple of Mecca where there were three hundred and sixty-five idols, but they resolved to quit idolatry, and they sent out men to find a new religion, the cardinal doctrine of which should be that there was but one God. Some of these men became Christians, others espoused Judaism, while others adopted no religion, but remained praying for light.

While, however, there is so much in Mahommedanism to remind us of the Bible, it lacks the one essential feature of the fatherhood of God and the divinity and atonement of Christ. Lord Houghton finely expresses this defect in his well-known lines:

"Mahomed's truth lay in a book,
Christ's in a sacred life,
So while the world rolls on from change to change,
And realms of thought expand,
The letter stands without expanse or range,
Stiff as a dead man's hand.
While as the life blood fills the growing form,
The spirit Christ has shed
Flows through the ripening ages fresh and warm,
More felt than heard or read."

THE LOYALIST'S SERMON.

(See Illustration.)

In the summer of the year 1765 there was a large congregation gathered one Sunday morning in a church in New York. The preacher was a man of some eloquence, a well-known loyalist and a theologian of the strictest Tory type. Not that the Rev. David Rees studied politics or closely concerned himself with the events of the day, but his Toryism was the product of his theology, and interpreting Scripture as he did, he naturally arrived at the conclusion that in the disputes then pending, the King and Parliament were right and the colonists wrong.

He had not studied the questions involved. Why should he do so? Had not the Bible declared that the King was to be honored? Doubtless it had, and therefore David Rees felt he had no need to inquire further. He was prepared to honor the King and so do his duty, and he was also prepared, after the manner of his class, to tell other people how to do theirs. Therefore, David Rees when invited to preach in the New York Church had his sermon ready, and having announced his text "The powers that be are ordained of God" (Rom. 13 : 1), he proceeded to apply the passage to the existing condition of affairs. He proved to his own satisfaction and to the satisfaction of the aristocratic congregation before him that non-resistance was the Christian's duty under all circumstances, and that whatever might be the burden laid upon the shoulders of the people by its legitimate rulers, organized resistance was a sin. It was a neat, compact argument, fortified with numerous quotations from Scripture, and unanswerable from the preacher's point of view. The sermon ended, the preacher descended from his desk, and receiving from his friends as he left the church compliments and praises on having demolished the King's enemies, the Rev. David Rees, well satisfied with himself, started on his walk home through fields which are now covered thickly with busy streets.

He was walking briskly, his Bible under his arm and his stout staff in his hand, when he heard a voice behind him calling him by name. He turned and saw Seth Allen, a gentleman he knew well by reputation and whom he occasionally met. The clergyman did not desire his company so much as Mr. Allen apparently desired to confer that privilege upon him, for Mr. Rees, giving him a patronizing nod, continued his walk. But Mr. Allen came at a brisk pace, and was soon by the side of the preacher.

"I heard your sermon this morning," he said, "and I should like to talk to you about it."

"Say on, my friend," said the clergyman. "Are there any questions you would like to ask about it?"

"Yes, a few. I want to know whether you have read the news about the Stamp Act, and if you think we ought to obey that?"

"My good friend, I seldom read the news," said the clergyman; "this is the book I read; it is the Word of God, and that is sufficient for me."

"I thought so," responded Seth Allen; "now, see here, haven't you been talking this morning about things you don't understand? You have been telling us our duty in circumstances you have never realized. Now, I should like to tell you the kind of inquity this Stamp Act is."

The Loyalist Preacher Reproved.

"No, my good friend, I cannot enter into that; the Bible is my guide, and that tells me to obey the powers that be, and whatever the Stamp Act or any other act may be, my duty is to obey."

"But see," persisted Seth Allen, "you would not shut your eyes and obey anything, would you? Why, you might commit great sins in that way. A wicked king might order you to preach things you don't believe, or to celebrate mass in your church; you would not do that, would you?"

"No, no, God forbid," said the clergyman. "I would disobey if my conscience directed me. God before the King always. That is a higher duty."

"Ah! then you admit there are causes that would justify resistance to the powers that be. Now, I think this Act is one of them, and if our people vote to resist it, I shall go into the movement with all my heart."

"Then you will be very wrong, my friend," said the clergyman. It will be a direct violation of an apostolic injunction."

"See here, Mr. Rees," said Seth Allen, "you are a clergyman. You own that your rule, as you understand it, would not hold good in all cases. Now, you preach the Gospel and tell men how to be saved and let politics alone till you understand 'em better. That's my advice to you. No charge," he added humorously, "but it's worth taking, all the same."

Mr. Rees was left alone, his adviser having disappeared down the track that led to his own home. He had received some rather homely but forcible advice, and he was uncomfortable. Seth Allen appeared to think he had neglected a duty, and performed another duty which was not his, and for which he was not fitted. Could that be true? Thinking the matter over as he walked, he could not but admit that if any soul in that church that morning had been anxiously inquiring the way of salvation he would not have learned it from his sermon. He might have learned his political duty, but even as to that Seth Allen had laid his finger on a flaw in his argument that he had not seen. Was it possible that he had misunderstood the passage? These questions were serious ones for Mr. Rees, and he cogitated as he walked.

On his arrival at home he entered his study, and there falling upon his knees, he prayed for direction. The result of his prayers was that a political sermon never afterward went from his lips. He preached the way of salvation, and tried to instil into the souls of his hearers right principles, and when more than ten years afterward the young Republic was passing through the crisis of its history, there was no visitor more welcome at the bedsides of the wounded, no preacher more attentively listened to by the brave soldiers of Washington's little army, than David Rees, who once preached "obedience to the powers that be."

MRS. CHANTREY'S SECRET.

A SERIAL STORY.

Friendly Solicitude.

IT was some months after David Chantrey had gone to Madeira that Ann Holland was lingering late one evening over her door, watching the little street subside into the quietness of night. The wife of one of her best customers was passing by, and stopped to speak to her.

"Have you happened to hear any talk of Mrs. Chantrey?" she asked. Her voice fell into a low and mysterious tone, and she glanced up and down the street lest any one should chance to be within hearing. Ann Holland quickly guessed there was something important to be told, and she opened the half-door to her neighbor.

"Come in, Mrs. Brown," she said; "Richard's not at home yet."

She led the way into the room behind the shop, as pleasant a place as any in all Upton, except for the scent of the leather, which she had grown so used to that its absence would have seemed a loss. It was a kitchen spotlessly clean, with an old-fashioned polished dresser and shelves above it filled with pewter plates and dishes, upon which every gleam of firelight twinkled. A tall mahogany clock, with its head against the ceiling, and the round, good-humored face of a full moon beaming above its dial-plate, stood in one corner; while in the opposite one there was a corner cupboard with glass doors, filled with antique china cups and tea-pots, and a Chinese mandarin that never ceased to roll its head to and fro helplessly.

Beau-pots of flowers, as Ann Holland called them, covered the broad window-sill; and a screen, adorned with fragments of old ballads, and with newspaper announcements of births, deaths, and marriages among Upton people, was drawn across the outer door, which opened into a little garden at the back of the house. There was a miniature parlor behind the kitchen, filled with furniture worked in tent stitch by Ann Holland's mother, and carefully covered with white dimity; but it was only entered on most important occasions. Even Mr. Chantrey had never yet been invited into it; for any event short of a solemn crisis the kitchen was considered good enough.

"You haven't heard anything of Mrs. Chantrey, then?" repeated Mrs. Brown, still in low and important tones, as she seated herself in a three-cornered chair, a seat of honor rather than of ease, as one could not get a comfortable position without sitting sideways.

"No, nothing," answered Ann Holland; "nothing bad about Mr. Chantrey, I hope. Have they had any bad news of him?"

Mrs. Brown was first cousin to Mrs. Bolton's butler, and was naturally regarded as an oracle with regard to all that went on at Bolton Villa.

"Oh no, he's all right; not him, but her," she answered, almost in a whisper; "I can't say for certain it's true, for Cousin James purses up his mouth ever so when it's spoken of; but cook swears to it, and he doesn't deny it, you know. I shouldn't like it to go any farther; but I can depend on you, Miss Holland. A trusted woman like you must be choked up with secrets, I'm sure. I often and often say, Ann Holland knows some things, and could tell them, too, if she'd only open her lips."

"You're right, Mrs. Brown," said Ann Holland, with a gratified smile; "you may trust me with any secret."

"Well, then, they say," continued Mrs. Brown, "that Mrs. Chantrey takes more than is good for her. She's getting fond of it, you know; anything that'll excite her; and ladies can get all sorts of things, worse for them a dozen times than what poor folks take. They say she doesn't know what she's saying often."

"Dear, dear!" cried Ann Holland, in a sorrowful voice; "it can't be true, and Mr. Chantrey away! She's such a sweet pleasant-spoken young lady; I could never think it of her. He brought her here the very first week after they came to Upton, and she sat in that very chair you're set on, Mrs. Brown, and I thought her the prettiest picture I'd seen for many a year; and so did he, I'm sure. It can't be true, and him such a good man, and such a preacher as he is, with all the gentry round coming in their carriages to church."

"Well, it mayn't be true," answered Mrs. Brown, slowly, as if the arguments used by Ann Holland were almost weighty enough to outbalance the cook's evidence; "I hope it isn't true, I'm sure. But they say at Bolton Villa it's a awful lonely life she do lead without Master Charlie, and Mrs. Bolton away so much. It 'ud give me the horrors, I know, to live in that house with all those white plaster men and women as big as life, standing everywhere about staring at you with blind eyes. I should want something to keep up my spirits. But I'm sure nobody could be sorrier than me if it turned out to be true."

"Sorry!" exclaimed Ann Holland, "why, I'd cut my right hand off to prevent it being true. No words can tell how good Mr. Chantrey's been to me. Everybody knows what my poor brother is, and how he'll drink and drink for weeks together. Well, Mr. Chantrey's turned in here of an evening, and if Richard was away at the Upton Arms, he's gone after him into the very bar-room itself, and brought him home, just guiding him and dandling him like a baby, poor fellow! Often and often he's promised to take the pledge with Richard, but he never could get him to say Yes. No, no! I'd go through fire and water before that should be true."

"Nobody could be sorrier than me," persisted Mrs. Brown, somewhat offended at Ann Holland's vehemence; "I've only told you hearsay, but it comes direct from the cook, and Cousin James only pursed up his mouth. I don't say it's true or it's not true, but nobody in Upton could be sorrier than me if my words come correct. It can't be hidden under a bushel very long, Miss Holland; but I hope as much as you do that it isn't true."

Yet there was an undertone of conviction in Mrs. Brown's manner of speaking that grieved Ann Holland sorely. She accompanied her departing guest to the door, and long after she was out of sight stood looking vacantly down the darkened street. There was little light or sound there now, except in the Upton Arms, where the windows glistened brightly, and the merry tinkling of a violin sounded through the open door. Her brother was there, she knew, and would not be home before midnight. He had been less manageable since Mr. Chantrey went away.

She could not bear to think of Mrs. Chantrey falling into the same sin. The delicate, pretty, refined young lady degrading herself to the level of the poor drunken wretch she called her brother! Ann Holland could not and would not believe it; it seemed too monstrous a scandal to deserve a moment's anxiety. Yet when she went back into her lonely kitchen, her eyes were dim with tears, partly for her brother and partly for Sophy Chantrey.

Ann Holland was a great favorite with Mrs. Bolton. The elderly, old-fashioned woman held firmly to all old-fashioned ways; knew her duty to God and her duty to her neighbor, as taught by the Church Catechism, and faithfully fulfilled them to the best of her power. She ordered herself lowly and reverently to all her betters, especially to the widow of an archdeacon. No new-fangled, radical notions, such as her drunken brother picked up, could find any encouragement from her. Mrs. Bolton always enjoyed an interview with her, so marked was her deference. She had occasionally condescended to visit Ann Holland in her kitchen, and sit on the projecting angle of the three-cornered chair, a favor duly appreciated by her delighted hostess. Mr. Chantrey ran in often, as he was passing by, partly because he felt a real friendship for the true-hearted, struggling old maid, and partly to see after her good-for-nothing brother. As Ann Holland had said herself, she was ready to go through fire and water for the sake of these friends and patrons of hers, whose kindness was the brightest element in her life.

After much tearful deliberation, she resolved upon the daring step of going to Bolton Villa, on an errand to Mrs. Bolton, with a vague hope that she might discover how false this cruel scandal was. There was a bridle of Mrs. Bolton's in the shop, which had been sent for a new curb, and she would take it home herself. Early the next afternoon, therefore, she clad herself in her best Sunday clothes, and made her way slowly along the streets toward the church. It was but slowly, for she rarely went out on a week day, when her neighbors' shops were open; and there were too many attractions in the windows for even her anxiety and consciousness of a solemn mission to resist altogether.

The church and the rectory looked so peaceful amid the trees, just tinged with the hues of autumn, that Ann Holland's spirits insensibly revived. There was little sign of life about the rectory, for no one was living in it at present but Mr. Warden, the clergyman who had taken Mr. Chantrey's duty. Ann Holland opened the churchyard gate and strolled pensively up among the graves to the porch, that she might rest a little and ponder over what she should say to Mrs. Bolton. There was not a grave there that she did not know; those lying under many of the grassy sods were as familiar to her as the men and women now in full life in the neighboring town. Just within sight, near the vestry window was a little mound covered with flowers, where she had seen a little child of David and Sophy Chantrey's laid to rest. A narrow path was worn up to it; more bare and trodden than before Mr. Chantrey had gone away. Ann Holland knew as well as if she had seen her, that the poor solitary mother had worn the grass away.

The church door was open; for Mr. Warden had chosen to make the vestry his study, and had intimated to all the parish that there he might generally be found if any one among them wished to see him in any difficulty or sorrow. Though this was well known, no one of Mr. Chantrey's parishioners had gone to him for counsel; for he was a grave, stern, silent man, whose opinion it was difficult to guess at and impossible to fathom. He was unmarried, and kept no servant, except the housekeeper who had been left in charge of the rectory. All society he avoided, especially that of women. His abruptness and shyness in their presence was painful both to himself and them.

To Mrs. Bolton, however, he was studiously civil, and to Sophy, his friend's wife, he would gladly have shown kindness and sympathy, if he had only known how. He often watched her tracing the narrow foot-worn track to her baby's grave, and he longed to speak some friendly words of comfort to her, but none came to his mind when they encountered each other. No one in Upton, except Ann Holland, had seen, as he had, how thin and wan her face grew; nor had any one noticed as soon as he had done the strangeness of her manner at times, the unsteadiness of her step and the flush upon her face, as she now and then passed to and fro under the yew-trees. But he had never had the courage to speak to her at such moments; and there was only a mournful suspicion and dread in his heart, which he did his best to hide from himself.

This afternoon Mrs. Bolton had sought him in the vestry, where he had been silently brooding over his parish and its sins and sorrows, in the dim, green light shining through the lattice window, which was thickly overgrown with ivy. Mrs. Bolton was a handsome woman still, always handsomely dressed, as became a wealthy archdeacon's widow. Her presence seemed to fill up the little vestry; and as she occupied his old, high-backed chair, Mr. Warden stood opposite to her, looking down painfully and shyly at the floor on which he stood, rather than at the distinguished personage who was visiting him.

"I come to you," she said, in a decisive, emphatic voice, "as a clergyman, as well as my nephew's confidential friend. What I say to you must go no farther than ourselves. We have no confessional in our church, thank Heaven! but that which is confided to a clergyman, even to a curate, ought to be as sacred as a confession."

"Certainly," answered Mr. Warden, with painful abruptness.

"Sacred as a confession!" repeated Mrs. Bolton. "I must tell you, then, that I am in the greatest trouble about my nephew's wife. You know how ill she was last winter, after he went away. A low, nervous fever, which hung over her for months. She would not listen to my telling David about it, and, indeed, I was reluctant to distress and disturb him about a matter that he could not help. But she is very strange now; very strange and flighty. Possibly you may have observed some change in her?"

"Yes," he replied, still looking down on the floor, but seeing a vision of Sophy pacing the beaten track to the little grave under the vestry window.

"When she was at the worst," pursued Mrs. Bolton, "and I had the best advice in London for her, she was ordered to take the best wine we could get. I told Brown to bring out for her use some very choice port, purchased by the archdeacon years ago. She must have perished without it; but unfortunately—I speak to you as her pastor, in confidence—she has grown fond of it."

"Fond of it?" repeated Mr. Warden.

"Yes," she answered, emphatically; "I leave the cellar entirely in Brown's charge; a very trusty servant; and I find that Mrs. Chantrey has lately been in the habit of getting a great deal too much from him. But she will take anything she can get that will either stupefy or excite her. She never writes to David until her spirits are raised by stimulants of one kind or another. It is a temptation I cannot understand. I take a proper quantity, just as when the archdeacon was alive, and I never think of exceeding that. I need no more, and I desire no more. But Mrs. Chantrey grows quite excited, almost violent at times. It makes me more anxious than words can express."

There was a long pause, Mr. Warden neither lifting his head nor opening his mouth. His pale face flushed a little, and his lips quivered. David Chantrey was his dearest friend, and an almost intolerable sense of shame and dread kept him silent. His wife, of whom he always spoke so tenderly in all his letters to him! The very spot where he was listening to this charge against her, David's vestry, seemed to deepen the shame of it, and the unutterable sorrow, if it should be true.

"What would you counsel me to do?" asked Mrs. Bolton, after a time. "Must I write to my nepnew and tell him?"

"Do!" he cried with sudden eargerness and emphasis; "do! Take the temptation out of her way at once. Let everything of the kind be removed from the house. Let no one touch it, or mention it in her presence. Guard her as you would guard a child from taking deadly poison."

"Impossible!" exclaimed Mrs. Bolton. "Have no wine in my house? You forget my station and its duties, Mr. Warden. I must give dinner parties occasionally; I must allow beer to my servants. It is absurd. Nobody could expect me to take such a step as that."

"Listen to me," he said, earnestly, and with an authority quite at variance with his ordinary shyness. "I do not venture to hope for any other remedy. I have known men, ay, and women, who have not dared to pass close by the doors of a tavern for fear lest they should catch but the smell of it, and become brutes again in spite of themselves. Others have not dared even to think of it. If Mrs. Chantrey be falling into this sin, there is no other course for you to pursue than to banish it from your table, and, if possible, from your house. It is better for her to die, if needs be, than to live a drunkard."

READING OF THE LAW.

S. S. Lesson for July 29, Deut. 27 : 1-8 ; Josh. 8 : 30-35. Golden Text, Deut. 30 : 19. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Purification Followed by Victory—The Altar of Memorial—The True Economy of Time—The Whole Stones of the Altar—The Law Written on Them—An Impressive Scene—Witnesses against Themselves—The Consequences of Disobedience—Thwarted Workers—Secret of Failure—The Consequences of not Hearkening—The Power of the Christian's Law.

THE defeat of the children of Israel at Ai was not permanent. No sooner was the wrong thing put right, than the Lord gave counsel of war, and commanded Joshua to go up against Ai with all the men of war, and the result was complete victory. The Lord never faileth those who trust in Him, His promise is ever sure, and defeat may always be traced to some cause which lies with us, not with Him. If the walls of Jericho fall, do not let us be off our guard, and think that we have power in ourselves to meet enemies or temptations which may assail us. Let victory leave us as its finds us, dependent on our God alone.

After the victory at Ai, "Joshua built

AN ALTAR UNTO THE LORD

God of Israel, in Mount Ebal." This was some little distance from Ai, which came in their way from the Jordan River. God had commanded the children of Israel through Moses, "And it shall be on the day when ye shall pass over Jordan unto the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee, that thou shalt set thee up great stones, and plaster them with plaster ; and thou shalt write upon them all the words of this law, when thou art passed over, that thou mayest go in unto the land which thy Lord thy God giveth thee, a land that floweth with milk and honey ; as the Lord God of thy fathers hath promised thee." "On the day when ye shall pass over Jordan" could hardly mean the literal, self-same day, for the march from Jordan by the way of Ai, would be between thirty and forty miles. Just as "the day of salvation" means an extended period, and the day of the Lord also, so here it must have meant at the time when ye shall pass over Jordan.

The Lord commanded, "Therefore it shall be when ye be gone over Jordan, that ye shall set up these stones, which I command you this day, in Mount Ebal, and thou shalt plaster them with plaster." Joshua and the people were now come to Mount Ebal, the Canaanites around them remained unsubdued, the land was not yet really in their possession ; what was to be done? Could they lose time in writing upon stones? Would it not be better to make sure of the land first, and then write on the stones when the enemies were subdued? Yes, thus would man speak, no doubt, but this is not the way of faith. Oh, how many Christian workers, who are in trouble for money, do not like to lose, time as they think, in praying about it ; they think the right thing is to beg for it, and they will give as their authority a proverb which certainly is not in the Bible, "God helps those who help themselves." The writing of the law, the honoring of the Word of God above any efforts of ours is the greatest economy of time, because it strengthens us in Him, and cements our union with Him. Many a child of God seems to think that a few days or a week spent without active work is loss of time, although God takes the opportunity to write His law upon the heart when He gets His child thus quiet and alone.

Joshua built the altar just as God had commanded, "an altar of stones ; thou shalt not lift up any iron tool upon them. Thou shalt build the altar of the Lord thy God with whole stones." Joshua did not feel at liberty to use his own judgment at all, he built "an altar of whole stones, over which no man hath lift up any iron." Jesus is our Altar, He came from the hand of His Father ready to be the Altar and the Sacrifice. According to God's command "they offered thereon burnt offerings unto the Lord, and sacrificed peace offerings." These two offerings, the burnt offering and the peace offering, were a token that all was right between them and God, that they were well pleasing in His sight, for these were offerings "made by fire, of a sweet savor unto the Lord" (Lev. 1 : 9 ; 3 : 5), and quite different from the sin offering and the trespass offering, in which sin was remembered. There was "nothing between" at this time, their sky was blue, their communion unhindered. "And he wrote then upon the stones a copy of the law of Moses, which he wrote in the presence of the children of Israel." It is not easy to discover whether the writing at this time comprised all the law of Moses taken from Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy, and which existed in writing before this time (Ex. 24 : 7 ; Deut. 31 : 24), or whether it was only the ten commandments, and the blessings and cursings contained in the 27th and 28th Chapters of Deuteronomy. If the former, however rapid might have been the writing in the moist plaster, it would have been difficult for the whole people to remain present ; if the latter, we can well conceive how the whole was accomplished in one day.

All Israel was concerned in this law of the Lord, and it must have been most impressive for the inhabitants of Canaan to see these people of God, stopping on their march of victory to write openly, for any one to read, the law of the Lord their God, and to hear the people responding to the reading, and witnessing against themselves if they should disobey (Deut. 27 : 15-26).

Here they were, all classes, high and low, rich and poor, men, women, children and strangers, all on a level before the Word of God, all listeners, all learners, when the mind of God was to be revealed. "And afterward he read all the words of the law, the blessings and cursings, according to all that is written in the book of the law." The curses come under three heads : First, against idolatry, secondly against oppression, thirdly against uncleanness. The blessings are like God, all inclusive, discernible by others as well as themselves. "The Lord shall establish thee an holy people unto Himself, as He hath sworn unto thee, if thou shalt keep the commandments of the Lord thy God and walk in His ways. And all people of the earth shall see that thou art called by the name of the Lord ; and they shall be afraid of thee." Yes, it should be the case that every one should see unmistakably that the Lord is with His own people, and that the name of the Lord upon them keeps sin and evil away. If there is not enough of the presence of God among us to make the unconverted see that we have a richer portion than they, what kind of witness can we bear for God?

God desired more than all else, that His people should hearken to His voice, and keep His commandments. And the consequences of not doing so are mentioned in order. He said, "The Lord shall send upon thee cursing, vexation, and rebuke in for to do." Oh, how many of God's children have said to us, "I am always thwarted in all which I undertake, nothing that I do seems to answer, I try to please God, I do my best, but nothing succeeds, I am so unfortunate." Why is this? Simply because there is a failure to listen, and get God's mind about the matter. Many will start a work for God, which they think will be so interesting, which will be so delightful, so much appreciated, but which God has never called them to, and they are surprised when it flags, and when all their efforts are unavailing ; they have set their hand to it without hearkening to God, and this is the secret of the want of success. God never calls us to take the initiative ; that is His prerogative, we are only children. That a work is good in itself is no proof that we are called to undertake that work. It is a good thing that the Gospel should be preached far and wide, but there are some who take up the work, not from the love of it, but to imitate others, and they not hearkening to the voice of the Lord, the work becomes a failure. It is a glorious thing to teach holiness, but unless the teacher is continually learning at the feet of Jesus, inconsistencies will be found in him, which will not only make his hearers lose confidence in him, but also prejudice them against the truth of God which he teaches.

The enumeration of those

which would follow the failure to hearken to the voice of the Lord is most teaching. The first mentioned is sickness, pestilence, consumption, fever, inflammation, extreme burning, "the botch of Egypt, the emerods, the scab," the itch, whereof thou canst not be healed, madness, blindness, astonishment of heart, disease of the knees, and sore sicknesses and of long continuance (Deut. 28 : 21, 22, 27-29, 34, 35, 59-61). The second plague mentioned is drought, ver. 23, 24. The third is conquest by their enemies, ver. 25, 26, 31-33, 36, 37, 48-57, 68-68, and the words of the Lord are so teaching, "Because thou servedst not the Lord thy God with joyfulness and with gladness of heart, for the abundance of all things ; therefore shalt thou serve thine enemies, which the Lord shalt send against thee, in hunger, in thirst, and in nakedness, and in want of all things." We must serve, and if we do not serve Him whose yoke is easy and His burden light (Matt. 11 : 30), we come under a yoke of iron. The fourth plague is family trouble, ver. 30, 32, 41 ; the fifth is the failure of crops and business difficulties, ver. 38-40, 42-44. It is easy for us to say that we are now under another dispensation, and therefore we cannot account for the temporal trials which come upon us in our day as though we were under the law. The Lord sees things as they are, and the majority of those who outwardly profess Christianity, and the majority of those even who have some knowledge of salvation, are living really more under the law than under grace ; and God in His great love meets us where we are.

It is our privilege, as crucified with Christ, to live His life, not ours ; in which the law of God is not outside but written in the heart and in the mind, a second nature, so that it is life to do the will of God ; our very meat to do the will of Him that sent us, even as it was with our beloved Lord (John 4 : 34). But with how many Christians the experience is far otherwise ! How many are constantly crying out, "I know I ought to do so and so, but I can't," living perpetually under a sense of condemnation. Surely this is to live under the law, and so doing we oblige our loving heavenly Father to meet us where we are, in the only line of His dealings which we understand, and seeks by trial to make us hearken to His voice. He calls us to take and keep our place in Christ, abiding in Him, and so sinning not (1 John 3 : 6), abiding in Him, and so bringing forth much fruit (John 15 : 5), abiding in Him, and so asking what we will, and it shall be done unto us (ver. 7). So abiding, sin shall not have dominion over us, for we are not under the law but under grace (Rom. 6 : 14), and so abiding we experience that Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law being made a curse for us (Gal. 3 : 13), bearing our sins and our sickness. But if we will not so abide, we bring ourselves under the law.

It is most significant that the writing of the law on stones in the land of promise took place at the very outset of the career of victory. Now, this teaches us that we need the Christ life, the law written in our hearts and minds, in order that victory may be continuous. The Lord Himself takes complete possession of us that His Spirit may illuminate the law within on the heart, and that our way may be one of uninterrupted victory.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Complications between France and England of a serious character have arisen out of the bombardment of Tamatave, in Madagascar. The strained relations of the two countries were first made known by Mr. Gladstone who, on July 11th, said in the House of Commons that "when the French occupied Tamatave, Madagascar, and proclaimed a state of siege, the British Consul there was suffering from a serious illness, which the political crisis aggravated. His secretary was arrested in his presence. Admiral Pierre, the French commander, ordered the sick man to leave Tamatave within twenty-four hours. The Consul died seven hours after receiving the notice." Admiral Pierre also stopped communications between the British man-of-war Dryad, which was stationed there, and the shore, and her captain was only allowed to make a verbal protest against this proceeding. The flags of all the foreign consuls were hauled down. Mr. Gladstone also stated that an English missionary named Shaw had been arrested at Tamatave and remains in prison. The charge against him was not known. Inquiries had been made regarding its nature, but the only answer received was that the law must take its course. Mr. Gladstone, in conclusion, said: "In announcing these grave and painful occurrences, I can only now say that we must await the receipt of further details. We must also await those communications from the French government which the case may require, which we have intimated we expect, and which it would be our duty to make under similar circumstances." No reply had been received from the French government at the close of last week to the application of the British Foreign office, and the French press appears to treat the matter with levity. It is, however, evident from Mr. Gladstone's language, that the crisis is a serious one, which, had a less patient premier been in office, might have led to hostilities.

The Fete Day of the French Republic Passed off this year without its threatened disturbances. July 14th, the anniversary of the taking of the Bastile, is always a day of uproarious enjoyment among the workmen and socialists of Paris, while the aristocracy dread its return. The communists had issued menacing announcements calling upon the people to rescue Louise Michel from her prison, but there was no response to the appeal. The chief features of the fête were the unveiling of the monster statue of the Republic in the Place de la République and the procession of deputations and various trades, corporations, benevolent and musical societies. The statue was unveiled in the presence of the President of the Municipal Council, and at least a hundred thousand unofficial representatives of workaday Paris. "La République" is represented as a woman, erect and holding upward in her right hand an olive branch as an emblem of peace, while the left rests on a shield inscribed with the words "The Rights of Man." The head is circled with a laurel crown, surmounted by the Phrygian cap, which is not, however, very prominent. The antique drapery in which the figure is enveloped hangs naturally and gracefully, and the general pose is commanding and majestic. The statue will rest immediately on a column, which, again, will be supported on an upper pedestal surrounded by white marble figures of Liberty, Equality and Fraternity.

The Trial of the Hungarian Jews for the murder of Esther Solymosi was continued last week. Important evidence for the defence was given by a physician, who testified that it was impossible for blood to spurt from a wound as the witness, Moritz Scharf, alleges he saw it spurt from the body of the missing girl. A Hungarian journal states that the public prosecutor in the trial intends to withdraw the indictment against the defendants; but it is clear that even that result will not save the Jewish community from serious peril. The passions of the ignorant and superstitious peasantry have been inflamed against the Jews. They believe that the Jews are guilty of the murder, and unless precautions are taken, massacre and pillage will take place.

M. De Lesseps Proposes to Cut a Second Canal across the Isthmus of Suez parallel to the one now in operation. The British Government has made the announcement that it had agreed, provisionally on the consent of Parliament, to lend M. de Lesseps $40,000,000, at three and one quarter per cent, for the promotion of his scheme; that the tolls were to be reduced in a sliding scale determined by the increase of the net profits; and that the control of the canal was to remain substantially as at present in the hands of the French Board. This appears to be a better bargain for France than England. So the English people consider, and indignation meetings are being held to induce the House of Commons to refuse its consent to the bargain. The commercial classes oppose it because it gives a valuable monopoly to a foreign company, and supplies capital for an enterprise, the profits of which will be reaped by foreigners exclusively. The lawyers and diplomatists oppose it also on the ground that English imperial interests have been ruthlessly sacrificed without compensation. The shipping firms interested in the canal have also held an indignation meeting, and have sent a delegation to the government to formally protest against the consummation of the arrangement.
